Just think how loving are our Christian clergymen! They think so much of us skeptics that they even giv us "nuts" to crack. Yes, "nuts!" Some one sent me a portion of such "nuts," and I began to crack them. From the reputation of Christians as loving and beneficent beings, I expected something good in these "nuts." I thought, "Now, maybe there is something in them that will force me to return to the sheepfold." And I cracked away, but, to my great surprise, found that they fell to pieces almost before I touched them. Whew! They were rotten!

It is H. L. Hastings that has immortalized himself by sending out some of these "nuts." One lot he calls "Nature and God." The artificial polish he has given them renders them very attractiv, and Christians, who are by no means in the habit of investigating the spiritual food they get from their shepherds, swallow the polished "nuts" in sweet unconsciousness of their rottenness.

I hav cracked some of these "nuts," I say, and will show to the reader what they contained.

Hastings says: "There are Infidels who do not believe in a God who judges, punishes, and afflicts. They believe in nature and in nature's laws. But what do they gain by the change? Are not 'the laws of nature,' as they term them, as immutable as those inscribed on tables of stone?"

This is the first "nut," and the man who sent it thinks the Infidel cannot crack it. But here it is:

The Infidels gain much by the change. The laws of nature are more immutable than "those inscribed on tables of stone." Infidels, by believing in the laws of nature, and knowing that they are absolutely immutable, are more apt to conform to them than those who believe in the laws "inscribed on tables of stone," and know that even if they do violate them, their God, in their imagination, is ready to forgiv.

Hastings goes on: "Do not fires burn, floods overwhelm, waters drown, earthquakes swallow up, lightnings blast?" etc., etc. And, "Are not toil, and labor, and hunger, and famin, and pestilence, and all the nameless agonies of dying men in accordance with 'the laws of nature?' Does not the God of nature do all this? Pray, then, what do men gain by throwing away their Bibles, which they will not believe, when they must find the same facts, and worse ones, in the book of nature, where they can neither doubt them nor deny them? The facts will stand. . . ."

And this is the "nut" you would make believe is so hard to crack. What strange digestions those Christians hav! A thing that falls to pieces of itself, and stinks besides, they swallow as a good "nut." Horror!

Here, Christian, compare it with a good one, and you will see what a nasty thing it is, if you cannot judge of it when you see it alone. The facts of nature will stand in spite of the Bible, and when the Bible hides some of them, which Hastings implies it does, it is doing an irreparable injustice to man and to nature's God. It is because nature displays its powers in spite of the teachings of the Bible that we (in a sense) throw that book away. For, pray, since "fire burns, floods overwhelm," "tornadoes desolate, tempests destroy," and all the rest—since all these, to the superstitious, horrible things take place whether you believe in the Bible or not, then pray what would be our gain in accepting it? It is just because the laws of nature are immutable that it is wise to learn them, love them, and conform to them. Strict conformance to the laws of our being would do away with "pestilence," and many of the "nameless agonies of dying men," which Hastings tells us are sent upon us by the god of nature (sic).

This orthodox notable goes on: "They (Infidels) cannot argue pain out of their bones [can the Christian?], misery out of their hearts, nor death out of their families." Can the Christian? In making it appear as if Infidels had more misery, and guilt, and condemnation at heart than the Christian, he simply errs. If personal testimony can strengthen this statement, I will say that ever since I began the venture of admitting natural truth as against scriptural imposition, my heart has been at peace, and my happiness greatly enhanced. "And sorrow, and guilt, and condemnation," as Hastings says, "will follow them," not however, "in spite of their doubts and skeptical objections," but because, if any of these do follow them, they are sent upon them by Christian persecution, or in consequence of early Christian foolishness. "Then what do they gain," asks his "riverince," "by their efforts to get rid of God?"

The trouble with the last "nut" is that getting rid of the Bible as a revelation is not necessarily getting "rid of God."

"What they gain," says this great man of God, "is just this: They put away the chastisment of a father, and fling themselvs amid the revolving gearings of an almighty machine that crushes them in the dust, and grinds them to power." Ah, ha! That's something I didn't know had happened me, or anybody else, yet. Can anyone swallow such a "nut?" Then he repeats: "They hav the same facts they had before, with no possible relief from them." No! and they don't seek relief. It is the coward only who tries to dodge facts. We think we are made in harmony with natural law, and to ask relief from the law of our being, when conformity to them is the surest salvation, must be as crazy as absurd.

Further: "They retain every trouble, and reject every consolation." Pshaw! What a "nut!" Retain every trouble, and reject every consolation! Yes, "believe as we do, or be damned;" that's consolation to be envied.

Well, we need no more of this kind of "nuts." Giv us some better ones next time, and we'll crack 'em, and, perhaps, pay "sixty cents per pound," but not for these.

SAMUEL GARBORG.

Canadian Notes.

There was a sound of revelry by night at the rooms of the Toronto Secular Society, Grand Opera House, on the evening of January 29th, when the members and friends assembled to celebrate the natal day of Thomas Paine. It was a grand gathering; the ladies of the society "turned out to a man," and, as a consequence, the rooms were crowded with, perhaps, the most brilliant and stylish audience that has assembled there for many a day.

Mr. Jopling occupied the chair, and performed the duties of that trying position with the stoicism of one who had resigned himself to his fate for the time being.

The trouble began with a piana solo (as usual) by one of the ladies, then a song by Mr. Lakin, after which Mr. Piddington well sustained his reputation ader by officiating at the funeral of being our best ;" Mr. Tilney gave one of his ever of "Buck Fansha.. O. P. Dildock added to the dis-favorit songs, ed the audience with a string of well tress and paral there was not a dry eye in the house directed puns), and Mr. Harrison piled up the agony (from laught do the "cork leg" (let us hope he won't by trying). After the audience had somewhat redo it aga rom this last ordeal, Mr. Evans delivered covered on of the evening on "The Life and Work the ora e," which was well received by the much en-of Pag listeners. Mr. Priestman made his début beduc the Toronto friends, and gave an excellent read-fog, and Messrs. Hicks and Richmond assisted in filling out what was after all a very good program.

After the concert the friends indulged in dancing until a late hour, and everyone was well pleased with the evening's entertainment.

Canada has long been known as a "stamping-ground" for fugitivs from justice in the States, defaulting bank cashiers, confidence men, etc., but Canadians are beginning to think that honors are pretty near easy, as it is well known that a large proportion of Canadian criminals find a refuge in "the land of the free."

One of the last to leave the country for the country's good is one, "Happy Sid," a member of the Salvation Army, a shining light, whose record shows that he did three months in a London jail for robbing his employer, and after robbing the Wesleyan mission fund house made his escape to Canada. Since his arrival here he has been connected with several robberies in Barrie; he also got away with the funds of the "saved army" in that town, and, after robbing the mail-bag at Kippen, made his escape, this time, to the States. Sic transit. Next! "By their fruits shall ye know them."

The Toronto ministry by their actions would seem to be entirely cut off from all communication with the outside world. While the different religious papers, such as the New York Examiner, the Congregationalist, and the Churchman, and the several religious associations in Boston, Chicago, and elsewhere, are discussing such questions as, for instance, "The Doctrin of Evolution in Scientific Theology" (whatever that means) or "The Reconciliation of Genesis and Theology," which is at least an advance from the old style of discourse, while, in a word, the religious world in most civilized countries is making at least an effort to hang on to the tail-end of advancing ideas, we in Toronto are getting the old, old story. The fall of man, the blood of Jesus, and hell fire are dealt out as they were fifty years ago. It is somewhat amusing to hear the Rev. H. M. Parsons get up on his hind legs and tell his long-eared congregation that Adam was the finest and the greatest man (except Christ) that God ever created. Instead of evolution, we get (or at least the people get) "the temptation of Adam and the temptation of Christ compared," or "What did Christ preach to the evil spirits in sheol?"

A short time ago the question to cremate or not to cremate was being discussed in some of the daily papers, and to forever settle the matter, one of the papers sent a reporter to interview some of the leading undertakers and ministers of the gospel, and thus get a sense of the public feeling on the question. Well, as a matter of course (and also of business), the undertakers were against the idea, and, as might be expected, the ministers were also dead against it, and mostly on scriptural ground. "It was opposed to the laws of God and man." "The scriptures plainly state," said one of the reverend gentlemen, "that at the last day all shall arise from their graves; and how could they arise if they were consumed; turned to smoke and ashes?" The Rev. Dr. Potts, at the conclusion of his interview with the reporter, said: "Cremation will never be tried in Toronto, or if it is, it will be by some Infidel who will do it out of bravado." They seem to know instinctivly whom they will hav to fight on this question in the future. By the way, this is the same Dr. Potts who said, some time ago, speaking of the prevailing skepticism in regard to a burning hell, that he thanked God from the bottom of his heart that he (he) did believe in a literal, burning hell. The most striking logical instance of the wish being father to the diabolical thought that has come under the writer's notice.

It matters not to these Toronto divines that the government is about to spend eight thousands in the erection of a crematorium, or that Parisian [illegible] sand pounds in the erection of a crematorium, or that four thousand people in Germany, among some twenty 2,000 physicians, 2,000 lawyers, professors, whom are schoolmasters; 1,000 government officials, and schoolant clergymen, hav petitioned the and 10 Protes vor of the introduction of cremation, government in fa of the medical profession in Eng- or that the leaders e in favor of it. Dr. Potts has land and America a ation, and that settles it. declared against crem en cremation or corruption,

"The choice is betwe n," and true to their record purification or putrefactic off side. While forever these gentlemen take the nothing of its history, gazing into the past, they se hearing they will not "that seeing they see not, and understand."

Christianity and Labor.

The Congregational Club of this city last week held a mental wrestling-match over the mighty subject of "Christianity and the Labor Problem." Roswell Smith thought that Christianity might be advanced if capital would treat labor justly. The Rev. Mr. Munger told his experiences among the railroad men when he was one of the chaplains employed by the Pennsylvania road, and the Rev. James. H. Rose entertainingly showed his ignorance of the hatter's strike in Norwalk last year. Professor Smith of Columbia—the college in which professors of philology go out of their way to abuse Freethinkers before their classes—instructed the ministers in the history of labor "from the time when it was simple slavery, through its development in guilds, which were institutions essentially religious, to the wage-earning period in which Atheism had taken root. Christianity, he thought, might well apply itself to elevating labor—not by increasing wages, but by raising public opinion to appreciation and approval of the efforts of labor to better itself. Christianity should step in and prevent factory labor by married women and by young children."

Well, this is going back a good way to learn why labor is hard and the laborer oppressed, but he might hav gone back a little further by the "capitalist," to the time when the Boss of all capitalists, he who owned the cattle on a thousand hills, thundered forth the anathema upon labor that has been the justification of Christian tyrants innumerable in their grinding of the poor: "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life: Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground."

Christians who are zealous—with their organs of speech—for the poor workingman, are handicapped at the start by this anathema of their God, and we know not if it be not blasphemy for them to attempt to interpose between the Almighty and the miserable subjects of his wrath.

However, as the interposition is not, according to the learned professor of Columbia, to take the shape of increased wages, but only an approving pat upon the back of the laborer who is striving to better his condition, it may do. But as to Christianity preventing the employment of women and children in factories, what would it hav them do—starve? If the wages of the husband and father are not to be raised, how can the women and children exist, when it now takes all the whole family can earn to keep body and soul together?

The world has had eighteen centuries of Christianity, and to-day is worse off than ever before. Wars and bloodshed abound; men are dying of starvation in the midst of plenty; social revolutions of vast consequences are impending; discontent, disorder, and bitterness of spirit almost inconceivable, are everywhere; the poor hate the well-to-do and the rich, and the well-to-do and the rich fear the poor; social chaos and anarchy beside which the French Revolution was but a street brawl, are all but upon us. And these Congregational tailors of Tooley street talk of what Christianity can do for the workingman!

The sublimest hights of impudence hav at last been reached.

One at a Time.

Our Boston friends, Tucker and Appleton, Anarchists, seem determined to convert us. Mr. Appleton publicly avows that we are worth saving; and although Mr. Tucker differs from him he nevertheless continues to advance what he no doubt thinks are reasons in favor of Anarchy. Perhaps, however, he is only trying to disentangle himself.

In the last Liberty Mr. Tucker replies to our rejoinder to him in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 30th. In the next Liberty, we understand, Mr. Appleton will endeavor to resurrect himself. In Mr. Tucker's reply there is nothing new, as he confines his effort to answering some queries propounded by us. We asked, "When a thief breaks into Mr. Tucker's hallway and takes his overcoat from the rack, is he seeking to govern Mr. Tucker?" To this Mr. Tucker says:

"Most decidedly. If appropriation of another's property by force or fraud is not an act of government, I should like to know what is."

As our little difference with Messrs. Appleton and Tucker seems to hinge somewhat upon definitions, and as Mr. Webster has been referred to as authority by Mr. Appleton, and accepted (as will be seen further along) by Mr. Tucker, we will refer this to that eminent lexicographer. He says that government means to direct and control, as the actions or conduct of men, either by established laws or by arbitrary will; to regulate, to influence, to direct, to restrain, or to manage. If the thief's relation to Mr. Tucker comes under any of these heads, we ask to be excused for our mental blindness. Taking an infinitesimal portion of a person's property by force or fraud does not constitute government, for, as in this case, the loser's action would not be changed, and the thief would not seek to restrain, or manage, or direct, his career. Further we asked: "Rather is not the thief afraid Mr. Tucker will seek to govern him by shutting him up in jail, and controling his actions for a term of years?" To this the reply is:

"Such a course would not be governing. To use whatever measures may be necessary to vindicate your right to be let alone is not to govern others, but to prevent others from governing you."

It seems to us that this course is precisely that which comes under Mr. Webster's definition of government, to wit: to direct or control, as the actions or conduct of men, either by established laws or by arbitrary will; to restrain or to manage. If Mr. Tucker will not abide by Mr. Webster, then will he please make his own definitions? In our previous paper we quoted Webster's definition of Anarchy, which is "a state of society where individuals do what they please with impunity," and asked, "Is not this thief a practical Anarchist? And in punishing him is not Mr. Tucker acting the part of government?" Mr. Tucker replies:

"No, this thief is not a practical Anarchist, but a destroyer of Anarchy. It will be observed by all except Mr. Macdonald that Webster says individuals (plural). Now, the moment the thief begins his stealing, there is at least one person, his victim, who is prevented from doing as he pleases, and thus Anarchy disappears. The terms of Webster's definition imply an exclusion of such individual acts as are inconsistent with the liberty of all individuals to do as they please—that is, an exclusion of all acts of invasion, interference, government."

But supposing the victim of the thief was not prevented from doing as he pleased, where then is the thief's attempted "government?" If a pickpocket should take ten dollars from Jay Gould, it would not interfere in the smallest degree with Mr. Gould's actions; yet the thief would be doing a wrong for which he should be punished, and for which the power the people hav chosen to control the actions of men should incarcerate him for a period of time. Webster's definition of Anarchy is precisely the opposit of what Mr. Tucker has it, as it implies a state of society where individuals commit whatever acts they please with impunity, i.e., exemption from penalty.

Mr. Tucker says further:

"A municipal government is a compulsory partnership of all persons living in a certain district, each one of whom is compelled to pay a portion of the expenses."

This is true enough, and Mr. Tucker would find his system of "individual initiativ and voluntary coöperation" would very soon become just what our municipal governments are. If an individual in the scheme of voluntary coöperation should trespass upon the rights of others, he would hav to be restrained or ejected from the society. Restraining or ejecting him would be controling his actions either by established laws or arbitrary will, and would be government. There is no escape from this conclusion, which narrows Anarchy down to about this: Whatever good it presents is not new, and whatever new it presents is not good. So far as we understand what Anarchy is (and that we fully comprehend it we do not claim, for the very good reason we cannot persuade its high priests to enlighten us), there are several fatal objections to the system, the first of which makes the enumeration of the others unnecessary, to wit: the practical impossibility of its realization. Before the Liberal Club last Friday night Mr. Appleton said that, if he knew that Anarchy was to be proclaimed the next day and all governmental restraint to be removed at 12 o'clock, he should leave town before 10 o'clock. This is conceding everything we claim: that government is a necessity, and must be fostered and used for the benefit of the people. Government always has been a necessity as far back as history can trace; it is a necessity to-day throughout the civilized world and uncivilized world; and will be a necessity in the future as far as prophecy can look ahead. This being so, any philosophy which cannot adapt itself to facts is worthless for practical purposes, and of exceedingly small value as a mental exercise. Starting with the fundamental proposition that a person has the inherent right to do as he (or she) pleases so long as he injures no one else, it is found that the actions of a man, either within the pale of civilization or among a tribe of savages, are at once circumscribed by the rights of others. His slightest action, his lightest word, has an influence upon those around him that he is bound to consider. Society has rights as well as the individual. When Mr. Spencer published his "Man and the State," Mr. Harrison said it might be called, "Mr. Spencer against all England." As an illustration we may use this title. Mr. Spencer has his inherent abstract individual rights. So has every other man in England individually. But as against Man's individual rights—and the rights of every other individual—Society, that is, all England in its corporate capacity, has its rights equally with the individual Man. When individuals collectivly choose to make rules for the guidance of the members individually, it has that right, subject to the limitations imposed by the rights of the individual to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—as the Declaration of Independence puts it. The necessity of a government being admitted—for Mr. Tucker says that his voluntary coöperation society will use force when necessary—the rights of individuals are protected by constitutions, beyond the provisions of which society in its corporate capacity cannot go—that is, cannot go under democratic forms of government. This restriction on individual freedom is, as Mr. Andrews puts it, precisely analogous to friction in machinery—something we can never hope to be entirely rid of, but which we should constantly exert ourselvs to reduce to the narrowest possible limits. Moreover, we must accept it, and maintain it when it conduces to the well-working of the social organism. Remove the "governor" of an engin and the machine runs away and flies to pieces. Destroy the "governor" of society—that is, the relation which each individual sustains to every other individual in society—and the social machine would fly to pieces, and Anarchy would reign.

Mr. Tucker now regards the man who votes as particeps criminis with the "government." Yet in a recent issue of Liberty he says that Anarchy justifies carrying a sword as long as there is any liability of needing it, and on more than one occasion has he spoken encouragingly to the dynamiters. But what kind of logic is this? If war and dynamite are to be justified, notwithstanding they are the extremest limitation upon personal freedom, and notwithstanding the tremendous and inevitable danger of inflicting destruction upon the innocent along with the guilty, why not accept the middle and less extreme danger of sacrificing some individual rights, while removing governmental abuses by legislation, instead of war? But no; Mr. Tucker would exalt to the pinnacle of fame the man who dynamites an emperor, while he scolds like a fish-wife anybody who uses his individuality by voting to restrain monopoly by the more quiet and more effectiv exercise of the power of voluntary coöperation, as we find it in a democratic form of government.

We cannot see, so far, how Anarchy is going to improve our condition. Its fundamental position that the individual has all rights, society none, is not true, for no individual livs, or can liv, who is not in relation with every other individual around him, if not in individual capacity then as a member of that society of which the individual is himself a part. This fact, which cannot truthfully be gainsaid, givs society its rights equally with the individual. The real social problem, therefore, is how to grant to the individual the utmost possible personal freedom of action, and yet maintain the solidarity of society, which insures to the individual protection to life and property as well as the benefits of civilization which arise from the voluntary coöperation of the people. It seems to us that to put all the emphasis upon the individual's rights is as wholly wrong as it would be to put it all upon the rights of society. The latter would giv us despotism; the former Anarchy.

Fighting for the Spoils.

A certain man of old is alleged to hav said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," but nowadays those who engage in charity as a commerce go him a great many better and force the children to come unto them. The man of old is said to hav meant kindly to the children; the managers of our asylums mean only business. The state allows two dollars per week for the support of truant children, and the managers of the charitable institutions find it profitable to keep agents at the police courts to influence the commitment by the police justices of unruly children to their several institutions. Sometimes the contests are about even, but the Catholic usually wins. The New York Juvenil Asylum this year calls for $104,000; the Catholic Protectory, for $242,000. This money will be used to train a few thousand more children in Christian grace. But if the man of old could see how these children are treated in these places he would hav punctuated his entreaty into the painful statement, "Suffer, little children who are brought unto me."

Sounds Large, but Means Nothing.

The Rev. Dr. R. S. Storrs, of this city, is one of those anomalous beings who with their feet on the earth yet dwell almost entirely in another realm. By his flock he is regarded with open-mouthed reverence. Mr. Storrs's sermon last Sunday was upon Christianity and Freedom of Thought. One of his rhetorical sentences reads:

"Skeptics are slaves, because they gaze on a phosphorescent picture on the clouds."

There are one or two errors in this statement. There are no phosphorescent pictures on the clouds for skeptics to gaze at. If there were, skeptics would not gaze at them, being occupied with useful affairs. But if they did, looking at a cloud would not make them slaves.

If some denominational antagonist were to say that the Rev. Richard S. Storrs, D.D., is a fool because he puts words into meaningless juxtaposition, we doubt if anyone would feel called upon to dissent.

Editorial Notes.

Two columns and more of last week's Lucifer were filled with E. C. Walker's praises of J. K. Ingalls's "Social Wealth," published at this office. The book merits all of Mr. Walker's commendation.

Custom House Collector Patton, of Toronto, has seized and destroyed D. M. Bennett's "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," sent by Mr. Baldwin, of Chicago, to Mr. Cooke, of Toronto. Mr. Baldwin thinks that the United States should not annex Canada at present; it first needs civilizing.

"The Truth Seeker Annual," says the New Thought, "is filled with such literature as every Freethinker will not only want to read but will want to preserve for reference." We hoped this would be the case when we were getting up the volume, and are glad to hav our hopes confirmed.

Recently Professor McIlwaine, principal of one of the schools of Pittsburgh, Pa., suspended eight pupils whose parents are Catholics because the children refused to attend the devotional exercises. The school board sustained the principal, and the parents threaten to test the matter in court.

The Missouri Liberal is much improved in appearance by a rearrangement into an eight-page paper, with three wide columns to the page. With Jay Chaapel's experience as an editor, F. C. Browne's practical skill as a printer, and Mr. Walser's push and enterprise, the Liberal ought to reflect credit upon the town. By the way, we would like to know the name of the Freethought lecturer who, Mr. Walser says, "would giv twenty-five dollars for a church in Liberal."

The Madras Secular Society seems to be doing good work in India counteracting the efforts of the Christian missionaries and enlightening the people. We hav received the two last numbers of the society's journal, The Thinker, an eight-page paper printed in English, and filled with good reading selected from English and American sources. Among the contents of the later issue we notice an article by Mr. Putnam, and a long instalment of Mr. Remsburg's "Sabbath-Breaking."

Miss Gardener, in an article printed elsewhere, takes a western editor very sharply to task for abusing the American Secular Union. The cause of the outbreak is the alleged fact that the Union had petitioned the legislature not to allow the establishment of a chair of theology at the Cornell University. In her reply Miss Gardener loses sight of one important fact which she might hav employed to good advantage, namely, that the American Secular Union has sent no such petition to the legislature.

The Oregon City Courier reports that Archbishop Gross, of Oregon, has issued an imperativ order forbidding Catholic parents to send their children to the public schools, when a school belonging to the church is accessible. According to the archbishop the teachers in the public schools are mostly followers of the damnable heresies of Luther and other schismatics of the period called the Reformation, and he, in common with the other priests of America, views with alarm the influence of the schools on the children of the faithful. In case Catholic parents do not wish to send their scholars to parochial schools they are not to attend any school whatever.

On Wednesday two weeks ago Mary Morris, of Troy, this state, put a pot of boiling water on the floor of the kitchen in her dwelling, leaving her niueteen-months-old babe creeping about the floor. She went into an adjoining room. Soon afterward the infant began to scream. Mrs. Morris rushed back and found it sitting in the pan of scalding water. She dressed the terrible scalds and put the child to bed. She was urged by neighbors to call a physician, but refused, saying that she would trust that the prayers of the family to save her baby's life would be heard. The next day one of the neighbors asked a doctor to see the child, and he visited the house. Much against Mrs. Morris's will he redressed the wounds, which he considered fatal. The infant lingered until Sunday of last week, when it died. Mrs. Morris said after its death: "My baby was all right until the doctor laid his heavy hands upon it. The almighty heard our prayers and would hav saved our baby but for the wicked man who sent that doctor to her. I believe in prayer, and know God heard ours." Why, then, did God let this infant die?

There are few kinder-hearted people in the world than Mrs. Slenker, and few do as much according to their means for the poor. We find in a spiritual exchange an acknowledgment of this by Jeremiah Hacker, of Berlin, N. J.: "She is kind-hearted and generous to the needy. I hav had many positiv proofs. She has repeatedly sent us stocking-yarn, and the pants I now wear, the only pair I hav that hav not been patched, were made of cloth that she sent me without any hope or expectation of reward, she paying the express charges and refusing compensation for that. My wife has also a woolen dress that Mrs. Slenker sent her from their factory. All these things were sent by her without our asking for them, or even intimating that we needed them, yet were just what we would hav chosen to hav. When people hav given her money for us she has had the trouble of mailing it to us and paid postage, refusing to receive anything in return, and I hav never had reason to think but what she was strictly honest as well as benevolent. D. Tuttle, of Ohio, who died poor, in his letters to me, spoke of Elmina's kindness and benevolence to him in the most grateful terms. The late Mr. Broom was here nine days over a year ago, and again eleven days before death, because he had no other place to lay his head. On both his visits he received money from Elmina, a part of it her own free gift and a part for his publications that she sold." Mrs. Slenker is by no means wealthy. The factory is a small one, and frequently Mr. Slenker must take his pay for cloth and yarn in trade, as money down in Virginia is scarce. Mrs. Slenker deserves a great deal of credit for her many kindnesses.

A lady whose daughter attends the Vineland, N. J., public schools protests to the editor of the Rostrum against the practice in the schools of compelling the scholars to commit to memory portions of the Bible. The children are required to learn a verse a day, and must hav that perfect, whether the lessons are or not. The lady says: "I would make complaint and hav it stopped, but I know my child would be sneered at." The editor confirms the lady's fears. "The other children," he says, "and probably the bigot of a teacher, would sneer at the child and berate the parents who dare to think outside of the theological channel and be desirous that the child should be left free."

A Georgia negro, living near Savannah, is the last insanely religious man to offer to God a human sacrifice. John Graham lived in a cabin some six miles from the city with his wife, his mother, and two sons. In the early part of last week he disappeared, and after three days' absence was sought by his wife. She had not gone far from the cabin when a flock of buzzards attracted her attention. Going to the spot over which they were hovering she found the corpses of two negro boys, tied hand and foot and bound to a tree. In a graveyard near at hand, crouching behind a tombstone, was the missing lunatic. He was secured, and the coroner called. The latter's investigation developed the fact that Graham, while insane, had slain the boys as an offering to God. He says he met the boys, and went up to heaven and prayed with them at God's bidding, and that he had anointed them with water. He then strangled them. Near the corpses was found a tin can containing part of the water which Graham had used in anointing them.

The Kingsland, Ark., Keeker (the peeper or pryer) throws this interrogation point at us:

"Among the many new features presented by The Truth Seeker, a 'Freethought' journal published in New York city, is one in orthography. In all words terminating in ve the e is dropped. For example: 'Have' is written 'hav;' 'give' is written 'giv;' 'destructive,' 'destructiv;' etc. Where is the authority for this wholesale tearing up of Webster? Please giv us a ray of light on the subject, Mr. Macdonald."

The reason of our spelling is that we believe in reformation, orthographic as well as religious. Our "rules" are the recommendation of the American Philological Society. The rule for dropping the final e on the class of words mentioned is to drop it when the vowel preceding the last consonant is short, as in "give." This also furnishes a key to the pronunciation of words, as, for instance, "genuine." With the final e left on, many might pronounce the i long, but with the e left off, the most careless reader knows the i is short, and givs the word the right pronunciation. The Truth Seeker is about twenty-five years ahead of the rest of the world in this, but then it is an Infidel journal, and that is its place.

Mr. Bradlaugh has introduced in Parliament a land bill of a most radical character. It provides "that from and after the 1st day of January, 1887, any person shall be guilty of misdemeanor who shall hold in any agricultural district any land of more than one hundred acres in extent in a waste or uncultivated state, unless such land shall not for any purpose be cultivable with profit, or unless such land shall hav been devoted to some purposes of public utility or enjoyment." Persons convicted of so holding lands shall, after trial, be evicted, but shall receive from government annually for twenty-five years a pension equal to the average value of the annual actual produce of the lands calculated over a period of fourteen years prior to the date of conviction. The commissioners to be appointed under the act shall then let the land by public advertisment in lots not exceeding forty acres to one person. The second reading of this bill is set down for April 14th. Mr. Bradlaugh has also placed on the order book of the House a notice of his intention "to call attention to the method of collection of labor statistics in the United States of America and in the Dominion of Canada, and to move, That, in the opinion of this House, immediate steps should be taken to insure the full and accurate collection, in this country, of similar statistics."

If the Rev. Dr. Buckley is compelled by force of circumstances to "hedge" as much in his theological statements as in his financial, he will hav difficulty in keeping his flock in line. In an editorial in the Christian Advocate of January 21st he said that our silver dollar is a "cheat." A Colorado subscriber, who is evidently a silver man, now asks him: "How can I pay you for my paper without cheating you? Silver is about all the money we hav here, and we hav very little of that. Now, sir, if the silver dollar is worth only eighty cents, as you say, do you want me to pay three so-called silver dollars, and thus make good the 'cheat?' Or, hav you faith enough to 'trust in God' for the twenty cents out of each dollar? It is true that I gave a dollar's worth of wheat, which I grew on my farm, for this dollar. The man I received it of took it for a dollar, on debt, and the man who received it of the government paid a dollar's worth of labor for it. I cannot see who is wronged thus far, but for fear that you will be the innocent party who will suffer I shall wait for your answer." To which Mr. Buckley answers: "We must adjust ourselves to the currency, whatever it is. Send on your legal tender. The responsibility is on the government, not on you." Like most other ministers, Mr. Buckley's preaching and practice will not hang together. If he honestly believes that the silver dollar is worth only eighty cents, he ought to hav insisted on the subscriber paying twenty cents extra on each dollar. And to be exactly honest Mr. Buckley must pay twenty cents extra every time he passes a silver dollar. But instead he throws the blame on the government, just as he loads his sins upon Jesus.

Letters from Friends.

NEW YORK, Feb. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken advantage of your liberal terms for THE TRUTH SEEKER in sending two subscriptions in one remittance. Inclosed you will find five dollars to pay for my subscription and one new subscriber.

Yours truly, JACOB ZIMMER.

HILLVIEW, N. Y., Feb. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $1.25 to pay for the "Story Hour," by Miss Susan H. Wixon.

I am a little girl of ten years old, and when I get my book, so that I can show it to my cousin, she will send for one.

CORDIA MOORE.

WARREN, Feb. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.25 for renewal and ANNUAL for 1886. We hope to procure the services of some lecturer here soon. There is quite a large floating population in this country seeking oil territory, among which I frequently meet men with Liberal views, and some are outspoken Infidels. Great good might be accomplished in this benighted region by such a man as Mr. Reynolds. We hope to induce him this way soon. Z. H. EDDY.

HARSHAW, ARIZONA, Feb. 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: That was a very interesting communication from Holt in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 23d, 1886, under the head of "Watch Them" in regard to sending books, merchandise, etc., through the mails. I hope Liberals everywhere will watch them, because it depends upon Liberals everywhere to keep the wheels of progress moving. If it don't pay to run the post-office department at present rates, restore the three-cent rate on letters. The reduction to two cents was mainly to benefit the business community.

I would say in connection with this subject that the citizens of this place and vicinity got up a petition to the postmaster-general asking him to recommend Congress to giv us a postal express in connection with all railroad and steamboat mail routes.

Now Liberals, what do you think of that idea? As the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are thinkers, we appeal to them to push things that are for the benefit of the masses.

F. A. LAMONT.

VINELAND, N. J., Feb. 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure that I write, for our distinguished Brother C. B. Reynolds has been here, and paid us a very pleasant, but to him, pecuniarily, a very profitless visit, for the elements above and below conspired against him, so that he could not exhibit the stereopticon views. The Mikado opera advertised on the same evenings, and the gas works were out of repair, so that we had naught but lamplight to add to the general discomfort. Our brother was cheerful and buoyant, and we tried to make his way as easy as possible. And we made arrangements for him to speak for us on Sunday forenoon on "Honest Answers to Christian Objections," which was much appreciated. In the evening his subject was, "Why I Left the Pulpit," which was very beautiful. The earnestness of purpose, and, at times, the sublime pathos brought to the surface, received the just encomiums of his hearers. He leaves behind him an indelible mark in Vineland. We shall want to see and hear him again.

THOMAS STREET.

PORTLAND, O., Feb. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been Liberal for once and hav given away all my TRUTH SEEKERS since the 1st of January. I could not hold them, but wanted to send them broadcast over the land, and, as Brother Reynolds said at the Cleveland Convention when he dropped a slip of paper that fell among the audience, "Let them bring what they will fetch."

Mr. Wakeman's speech in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 6th is worth to me the price of the paper for six months. I never could fully comprehend the meaning of his frequent remarks in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but this last is as clear as day. And there is Elmina, too. Not a word of her writing in your paper but what I read and reread. These noble men and women are working for us, and striving to help us break the shackles of superstition that we may be a free people. Let us look to their interest before they get beyond our reach.

Those illustrations are grand, so keep on in the good work. You may not inherit the kingdom of heaven, but surely you will receive the blessings of mankind.

J. D. WHEELER.

LEXINGTON, KY., Feb. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished reading Miss Gardener's new book, "Men, Women, and Gods," with its wealth of truths and arguments. But what can be said in its praise? The book speaks for itself, as all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know that Miss Gardener doesn't mince matters, but speaks to the point, and says what she thinks and thinks what she says. Every woman in the country should read this little volume. It would show them the position of women as taught by the Bible; that all of their troubles, socially, morally, and politically, can be traced to a common origin—the Bible; and that to defend and suppport a book that hasn't a good word for them is to defend and support their worst enemy. St. Paul, who would rather hav them remain in mental darkness, would, perhaps, not recommend the book before us. "If you wish to know anything, go to your husband," he would say. But suppose her husband knew nothing, and had never heard of the trinity or Nebuchadnezzar, and could not explain away the objections spoken of by Miss Gardener, what is she going to do? Go to the priest for information? Ten to one, he would hav to "see a man" or "catch a car."

Ladies, buy the book; it is only fifty cents in paper covers, the first lecture being worth the price alone. Buy it, read it, and hand to your friends to read. Look the matter squarely in the face, and say, "Henceforth we will be women, free American women, and women of common sense, in spite of old St. Paul, the priests, dogmas, and creeds."

D. B. COZINE.

FRIENDSHIP, N. Y., Feb. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed subscription for 1886. I should hav sent the 1st of January, but did hope to obtain three other subscribers. I will send them later if forthcoming.

I am greatly pleased with Prof. T. H. Huxley's reply to Mr. Gladstone. It is always a true delight to read from his pen. G. F. Rinehart is felicitous in his remarks on "True Liberalism." The letter of A. L. Ballou is full of choice thought counselling toleration, a virtue much needed. Then the photos—of C. B. Reynolds, flashing enthusiasm, zeal, and earnestness so characteristic of himself; and the indefatigable Putnam, determined that truth and right shall triumph, invincible, unconquerable; and last, but greatest, T. B. Wakeman, from whose face beams the amber richness of the deft traces of thought, which glorifies every feature! How proud we are of such laborers! I hope these will be followed by some of the heroins, such as Mrs. Juliet H. Severance, M.D., Mrs. Mattie Krekel, Mrs. H. S. Lake, and others.

Would that the masses were more interested in Secular ideas and the progressiv spirit of the nineteenth century!

GRACE L. PARKHURST.

LEHIGH, IA., Jan. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $6, which pays for my own and a new subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER one year, and the balance to be applied to my subscription.

I am truly sorry that I cannot do more to advance the good work in which you are so earnestly engaged, but, being unfortunate enough to be only a wage worker (a miner) the world's wealth with me is scarce. I am exceedingly well pleased with the new dress of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The pictures which hav appeared are good. I think, by all appearance, the artist is fully competent to perform his task in the exposition. It is impossible to describe in full with the pen the hypocrisy and falseness of the orthodox church without the aid of the artist's pencil. With both combined in THE TRUTH SEEKER old orthodoxy shall receive double defeat. There should be no mercy shown her nor quarter given her. She has been the curse of this world. Humanity has suffered with no other curse, including famin, pestilence, and disease, as it has at the bloody hands of orthodox Christianity. The growth of ages has been retarded, blighted, and set back in old night and despair under the rule of her iron hand, and in all ages she has kept the fire a-burning with the bodies of our best philanthropists, philosophers, and scientists. I am happy to think that I liv in an age when the enlightenment of Freethought is fast spreading amongst the people of all lands, and the seeds of sound reason and common sense which hav been sown by Freethinkers are beginning to grow up in the place of the old orthodox, poisonous seeds.

Moral truth is gaining the day,
Illumed by nature's glorious ray,
Anathema is flying away,
With priests and diels.
Sound reason and the scepter sway
Hard at her heels.

Wishing you grand success in your new departure,

ROBT. FLEMING.

PITTSBURGH, Feb. 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: On Sunday, Feb. 7th, Charles Watts delivered two very remarkable lectures here. The first was delivered at Maltby Hall in Pittsburgh and entitled, "Theological Fallacies; or, The Fall and the Atonement;" the other at Wilson's Hall in Allegheny City, on "Agnosticism or Theism—Which?" I deem them so excellent that I would like to call the attention of your readers to a few points in them that will giv some idea of their scope and merits.

Mr. Watts began by saying that the fall and atonement were the foundation-stones of orthodoxy. He then showed that the fall could not be true, and if true Eve's sentence was the most cruel and unjust imaginable, and would make God a fiend. He accounted for the church's barbarism on this principle. God either knew Eve would sin or he did not. If he knew it, then Eve could not be to blame. If he did not, then he was not omniscient. In either case he was solely responsible. The whole story was a rehash of a Hindoo myth. He defined sin as "an act conceived and executed aside from extrinsic circumstances." If God were holy he could not giv permission to sin. So man could not sin. Canon Farrar was quoted as saying, "No theory of the atonement was ever universally accepted by the church. The different theories were tabulated as follows:

Augustinian:	All men fell;	all are saved.
Calvinistic:	"	a few only saved.
Evangelical:	"	all who believe are saved.
Catholic:	"	ceremonies save.
Unitarian:	"	man reconciled to God.

The scheme is unjust and partial. Missionaries had better stay at home. Morality is the true savior of mankind."

In speaking of Agnosticism Mr. Watts said there was a general misapprehension as to the position of Secularists on Theism. Our position is not Atheistic, but Agnostic. The term Agnostic means "not knowing," and that explains our attitude toward the unknown and unknowable, such as God, the origin of nature, and a future life. We deem it unreasonable to profess to believe in that of which we hav no experience. God objectivly is a reflex of the individual who forms the conception, but practically his God is his prime passion, whatever that may be.

If God, theoretically, be infinit, universal, and absolute, then we, because of our limitations, can form no idea of him, as we are finite, conditioned, and relativ. Ultimates are inscrutable. We only know of phenomena. A personal immaterial being is impossible. There is no personality without materiality, knowledge, memory, and hope, and these imply change.

Creation out of nothing implies an external agency. What was it? Where was it? And how could it exist? God must hav been either in or out of the universe.

If the universe was everywhere it could not be created. Creation implies a place where there was no place. If so, where was God? He could not act without something to act on. Mind is not an entity, but the result of organized matter. There is no design in nature, but simply order. The evils of the world disprove, or at least do not prove, a moral governor of the universe.

We try to observe and comprehend the order of nature instead of the origin of the same. We let God alone. To say that we hav any conception of him is affirming that we hav an idea of an idea, of which we can hav no idea. We try to improve ourselvs. Utility, honor, and fidelity are our watchwords. We try to make the world better, and are content with having lived in it. HARRY HOOVER.

MONMOUTH, ILL., Feb. 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: For some time past I hav been in arrears with my subscription, and consequently indebted to your kiudness for continuance of opportunity to peruse the ever-interesting, thought-inciting pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER. For that I tender you my thanks, and assure you I fully appreciate the favor. I now gladly avail myself of the chance to take a jump ahead, and will try, by sending a dollar now and then, to maintain that position.

Inclosed find five dollars, which please apply in that direction.

The illustrations are an immense stride forward, and cannot fail to be effectiv in opening the eyes of many who heretofore hav been led and gulled by "blind leaders of the blind." They speak volumes in a language that cannot be misunderstood. "The Judgment of History" most particularly attracted my attention. It is splendid. I had to laugh the first glance I took at it. How comfortable and self-satisfied they all appear, and evidently all unconscious of their pitifully ridiculous plight, the old pope with his "bull" at the head of the "holy cross," Brother Beecher at the tail end, and Talmage in the middle with legs crossed, "holy Bible" on his knee, his whole attitude and expression that of a baby hugging a pet kitten. The countenance of Brother Beecher seems to convey the idea that he is a little doubtful; not altogether satisfied. On second thought I must except him; he appears to be in a meditativ mood, as though trying to discover the next phase of evolution. There is hope, I think, for him, but the two others are hopeless idiots. I suppose the robed and spectacled priest who is hanging on to Beecher's legs, and trying so earnestly to bear down, or at least to balance the scales, must be Heber Newton. Well, pull away, good Brother Newton; do your best, but you will find all the strength you can exert, though multiplied ten thousand times, will fail to overcome the gravity of the weights in the opposit scale. Poor Pat, whilst I laugh at I yet pity you, you poor, innocent soul, full of confiding, unquestioning trustfulness; ignorant and deluded though you be, there is no question of your thorough honesty, and that is more than can be said of thousands of priests who burn incense before tawdry altars, chant masses, perform genuflexions, and cut up other monkey shines in the name of religion that would disgrace a set of intelligent Hottentots, and who, whilst you are counting beads, are slyly chuckling as they count over the "Peter's pence" wrung from your hard earnings, and all the time keeping you in subjection through fear of excommunication, and pronouncing the most fearful anathemas against the noblest thinkers of the age, who, like the immortal Paine, proclaim to the world the "Rights of Man," and strive to inaugurate the "Age of Reason," whose dawning rays are already chasing away the darkness of superstition, and whose sway shall establish justice, freedom, and fraternity throughout the world. You hav plenty of company, Pat, and not all in your church either. However, the scales are held in the firm grip of eternal justice, and the "Rights of Man" will ever outweigh all theological dogmas and creeds, will exist long after they are forgotten, and sooner or later will be firmly and immovably established.

Revival meetings hav been the order of the day, or rather night, around this section. The Methodists, Presbyterians, Christian church, and others hav been doing their level best to save precious souls, and "snatch them as brands from the burning." Pity they would not spend the same amount of labor and money in trying to save precious bodies that are shivering in almost nakedness, and suffering for want of food. There are plenty of them. Oh, pshaw! Eighteen hundred years of Christianity, and what has it done for the world? "Love your enemies; bless them that curse you," who does it? What so-called Christian nation on the face of the globe that does not spend untold millions in the glittering trappings and fearful armaments of war for the sole end that one set of Christians may butcher another set of Christians, or invade the territories and destroy the homes and lives of so-called heathens, and, according to Christian creeds, thus hurry the souls of those heathens to irretreivable damnation, and all this whilst ignorance, and hunger, and suffering, and the utter destitution of hopeless poverty abound on every hand within their own borders, engendering disease and crimes without end? "He that hath of this world's goods, and seeth his brother in need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion upon him, how dwelleth the love of God in that man?" How many Christian millionaires, bankers, corporations, etc., ponder that question? But I must quit. Before doing so, however, I will tell you something that was related to me as a fact. Revival meetings hav been held up in Moline. During the progress of one a holy "servant of the most high" mingled with the congregation. Accosting a mechanic he asked: "Brother, are you working for Jesus?" "No," was the reply, "I'm working for John Deen for a dollar and ten cents a day." Turning away from him he addressed another: "Well, my brother, do you feel any change?" Thrusting his hands down into his pockets the "brother" answered, "Not a damned cent."

With best wishes for the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all who earnestly seek the truth, I remain, Yours truly, RICHARD T. WATSON.

IONIA, MICH., Jan. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find my remittance of $5 to renew my subscription and for one new subscriber. I was determined to send you at least one new subscriber to encourage you in the cartoon business. They reach a certain class of minds. I hope to send you more soon, but the outspoken Liberals of this place seem very indifferent about such matters and say if people are fools enough to believe such stuff let them hav it—and so say I, if they would run it at their own expense, but as long as I hav to pay $5 a year extra tax to relieve the churches from paying their own, and $5 more in school tax for the one-twentieth of the time of the schools spent in teaching theology, also in state tax for chaplains, and also while the hypocritical clergy and their adherents hav influence and political power enough to dictate legally what I must do or not do with the one-seventh part of my time, I shall not fail to expose the tricks of their trade to the extent of my ability.

We hav the full complement of church variety here, including Catholic, Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopal, Congregational, three kinds of Methodists, a Lutheran, and a Campbellite, each of which runs a church, besides Salvation barracks, and Young Men's Christian Association rooms, and Adventists to boot, all in a little city of five thousand inhabitants, and representing over $300,000 worth of untaxed church property. I do not believe there are ten unskeptical male church-members in town, except Catholics. Oh, that Reynolds with his Tent, or Watts, or Ingersoll, or some other of our great Infidel lecturers could be induced to come here and form a League! The harvest would be immense. I havn't time to stir up my few Liberal friends to call some such meetings, but all seem, like myself, to hav too much to do to giv it much attention. I loan my papers and books, and always speak out to thinkers or the pulpiteers whenever occasion offers, which is about all I can do.

In my judgment, all that is necessary to kill the clergy and the church is to show up the holy Bible in its true light.

Respectfully, S. M. BAYARD.

ANAHIEM, CAL., Feb. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 9th contains an appeal to Liberals by our worthy worker, W. F. Jamieson, of more and greater moment to the secularization of the rising generation than the Nine Demands. I hav long felt the need of our attracting the attention of our children. The graphic pictures are telling a true story to the eye. I often explain to the girls and boys the "Short Lesson to Christians," as I hav it on my wall.

Above all else let our purpose be avowed that we will hav plenty of "Liberal Leaves," and let everyone that has outgrown superstition help to make them, and buy them by the hundred and thousand, till Brother Jamieson's plan is carried out. We here are so far from the general path of Secular Liberal lecturers that we hav got tired of waiting for them to come. But it does seem to me to be the most feasible suggestion of the present day. Above all else, let us all try to avoid bickerings, disagreement, and harsh language to each other in our letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER or other Liberal papers, but let us show toleration to all as regards uncertainties, and endeavor to so liv that our record shall be pure and clear from faults and vices, so that we can proudly point to the class styled "Infidels," and defy the tongue of slander to prove aught against the lives of those that hav outgrown the Bible God, with all the myths and miracles of an ignorant, barbaric age, when one was called on to confess that three are one; when men said the sun stood still to let men kill; when priests taught girls that they must love them and fear God, or he would send the bears—even to welting them on the neck till scars were left. I've seen them myself.

MERIDIAN, TEX., Feb. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I feel impressed that it is my duty to write you that I am just as J. H. Burnham expresses himself in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 30, 1886. If you don't agree with him, you ought not to hav the selected piece on another page of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav known two just such cases in my limited experience as the selected story describes, and in my own family all the evil shadows were cast, though fortunately, by circumstances, were driven out; but I can never hav any good feelings toward that thing called religion.

You also take Mr. Tucker to task for saying a sneak-thief or highway robber is like government. The Thracian robber, when he was brought before Alexander the Great, convinced him that he was a robber too.

I think William Penn convinced King Charles that he had no rights in North America, and if I was a good hand to write I could convince you that the state of Texas was a robber, and one of the worst type. I will try and illustrate my case to you. I hav two tracts of land, one in Hood county, one in this county. On the one in this county I hav paid the taxes all the time since it was patented to me. Private individuals hav seized it and set up their claim and hav been on it for ten years. I hav been trying to law them off year after year, but they take every dodge and advantage that can be devised—hav beaten me so far. The one in Hood county was sold by the state for taxes in the year 1878. I sued for that. The District Court rendered judgment against me. I appealed to the Supreme Court and got my case reversed and remanded. I am not able to say yet whether it will be of any service or not to me. The two law-suits hav impoverished me so that I can't pay for my paper, etc., and now the great state of Texas simply stands by and says:

"Fight, dog, and fight, bear!
There is no dog of mine there."

These facts I hope will enable you to see that government is only a necessary evil at best. You certainly will see my point—that is, when the government givs a title to land it should protect that title and indemnify the person in his losses, or in other words should pay the expenses when her officials act with negligence, ignorance, or malice.

When the priests come around beguiling the women, the government should take them up as vagrants, etc. Those are my notions. Yours, S. D. GREER.

[Our correspondent falls somewhat short of grasping the full significance of mental liberty. There is no way consistent with equal rights by which the law can prevent the expression of anyone's religious views. If people will be humbugged, that is their misfortune. As to government, of course it is at best but a necessary evil—necessary to protect ourselvs against ourselvs. The thief to which our correspondent compares the government, on the contrary, is not a necessary evil by any means, and serves no good end. Likening a government to a thief is one of the emptiest comparisons ever expressed in print.—ED. T. S.]

VALLEJO, CAL., Jan. 30, 1866.

MR. EDITOR: I hail with much delight the wonderful improvement apparent in the last few numbers of the paper. I sincerely hope that you can continue the picture department. And, now that I think of it, I will donate $2.50 toward the pictures.

I did hope to be able to obtain a few more subscribers, but this burgh is such a pestiferous hot-bed of Catholicism, Presbyterianism, Methodism, and several other isms equally as absurd and dangerous, if not as powerful, that the introduction of healthful mind-food is a crime that is classed with murder, highway robbery, and general rascality. I hav been an avowed Liberal for several years, and although I hav made many enemies, and am often publicly insulted because of my principles, I still manage to hold my own, and, by trying to lead a more exemplary life as a Liberal than my enemies do as church-members, I hav succeeded of late in earning a little more respect than heretofore from the "rosary-mumblers" and the "devil-dodgers." This I hav considered a favorable advance in enlightenment and good sense. When a man of my extreme views can induce those about him to cast aside their prejudice and treat him and his belief with respect, it argues that reason is beginning to assert her superiority over ignorance and priestcraft. If the present favorable conditions continue, I may before long hav a few new subscribers for you.

I am chairman of the board of trustees of the public library, and in that capacity first antagonized the good Christians of the community by endeavoring to introduce Liberal literature into the library. One of the members of the board is a Calvinistic minister, another is an embryo sky-pilot, and still another is a devout Calvinist. As the board consists of but five members, I, of course, belong to the dignified but useless minority. I regret exceedingly that in such a rich field for labor my efforts in the Liberal cause should be of no avail.

I am to be a candidate in the spring elections here for the office of superintendent of public instruction. I am informed that because of my principles and views, I shall meet with an overwhelming defeat. In fact, the feeling is beginning to grow so strong that an organized fight is to be made against me. The confessional, that secret service bureau of the church, that destroyer of domestic peace and purity, that barbarous relic of an age of crime, ignorance, and superstition, is already exerting its potent influence to accomplish my defeat. I await in good spirits, but not with an "unfaltering trust"—for Rome and Calvinism are powerful—for the onset of the battle. Though I fear that "Dickon is bought and sold," I shall enter the lists with that assurance and pride that, my mother used to say, crowned those martyrs of early Christianity, who went forth to death without fear and without regret, because some greater and nobler fellow had always preceded them, for emulation was the keystone of their faith. So I. Many, many greater and nobler men than this Infidel in the far West hav even felt the screws of Rome and the flames of Calvin, and received an ignominous quietus in a Cimmerian night of oblivion, their great hearts hushed, and the things that dwelt in the woundrous realms of thought destined never to be known. "But we, the heirs of all the ages," think the things that they hav thought, and "from out the fulness of our years" we hear the ever, ever, Reason shall rule! "whispered by the phantom years, and a song from out the distance in the ringing of our ears," whose gladsome burden shall be of universal truth until time shall be no more.

With best wishes; and with the assurance of my humble assistance at all times in the one great cause, I am

Fraternally yours, W. J. TOBIN.

TO MR. CURTIS AND MRS. WHEELOCK.

BARRE, MASS., Feb. 14, 286.

MR. EDITOR: It is a mistake. Miss Gibson never "asserted that Spiritualism is fraud." She only declares that some of the mediums practicing it are to her knowledge frauds. It is very desirable and necessary, Mr. Editor, that I should set myself right before Spiritualists who are constantly making statements similar to the above, which I hav just read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 13th, over the signature, "E. F. Curtis, Farmington, Ohio;" and if you will allow me a few lines to explain my position, I will try and not be very lengthy:

First. There is a genuin mental and physical phenomenon known as Spiritualism, which, I believe, has its origin on this planet, and in living human beings, aided and promoted by their environments, including the laws of mind and matter.

Second. I hav never denied these facts. How could I, having been a known exemplificator of many of them, such as electrical detonations and illuminations, and all the various phases of what now is known as clairvoyance, magnetism, and healing, ever since my birth, nearly sixty-five years? but these genuin, I know, are often imitated and counterfeited by mediums.

Third. I believe other manifestations such as materialization, independent state-writing, the projecting of living birds, persons, flowers, stones, vegetables, and solid substances through the walls of buildings, were never done in one single instance; but I only require proof of the facts in order to admit them.

Fourth. If others are genuin mediums and do not produce the manifestations themselvs, I know Mr. Truesdell performed his himself in the case contested. He did not tell me so; I saw him do them; and is not that stronger proof that he did do them than the negation, "spirits did them," when no one saw spirits do any such thing? I not only saw him perform them, but every one in the circle heard him repeat how he did them, and many of the tests he proved to them he did do, one by drawing his cardboard "Ella" from out of his sleeve and producing "Ella" on a lady's arm in sight of us all—the very name we had seen on his arm a few moments before, pronounced by them all a wonderful display of spirit-power and intelligence.

Now "let us see who is credulous," demands Mr. Curtis. "You admit, we all admit, that Truesdell takes a clean slate, puts a bit of pencil on it, and ties a slate on this, or puts the first slate tight up under the table-leaf, and writing is done on the slate. Ella tells us she is sure, yes, she may say she 'knows Truesdell does it.' We say spirits did it, using for the purpose an element they find in Truesdell that they do not find in all," etc., etc.

Why, Mr. Curtis, Mr. Truesdell wrote some of those messages and showed them to us on the afternoon of the day on which they were exhibited in the evening, and do you suppose spirits wrote them over again at his dictation, or in other words copied them, and others he wrote at intervals during the seance after he had obtained the names by opening the ballots on which they were written, which I saw him do? I know how all this writing was done just as well as the circle knows how "Ella" was made on the arm. I saw Mr. Truesdell make the letters in the afternoon of the second day and paste them on the cardboard for evening use, he having obtained the name the night previous by hearing one of the circle say, "I suppose Mrs. R——— was disappointed in not getting a message from Ella;" hence the name the next evening on Mr. Truesdell's arm. "Conditions were favorable." Sometimes the slates were changed after they were sponged off, and sometimes other measures were resorted to to produce the writing, but you may rest assured in every instance it was done by the hand of Mr. Truesdell; and in the Mrs. Simpson test, after the slate was put under the table, a very ingenious trick but very simple, however, after you know how it is done. You seem to be sure that spirits do it because you cannot account for it in any other way, but there are ways, you perceive, to account for too many of these performances for any one to be very sure that all are not either trick or our own minds. But Mr. Curtis asks (and Mrs. Wheelock in Jan. 16th asks the same question substantially) how "a girl not over four years old that had not attended school, knew nothing of writing, under some influence would write, the writing would claim to come from the dead so-called;" how could she thus write?

Who has not heard of a self-induced psychology, and a psychology not self-induced that one person exercises over another, as did Professor Grimes and other operators over their subjects, where they could be made to believe they were kings or queens, or in a moment become great orators, though never having before raised their voice in public, and doing other things equally as wonderful? I hav not the least doubt that the little girl did just what is credited to her, also, in the case cited by Mrs. Wheelock, for I hav done quite as remarkable things a hundred times, but being an evolutionist and not believing in a designer, I can account for it satisfactorily to my own mind without the aid of spirits.

Mr. Curtis says, "Let them meet on facts." Mrs. Wheelock inquires, "Will Truesdell & Co. please explain?" Yes, but you will not accept our explanation of the facts any more than he will yours. Shall we then call names and stigmatize? Now it does not hurt me to be called "fraud-hunter" by implication; I who hav been seeking truth all my life more than any other one thing else, but who sometimes found fraud instead, and was honest enough and brave enough to admit and avow it when apparently it was against my interest to do so It has cost me something to speak what I knew was truth all these years since I discovered as I thought the facts underlying Spiritualism, so-called, were not attributable to spirits, and my self-respect demands of me an expression of the same; also that I do not believe in genuin materialization and slate-writing. No, not for one moment, even the wonderful tests reported from Liberal, Mo., that hav recently so startled the country.

I hav no disposition to impute bad motivs to every believer in Spiritualism, nor fraud to every so-called medium, while I am free to say that I hav but little charity for the spiritual swindlers who hav imposed upon our Owens, Chaineys, Walsers, and other noble, honest, intellectual men and women.

I trust I am now understood. Yours truly,

ELLA E. GIBSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

From Childhood to Age.

Dear, gentle child, with the sunny brow,
The canvas is spread and thy vessel's prow
Is turning away from the eastern shore;
Thy ship is to sail life's waters o'er.
The skies are bright, and the pearly spray
Is dancing and sparkling along the bay.

I look around on the landscape green,
There are beautiful hills and vales between;
The lambkins are skipping in innocent glee,
The birds are building in wall and tree;
Sweet perfumes arise from gardens of thyme;
The bells are swinging in silvery chime.

'Tis a lovely land thou art going to leave,
For its innocent joys thou wilt sometimes grieve,
For the emerald glades where the violets sleep
On the tossing seas thou wilt sometimes weep;
As thy bark shall traverse the troubled surf,
Thou wilt often long for the velvet turf.

Go forth, O my child, and gather the flowers;
Go, gather the vines from the woodland bowers.
They will wither, 'tis true, their hues will depart,
But their scent will remain to comfort the heart.
It will whisper to thee of the morning land,
As thou bearest away to the western strand.

The jewels of wisdom thy mother gave,
Take in memory's casket upon the wave;
Take thy girdle of truth, with its flowing length,
To gird up thy loins when thou need'st strength,
And fold, for the voyage, thy garments white;
Thou wilt need them to wear in the Isles of Light

My darling, farewell, time cannot be stayed,
The ship is afloat, the anchor is weighed;
The breezes are out and the billows play,
As they bear thee from childhood to age away.
May thy heart be brave and thy courage strong,
Should the seas be rough and the journey long.

Denver, Col. Mrs. Buckner-Johnson, M.D.

Sunny Memories.

In looking back from fifty-five to sixty years I think of the joy I used to feel over the glory of an English springtime, when the crocuses and violets came to gladden the hearts with their beauty, and the latter especially with its delicious odor. When quite young, with what delight we used to trudge along the hedgerows that were beginning to show their myriad tips of fresh green, to gather these early flowers: A little later in March or early April came the lovely primroses, almost white in their primitiv state, but by a curious process of culture, viz., the frequent turning upside down of the roots, made to assume all shades, from the creamy white to the deep carnation. After these the charming daisies, and the lovely cowslips, and the jubilant buttercups. This wealth of natural flowers is one of nature's best means of education for the little lads and lasses of "Merry England." Under these inspiring influences, 'tis no wonder that the little people, free from the curse of shop or factory, hav such bright, plump, ruddy faces. I remember also with what delight the little chaps hunted for the shells the snails had left, partly for purposes of adornment, but more for the purpose of playing "Sniggy." This game was the pressing of the apex of your shell against that of another boy's, the owner of the victorious shell taking one from the loser. "Harvest time" had two seasons of great interest to girl and boy life. These were "gleaning" and "harvest home."

The "gleaners," composed of all sizes and ages, but principally the mothers and the girls and boys, would line out the wheat fields and file along as steadily as soldiers on dress parade, save laughter and mirth were freely mingled with the picking up of every spear of grain the generous or close-fisted farmers had left. Of course it was tiresome for us little folks, but the jolly times we had for a season after we had sat in a circle to eat our dinners made us more than forget all our effort in the way of tiresome labor. The mothers were girls again, and the sweet, rosy cheeked girls were concentrated joy itself. There were all kinds of innocent games, mixed with laughter and song, and kissing, and the jolliest of all the fun was for us little fellows to chase the mothers and smother them with kisses. So much are these impressed on my memory, that like the fragrance of the violets, those mother kisses they gave us in return are felt now. "Harvest home!" what a glorious affair this was as the last load of grain was trimmed with oak and beech, and the little people piled on the top, and driven into town or village amid shouts and laughter, where we were drenched with water thrown on us from any source by anybody. It was a joyous jubilee. I could go on and tell you for a long time how much of joy and delight were crowded into an ordinary girl's or boy's life in those days, but I cannot paint the untold joy they hav left along the "life-line" of the years till now. These belong to the externals of early life; there are another class of memories still more precious. These consist of early friendship, early love. Always first with me is the love I bore my mother, and out of which has grown, and still remains a charmed influence, diffusing itself through my whole being, commending where it is deserved, and chiding where it is necessary.

Next in order is the recollection of my school-day companions and their peculiarities—the bashful, awkward boys and the pretty, saucy girls, with all the mental and moral shades between. What fun it used to be to tease some of the bashful boys, who were "head over ears in love," and dare not say so. There is always the pert boy, who is usually a tyrant, and I laugh now as I recollect how one of these had the conceit taken out of him by getting a sound thrashing from an awkward, bashful lad who had been thought rather cowardly. The occasion was at a top-spinning game, where one of these perts abused a smaller boy. The tyranny was so apparent that the English love of fair play that is part of a miniature John Bull's inheritance roused the indignation of the bashful lad, who said, "Why don't you take a fellow of your size," and suiting the words to the blow struck him in the face and made his nose bleed. A little tussle, of course, but justice was triumphant, and the girls as well as the boys shouted for the victor.

Our school-days, though not oppressiv as to numbers, were full of sunshine—and why? Because we always sought to seek the loving side, to avoid quarreling, and yet to fight our way sooner than submit to the school-yard tyrants.

Out of these rudimentary causes the woman and man are perfected, and just as in early life we lay the foundations of happiness will the superstructure of later years be seen. Whether these little people can or do catch the brightest sunshine of early life depends very much on how well those who exert a guardian care over them perform their duty. While the great problem of human rights is under discussion, the more important phase of it, rights of children, is very apt to be forgotten or disregarded. Among the first of these is the right to be well born; free as possible from any hereditary taint of mind or body. Next the right to healthful and pure associations, entire freedom from all theological bias, and an opportunity to develop mind and body in harmony with the highest scientific conception of what nature's laws are. Such a thought as an aristocracy of race or sex should never be even hinted at, and all teaching in this regard save that which inculcates the democracy of human nature in its entirety should be avoided. This truthfulness and integrity toward children would call out and leave completely free their generous impulses and nobler instincts.

Now, my dear young friends, you perceive how it is in your power, if the elders do their duty, to build up your own temples of happiness; to make them the source of comfort, strength, and perpetual delight; not for narrow, selfish ends, but for the broader and nobler purpose of encouragement to others whose early associations hav been less bright than yours.

In attaining this condition, threats of future punishment or promis of future heaven is not necessary. If the vision is not obstructed, it will see clearly all within the scope of its view; 'tis so with the mind unclouded with superstition and base conceptions of the rights of race or sex. It will understand that the false and unjust, which cause pain, should be avoided, and that mutual dependence, or our obligation to others for much we get and need, requires that we should be as willing to assist as we are to be assisted. Lydia Maria Child said in her "Letters from New York:" "Everything has its bright side." It is equally true that there is the shadow side also; therefore while we may gather—to use a figure—the sunshine and scatter it, we may reap the shadows and fill the memory with ugly and disagreeable pictures. It is not a hard thing to store the mind with pleasant things; 'tis much easier for girls and boys to hav a good than a miserable time. Generosity is better than selfishness. Beauty of action and conduct makes plain faces charming and attractiv, while selfishness and vanity mar the most perfect features. To be esteemed good is preferable to external adornment or bookish smartness. It is well indeed if the riches of the mind, with beauty of form and dress, are united, but where they are not loveliness of character is the superior, for it exhibits, and produces, a never-failing supply of sunny memories. Mr. Delmar's Little Story.

Dear Children: When I was a boy of perhaps ten years of age, I lived in a village where they had a young lady school teacher. I did not attend school myself, but the report of the children who went there was to the effect that she was very good and kind to them, that she entered with a spirit of emulation into all their little games of pleasure and amusement, and my boyish heart warmed toward her, and I had a yearning desire to make her acquaintance, and hav her take kindly notice of me. But I was ignorant, and knew not how to do it. In fact, though not a pleasant reflection, I was considered by many a stupid blockhead. Nevertheless I made up my mind to attract her notice somehow, and waited and watched a long time without an opportunity presenting itself, until one Sunday, when the people were leaving church. She was among the number, but walked separate from the others. In a fit of desperation, I ran to her, grasped her dress, and gave it a violent pull, and then stood still. Instantly she turned, and with eyes blazing with anger, and a tone of voice I shall never forget, she said, "If you do that again, sir, you shall suffer for it."

Her manner and tone of voice absolutely paralyzed my senses for a while, and I stood rooted to the spot, until I was jostled by the other churchgoers returning home. I then turned my steps homeward, while the tears of shame, grief, and regret welled up into my heart and my eyes in unutterable woe. If she had turned and said kindly: "You are very rude, my little man, but I guess you did not mean to be, did you? What is your name, and where do you liv?" etc., she would hav retained the prominent place in my heart she had so long occupied, but—well, she misunderstood me.

The moral for children is to study how to show their love and admiration for their elders in a polite and becoming manner; and to teachers and others to be lenient with children, and not be forever ready to misconstrue their intentions, and remember that the budding minds of some children unfold very slowly, who, from their ignorance, and the obscurity of their perceptions, manifest an uncouth manner and rude familiarity in singular contrast with their sincere and loving hearts. H. Delmar.

Eureka Cal.

[True it is that many children are thus repulsed and misunderstood. A wound is made in their delicate, sensitiv natures that remains for a life-time. Had the teacher, in the above instance, come from a school of sciencc and humanity, instead of a church, she would, we trust, hav better understood the law of kindness, and would hav met the little boy in a more tender and compassionate spirit.—Ed. C. C.]

"The Infidel School-teacher and Handsomest Woman" are two pretty stories under one cover, written by Mrs. E. D. Slenker, the well-known Radical writer and reformer. These are healthy, wholesome stories, and full of strength, beauty, usefulness. All the children, of course, and young folks, as well as old ones, will want to read them; and as the price is only 20 cents, of course everyone can afford to buy a copy, and thus encourage the author to write more Liberal stories for the young.—Ed. C. C.

Correspondence.

Ithaca, Mich., Jan. 23, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I see my other letter was not a burden to you, so I thought I would bother you again, for ma often says little girls are "miserable little comforts." I guess you will think so too, so many little girls writing to you. We hav very nice weather up in Michigan this winter. Splendid sleighing now! Papa takes me to school every morning—picks up all the little girls and one little boy on the way. We hav a happy time. We hav a graded school and six teachers. In my room we hav sixty-nine scholars. Your little friend,

Fannie Kelley.

[We call little girls, and boys too, "blessed little comforts," and we are never tired of their letters.—Ed. C. C.]

McMinnville, Or., Jan. 24, 1886.

To the Editor of the Children's Corner, Dear Madam: My father is a great reader, and thinks much of The Truth Seeker, and by his request I will try to write you a letter. It is my first experience in anything of this kind, so you must not expect much.

We are having a pleasant winter; no snow until the 17th of January, and then it snowed one foot deep and lay on three days. To-day the ground is bare. During December we had considerable rain, but that is nothing uncommon for this state.

We hav two large orchards, which bear us apples, pears, prunes, plums, and peaches. There is not much profit in drying fruit to sell, as it is so plentiful.

My father is a farmer chiefly. He and his two sons run a farm of two hundred acres. He is seventy-five years old, but, when well, he makes as good a hand as most of the young men.

I'll not write any more this time, as it is the first; will try and do better next time. I am thirteen years old, and this is the first letter I ever tried to write to a paper.

Fox Lake, Ill., Jan. 25, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: When I read The Truth Seeker and see so many children writing such nice letters, it makes me feel as though I wanted to write to you and send you my thanks for the nice stories in the Children's Corner, which I so much like to read. Grandpa and grandma take The Truth Seeker, and I read it and am delighted with the Children's Corner.

I am a little girl eight years old, and I hav two little sisters; one is three years old. Mamma died about a month ago, and left a darling little baby a few hours old. It has no name yet. My auntie has got her. Now we hav no mamma, but grandma stays with us.

I had the "Story Hour," and liked it so well that I learned the stories almost by heart; so I gave it to my cousin, Gertie Drury. I want to get the "Apples of Gold" very much, but grandma says I must wait till my ship comes in. I hope it will come soon.

But I must close now, for I hav no doubt you will hav hard work to make out what I hav written. Please accept my respects and good wishes. Cora M. Howard.

[We all feel very sorry for Cora and her little sisters in the loss of their dear mamma. We trust they will always be just as good girls as if their mamma were living, and as she would wish her little girls to be.—Ed. C. C.]

Sunlight, Neb., Feb. 1, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am eleven years old, and I go to school every day. I hav two sisters and three brothers. The oldest and youngest are girls. I wrote this in school. I like to read the letters in the Corner.

Yours truly, Stella Somers.

A Little Advice.—We wish our correspondents to be careful and spell correctly, to write with ink, and on one side of the paper only, when writing for the press; and always try to write briefly on intcresting subjects. Sometimes the editor is obliged to rewrite some of the children's letters, which we hope will not occur again after these hints.

Poetry.

Two Lives.

Time laid his hand on the budding leaf;
It turned to crimson, then brown and gold.
He touched the grain; 'twas a garnered sheaf,
A laden bin—and the year was old.

You walked in the sun when time was young;
I grew in the shade and was ever old;
My life at last to the daylight sprung,
And yours—crept under the graveyard mold.

Two ways, two lives, two leaves of years,
A sudden cloud, and a glare of sun,
Written in passion, erased in tears!
Is the chapter ended or but begun?

Labor in Chains.

He stands before the rich and great,
Like captiv Samson, blind and bound,
And winds his mighty arms around
The lofty pillars of the state.

From lips of brass and hearts of stone,
Around him slaves and masters raise
Their songs of worship, fear, and praise,
To Mammon perched on Dagon's throne.

He hears, and all his pulses thrill—
Not to the measure of their song—
To memories of want and wrong
And toiling in the prison mill.

O hope deferred and longing vain!
O gyved limbs that once were free!
O scarred eyes that may not see!
O breaking heart and reeling brain!

All careless of his misery,
Or, mocking him, the rulers stand.
Will no man take him by the hand
And lead him forth and set him free?

—John Swinton's Paper.

Logic from Chicago.

THE REASONING FACULTIES OF THE EDITOR OF THE MORNING NEWS.

MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS.—This is a book by Miss Helen H. Gardener, with an introduction by Robert G. Ingersoll. It consists of three lectures, entitled: "Men, Women, and Gods;" "Vicarious Atonement," and "Historical Facts and Theological Fictions." The design of the book is the emancipation and elevation of woman. The end is certainly a very laudable one, but whether the end would in this case justify the means may well be doubted. The author evidently expects to see the day when woman will be free and in the full enjoyment of all the rights, privileges, and immunities of man and recognized as his equal in every particular. But in order to do this she deems it necessary that all forms of religion shall be utterly destroyed. She recognizes no true religion, but is possessed by the conviction that all had their origin in fables, and that the one and only thing on which all are agreed is that women hav no rights which men are bound to respect. She sees but little to choose between the various systems, but on the whole regards Christianity as a little worse than any of the others, and of all the gods of the Pantheon Jehovah is a little the most arbitrary, unreasoning, and cruel. She teaches, and undoubtedly believes, that the influence of every form of religion has been bad and only bad and is without the slightest mixture or color of good. She admits that the condition of women is better in some Christian countries than in some heathen countries, but this she explains by declaring: "What I hold is this—that the primary and controling causes of the various stages of civilization are climate and soil.

"There are, of course, many other things which modify the social development or civilization in any country, . . . but no one of them can claim the primary place."

In the course of the discussion she incidentally and informally, though none the less really, divides the human family into three, possibly four, classes: First, knaves; second, fools; third, Freethinkers, and possibly fourth, cowards.

The first includes the clergy of every name and order, of every land and every age. If the class includes any others they are not specified, and the reader is left to infer that the priesthood embodies the whole brotherhood of scoundrels.

The second class includes all grades of religionists below the order of the priesthood, whether activ or passiv.

The third class includes those, and those only, who actually declare their independence of all religion and assume a hostil relation to it.

The fourth class includes a possible remnant who, not being quite silly enough to accept by an honest faith the teachings of religion, are, nevertheless, frightened by some sort of bugaboo into the adoption of its outward forms.

Mr. Ingersoll in the introduction says her arguments are "unanswerable." If this were admitted, still the question suggests itself: What good is to come of argument, either pro or con, if only knaves and fools on the one hand and men and women so wise as to be beyond the reach of instruction on the other are to constitute the audience? It really seems strange that a lady as brilliant as Miss Gardener undeniably is should expend her energies in an effort which promises so little. Surely, a system intrenched as religion is in the hearts of the people, even though they be knaves and fools, requires weapons of larger caliber than the fair lecturer has brought to bear to accomplish its overthrow.

If it be asked why religion livs and thrives in spite of all opposition the answer might be: Because man has a religious nature and can not liv without it. If this is not thought specific enough, note the following:

1. There is in man a desire for life which clings to him until death—a desire so strong and so constant as to awaken a conviction that life is to last beyond the incident of death.

2. There is in man what, for want of a better term, is called conscience. This recognizes a distinction between right and wrong, begets a feeling of responsibility, and points to some power without and beyond the man to which he is accountable for his conduct. But the terms right and wrong imply a law or rule of conduct which places upon man an obligation to do the right and shun the wrong. Not that there is any intuitiv perception of what is right or wrong, but a recognition of the fact of such a distinction in moral conduct.

3. Another of the common experiences of mankind is a sense of dependence. This feeling, the offspring of human weakness and need, comes with more or less intensity to all, and at times becomes a burden almost too heavy to be borne.

The above analysis is, of course, very far from exhaustiv, but is believed to explain why men believe in a future life, in a moral law, and in a God. So firmly is this faith imbedded in the universal soul that when one comes forward and challenges its truth, whether it be a brilliant Ingersoll, or his glib-tongued echo, the world pronounces him a crank. And, though the mob may rush to hear his ravings, it is done for the same reasons that would prompt the same crowd to views the "freaks" in a dime museum. New York. The Truth Seeker Compauy.—Chicago Morning News.

In the issue of the News containing this remarkable review of Miss Gardener's book we find on the editorial page an equally remarkable allegory to show that a "God" exists. It is entitled RODOLPH AND HIS KING.

"Tell me, father," said the child at Rodolph's knee, "tell me of the king."

"There is no king, my child," said Rodolph. "What you hav heard are old women's tales. Do not believe them, for there is no king."

"But why then," queried the child, "do all the people praise and call on him—why do the birds sing of the king, and why do the brooks always prattle his name as they dance from the hills to the sea?"

"Nay," answered Rodolph, "you imagin these things—there is no king; believe me, child, there is no king."

So spake Rodolph, but scarcely had he uttered the words when the cricket in the chimney corner chirped loudly, and his shrill notes seemed to say: "The king—the king." Rudolph could hardly believe his ears; how had the cricket learned to chirp these words? It was beyond all understanding. But still the cricket chirped, and still his musical monotone seemed to say, "The king—the king," until, with an angry frown, Rodolph strode from his house, leaving the child to hear the cricket's song alone.

But there were other voices to remind Rodolph of the king. The sparrows were fluttering under the eaves, and they twittered noisily as Rodolph strode along. "The king, king, king! The king, king, king," twittered the sparrows, and their little tones were full of gladness and praise.

A thrush sat in the hedge, and she was singing her morning song. It was a hymn of praise. How beautiful it was! "The king, the king, the king," sang the thrush, and she sang, too, of his goodness. It was a wondrous song, and it was all, all about the king.

The doves cooed in the elm-trees. "Sing to us!" cried their little ones, stretching out their pretty heads from the nests. Then the doves nestled hard by and murmured lullabies, and the lullabies were of the king who watched over and protected even the little birds in their nests.

Rodolph heard these things and they filled him with anger.

"It is a lie!" muttered Rodolph; and in great petulance he came to the brook.

How noisy and romping the brook was; how capricious, how playful, how furtiv. And how it called to the willows and prattled to the listening grass as he scampered on his way. But Rodolph turned aside and his face grew darker. He did not like the voice of the brook, for lo! just as the cricket had chirped and the birds had sung, so did this brook murmur and prattle and sing ever of the king, the king, the king.

So, always after that, wherever Rodolph went, he heard voices that told him of the king; yes, even in their quiet, humble way, the flowers seemed to whisper the king's name, and every breeze that fanned his brow had a tale to tell of the king and his goodness.

"But there is no king!" cried Rodolph. "They all conspire to plague me. There is no king—there is no king."

Once he stood by the sea and saw a mighty ship go sailing by. The waves plashed on the shore and told stories to the pebbles and the sands. Rodolph heard their thousand voices and he heard them telling of the king.

Then a great storm came upon the sea—a tempest such as never before had been seen. The waves dashed mountains high, and overwhelmed the ship, and the giant voices of the winds and waves cried of the king, the king! The sailors strove in agony till all seemed lost. Then, when they could do no more, they stretched out their hands and called upon the king to save them—the king, the king, the king!

Rodolph saw the tempest subside. The angry winds were lulled, and the mountain waves sank into sleep, and the ship came safely into port. Then the sailors sang a hymn of praise, and the hymn was of the king and to the king.

"But there is no king!" cried Rodolph. "It is a lie—there is no king!"

Yet everywhere he went he heard always of the king—the king's name and the king's praises were on every tongue; aye, and the things that had no voices seemed to wear the king's name written upon them, until Rodolph neither saw nor heard anything that did not mind him of the king.

Then in great anger Rodolph said: "I will go to the mountain tops; there I shall find no birds, nor trees, nor brooks, nor flowers, to prate of a monarch no one has ever seen. There shall there be no sea to vex me with its murmurings, nor any human voice to dispute me with its superstitions."

So Rodolph went to the mountains, and he scaled the loftiest pinnacle, hoping that there at last he might hear no more of that king whom none had ever seen. And, as he stood upon the pinnacle, what a mighty panorama was spread before him, and what a mighty anthem swelled upon his ears! The peopled plains, with their songs and murmurings, lay far below; on every side the mountain peaks loomed up in snowy grandeur, and overhead he saw the sky, blue, cold, and cloudless, from horizon to horizon.

What voice was that which spoke in Rodolph's bosom then as Rodolph's eyes beheld this revelation?

"There is a king!" said the voice. "The king livs, and this is his abiding-place!"

And how did Rodolph's heart stand still when he felt Silence proclaim the king—not in tones of thunder, as the tempest had proclaimed, nor in the singing voices of the birds and brooks, but so swiftly, so surely, so grandly, that Rodolph's soul was filled with awe ineffable.

Then Rodolph cried: "There is a king and I acklowledge him. Henceforth my voice shall swell the songs of all in earth and air and sea that know and praise his name!"

So Rodolph went to his home. He heard the cricket singing of the king—yes, and the sparrows under the eaves, the thrush in the hedge, the doves in the elms, and the brook, too, all singing of the king; and Rodolph's heart was gladdened by their music. And all the earth and the things of the earth seemed more beautiful to Rodolph now that he believed in the king, and to the song all nature sang to the king Rodolph's voice and Rodolph's heart made harmonious response.

"There is a king, my child," said Rodolph to his little one. "Together let us sing to him, for he is our king, and his goodness abideth forever and forever."

We hav seen no instance where an editor "gave himself away," as the rude boys say, so completely as the News man. The story is printed under the department heading of "Sharps and Flats"—sharp writer and flat editor?—and is of a piece with the dull reasoning used by the book reviewer. Miss Gardener would hav no difficulty in classifying this specimen. He would come in the class "which includes all religionists below the order of the priesthood."

Miss Gibson's Compliments.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

I will only say your illustrations are immense. No one need be told it who sees THE TRUTH SEEKER.

To John E. Remsburg:

Permit me to thank you for the receipt of a copy of your "Sabbath-Breaking." Just now, when legal enactments against the violation of Sunday laws are being agitated as scarcely ever before, your book is a beacon light to those not conversant with the facts it reveals. Perhaps the most valuable and important portion of the whole work, among all its good things, is the proof that the Christians Sunday is not the Hebrew Sabbath of old, and is unauthorized by Jesus and his immediate followers. Trusting it will hav an immense circulation, and be productiv of the good you anticipate, I am with you for the abolition of the authority and legality of the Christian Sabbath.

To William Henry Burr:

Posterity will thank you for "The Sonnets." My opinion is of no value in deciding the merits of the question whether Shakspere or Bacon wrote "The Sonnets," and I only hope to call attention to your work because it is your work—where depth of thought, critical acumen, correct analysis, and historical accuracy are always found; hoping thereby to increase its circulation and usefulness and gladden the heart of its author. Yours truly, ELLA E. GIBSON.

A Book Advocating Associate Life as a Remedy for Poverty, Vice, and Crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

TRAVELS IN FAITH

From Tradition to Reason.

News of the Week.

THE Grant monument fund is almost at a standstill. The total is not quite $115,000.

ONE of New York's policemen and an ex-policeman hav just been convicted of highway robbery.

A LARGE subscription has been raised for the widow of General Hancock, who died on the 9th. A bill is before Congress to giv her $5,000 a year pension.

THE British Parliament reassembled on the 18th. Mr. Gladstone announced that the question of home rule for Ireland would not come up until late in March.

WORKMEN are repairing Cyrus W. Field's monument to the spy André, at Tappan, N. Y. It is said that the stone will be reset, and the present inscription effaced.

YSEULT DUDLEY, the young Englishwoman who fired upon Dynamiter O'Donovan Rossa, and who was committed to the Middleton Insane Asylum, now desires liberty. She claims to be no longer insane.

ON Wednesday of last week some fishermen found a body floating in the river. It proved to be that of the Rev. Jesse Brady, of Nortonville, Ky., who while intoxicated had either fallen or thrown himself into the water.

MAJOR FEGLEY, of the Salvation Army at Wellesville, N. Y., got a divorce from his wife and married a little girl thirteen years old, whom he had converted. The people of the town got a rope and followed the warrior to Corning with the determination to lynch him. He was not caught.

THE Rev. Mr. Dyson, a Wesleyan preacher, of London, has been committed for trial on the charge of murder. A woman named Bartlett is implicated with him, her husband being the victim. It is alleged that the minister assisted in making away with the husband that he might possess the wife.

THE question of suffrage for the women of Rhode Island has long been urged by the female citizens of that state. Recently the matter was referred to a committee. Dr. Mary Walker, the lady who dresses in male attire, addressed this committee last week. She was attired in a black coat, trousers, and cravat, with a high collar.

THE Rev. Messrs. F. B. and F. F. Converse, editors of the St. Louis Christian Observer, are accused by their brother-clergymen of having lied, wickedly and wilfully, in many particulars and at sundry times. They are also charged with slandering divers church-members and religious bodies through the columns of their paper.

DR. KING, of the Hudson county, N. J., luhatic asylum, reports that he recently tried the experiment of putting two violently insane men in one cell, giving each the impression that it was his duty to watch the other. The lunatics accepted the scheme, and at the end of two months each reported that the other was cured, which was true, and both were discharged.

A YOUNG man, named Peter McCormick, sat at the bar in the General Sessions in this city, one day last week, incessantly praying and blessing all around him. He was accused of stealing a sealskin sack. Two doctors testified that he was religious to the point of insanity, and was not responsible for his acts. Still praying and blessing everybody, young McCormick was placed in the lunatic asylum.

JOHN B. GOUGH died at Philadelphia on Thursday of last week. He had shortly before sustained a stroke of paralysis, from which he failed to rally. Gough was born in England in 1817, and was therefore sixty-nine years of age. He was at all times an orthodox Christian, and an able orator when sober. He did much for the cause of temperance, both as an advocate and as a terrible example. In this dual role he made money, and died quite wealthy.

IT is reported that Bismarck will yield entirely to the demands of the pope in the settlement of the religious dispute that has been waged between Prussia and the papacy for many years. A bill is to be passed in the Prussian legislature providing that students for the Catholic priesthood shall be admitted to the royal college free of charge, and shall be supported by the state during the collegiate course. Thus the government of Germany bids fair to become a spiritual as well as political despotism. Between Bismarck and the pope it will be a good country to get out of.

Odds and Ends.

PHYSIC beats the faith cure, because it has the inside track.

"GET up, Mr. Muldoon; the shanty's on fire, an' the roof'll fall in on yez!" "Never fear, Mrs. O'Hara; it's mesilf that's insured ag'inst accidents."

A STREET-CAR, with the men sitting down and the women standing up, and the straw on the floor, reminds one of the pig-sty.

IN the present style of shirt-collar, a young man of fashion may be safely trusted in the gilded halls of pleasure. An entire corps de ballet could not turn his head.

PROGRESSIV jack-straws is slowly but surely supplanting eucher among the elite. Progressiv Simon-says-thumbs-up will probably be the next fireside vagary.

AN Eastern professor is lecturing upon "The Forgotten Man." It is not stated whether he refers to Adirondack Murray, of Boston, or Rutherford B. Hayes, of Fremont.

VILLAGE Doctor: "Well, Blundy, how did you vote, after all?" Rustic: : "Well, sir, I promised the Blews, but the Yallers got hold of my missus, and I says, 'Yes.' So, when I went to the bewth, and they givs me my ballot-paper, 'Conscience forever!' says I to myself, goes into the box, shuts my eyes, and makes a big cross, promisc'ous—and Lord knows how I voted."—Punch.

"MY dear friend," said a long-haired countryman to the biographical expounder of a dime museum, "is that unfortunate being really a cannibal?" and he indicated a South Sea islander from Cork, who was sitting on a divan. "Yes, sir, that great living curiosity was captured while in the act of roasting a Presbyterian missionary over a slow fire." "Great heavens!" gasped the countryman, "can't you convert him?" "Convert him!" said the biographer, with disgust. "Do you s'pose the great American public would pay ten cents to see a Christian?"

THE ROMANCE OF A WATCH.

One day his father said to John:
"Come here and see what I hav bought—
A Waterbury watch, my son—
It is the boon you long hav sought."

The boy could scarce believe his eyes—
The watch was shiny, smooth, and slick—
He snatched the nickel-plated prize,
An' wound away to hear it tick.

He wound, an' wound, an' wound, an' wound,
An' kept a windin' fit to kill—
The weeks an' months, an' years rolled round,
But John he kep' a windin' still!

As autumns came, an' winters went,
An' summer follered arter spring,
John didn't mind—he was intent
On windin' up that darned ole thing.

He's got to be a poor old man—
He's bald, an' deaf, an' blind, an' lame—
But, like he did when he began,
He keeps on windin' jess the same.

Gems of Thought.

THEY might as well own the air and sell it by the gallon as to make a poor tenant giv all he can possibly produce for the privilege of eking out a wretched existence.—D. M. Bennett.

To the shocks which popular religion is receiving from all sides another will soon be added by the appearance of the revised translation of the Bible. The revisers hav, no doubt, executed their task in the most conservativ spirit; still some familiar and cherished texts, such as that of the Three Witnesses (1 John v, 7), and the passage in Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," must unquestionably disappear, and there will be enough generally of verbal change to disturb the minds of those who hav not only believed in verbal inspiration, but practically in the verbal inspiration of the authorized English version.—Bystander.

THE Bible cannot really teach us the age of the world or of mankind, and people who are determined to make it do so only get laughed at by those who understand the subject for being so prejudiced as to rely upon such erroneous statements. For geology and astronomy teach us that the universe must, at any rate, be hundreds of millions of years old, and that even our earth counts its centuries by the thousand already, and that though the historical researches which hav brought to light the remains of the cave-dwellings, the tombs of the age of stone, and the inscriptions of the Egyptian monuments, giv us no certain information as to the antiquity of the human race, yet they make us smile at the figure, 6,000, for before this a date a flourishing kingdom certainly existed in Egypt. Even the statue of the Egyptian king Chephren, that was to be seen at the last international exhibition at Paris, was hewn about forty centuries before our era.—Bible for Learners.

WHEN thou findest a lie that is oppressing thee, extinguish it. Lies exist only to be extinguished; they wait and cry earnestly for extinction.—Carlyle.

Some books are lies frae end to end,
And some great lies were never penned;
E'en ministers, they hae been kenned
In holy rapture
A rousing whid (fib) at times to vend
Wi' faith, and hope, and love, and drink,
And nail't wi' scripture.—Burns.

IN the name of religion, Sir Thomas More, the ablest head of his time, will believe a bit of bread becomes the Almighty God, when a lewd priest but mumbles his juggling Latin and lifts up his hands. In our own day heads as able as More's believe doctrins quite as absurd, because taught as religion and God's command. In its behalf the foolishest teaching becomes acceptable; the foulest doctrins, the grossest conduct, crimes that, like the fabled banquets of Thyaster, might make the sun sicken at the sight, and turn back affrighted in his course—these things are counted as beautiful, superior to reason, acceptable to God.—Theodore Parker.

In statesmen then,
And patriots fertil. Thine a steady More,
Who, with a generous though mistaken zeal,
Withstood a brutal tyrant's useful rage,
Like Cato, firm; like Aristides, just;
Like rigid Cincinnatus, nobly poor;
A dauntless soul erect, who smiled on death.
—Thomson's Seasons.

THE very idea of a God as creating or in any way ruling the world is utterly absent in the Buddhist system. God is not so much denied as he is simply not known. Contrary to the opinion, once confidently and generally held, that a nation of Atheists never existed, it is no longer to be disputed that the numerous Buddhist nations are essentially Atheists, for they know no beings with greater supernatural powers than any man is supposed capable of attaining to by virtue, austerity, and science, and a remarkable indication of this startling fact is to be seen in the circumstance that some, at least, of the Buddhist nations—the Chinese, Mongols, and Thibetans—hav no word in their language to express the notion of God.—Chamber's's Encyclopedia.

When the fish swims out of the water,
When the bird soars out of the blue,
Man's thought may transcend man's knowledge,
And your God be no reflex of you.
—The Hindoo Skeptic.

BELIEF is not a matter of will, it is a matter of evidence. If evidence enough supports an assertion, we must believe it, while, if the evidence be insufficient, we must doubt it. Belief is neither a virtue nor a vice; it is simply the consequence of sufficient evidence. Theological belief is demanded on insufficient evidence. Such belief is called, theologically, "faith," but in ordinary matters it would be called "credulity." . . . It can never be a "duty" to believe; if the evidence of a fact be convincing, belief in that fact naturally follows, and non-belief would be very stupid; but the word "duty" is out of place in connection with belief.—Mrs. Annie Besant.

IF, instead of the "glad tidings" that there exists a being in whom all the excellences which the highest human mind can conceive exist in a degree inconceivable to us, I am informed that the world is ruled by a being whose attributes are infinit, but what they are we cannot learn, nor what are the principles of his government, except that "the highest human morality which we are capable of conceiving" does not sanction them; convince me of it, and I will bear my fate as I may. But when I am told that I must believe this and at the same time call this being by the names which express and affirm the highest human morality, I say in plain terms that I will not. Whatever power such a being may hav over me, there is one thing which he shall not do—he shall not compe me to worship him. I will call no being good who is not what I mean when I apply the epithet to my fellow-creatures, and if such a being can sentence me to hell for not so calling him, to hell I will go. —J. S. Mill.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 13. No. 10. PUBLISHED WEEKLY. New York, Saturday, March 6, 1886. 33 CLINTON PLACE. $3.00 per year.

A CLERICAL SURPRISE PARTY.

And it came to pass that the scripture was fulfilled which was spoken in Revelation the twenty-first chapter and eighth verse.

Notes and Clippings.

A DISPATCH from Vienna, Austria, says: "Experts declare that there are autograph letters of Mohammed among the papyri acquired in Egypt by Archduke Renier."

THE Rev. Mr. Bosworth, of Boston, says that he knows of ten Baptist ministers around the city who are as bad as the Rev. Mr. Downs. One of them is the father of an illegitimate child.

A MAN was placed in the county poorhouse at Scottsborough, Ala., lately, who has one son an eminent Presbyterian divine and president of a college, and another a doctor of dentistry in Texas.

A CLERGYMAN of Stonington, Conn., who has been compelled to saw and chop wood, ring the bell, and build the church fires all winter, in addition to performing his clerical duties, threatens to resign unless the work is lightened.

THE Rev. Thomas K. Beecher has been nominated for mayor by the Republicans of Elmira, N. Y. As long as the priests and ministers run this country any way, perhaps it is as well to elect them to office, so that they can do it in the manner prescribed by law.

AN old case was decided at the recent term of court at Newberry, South Carolina. It was a suit for the payment of a note given for the purchase of a negro in 1859. The note with interest amounted to about $1,900. The jury gave a verdict for about $900, and on the jury hearing the case there was one negro.

DAILY papers, says an exchange, record with satisfaction that the principal Chinese gamblers went on their New Year's Day in carriages to call on their Sunday-school teachers.

THE Brooklyn police say "costumes and scenery render Sunday concerts illegal." Churches parading Chinamen will take notice.—John Swinton. How about the Episcopal service, with its uniformed rector and choir, and the Catholic mummery, with costumed priests and other harlequins on the stage?

THE pallium from the pope to Archbishop Corrigan, the new American cardinal, is on the way hither from Rome. The pallium is a cloak which the pope sometimes bestows on dignitaries of the church. If Archbishop Corrigan's friends in Ireland could see him when he gets on the pallium and red hat, they would say this is a great country.

THREE churches, one in New York, one in Brooklyn, and one in Yonkers, were damaged $40,000 by fire last Sunday. All were insured, so that the tax-payers who furnished half a dozen fire-engins and a few hundred men to fight the flames were the only unremunerated losers. The churches, of course, expected this protection the same as if they had not been dodging their taxes for years.

THE president of the Guatemalan republic has issued a decree to the effect that, although the government is bound to foster immigration for the promotion of science, arts, and industries in the country, it is equally bound to impede the ingress into the republic of persons who constitute a pernicious element, which proves an obstacle to the advancement of liberty and progress. The decree then alludes to the Roman Catholic priests belonging to other nationalities who breed discord in the republic and create opposition to the government, and orders that such priests shall, on the discovery of their designs, be expelled from the country. The date of this decree is Jan. 6, 1886.

THERE is a controversy over the religious services held on Sundays in the New Jersey Reform School at Jamesburg. The trustees hav made a report in which, according to a Trenton despatch, they declare that "they try to put the children under the care of a minister of the faith of the parents, if they had any." There must be, comments the Sun, some extraordinarily unfortunate children in New Jersey.

AN unrepealed law of New Jersey, passed while the state was a British colony, reads as follows: "That all women of whatever age, rank, profession or degree, whether virgins, maids, or widows, who shall after this act impose upon, seduce, or betray into matrimony any of his majesty's subjects by virtue of scents, cosmetics, washes, paints, artificial teeth, false hair, or high-heeled shoes, shall incur the penalty of the law now in force against witchcraft and like misdemeanors."

RECENTLY Colonel Ingersoll was in Indianapolis. A newspaper correspondent says he interviewed him upon politics, and obtained the opinion that Mr. Ingersoll did not believe Cleveland would be renominated, for before the next presidential election he would manage to lose the support of both wings of his party. The Republicans, Mr. Ingersoll thought, would be successful in 1888, and when asked who his presidential candidate would be, he added: "A new man, one not identified with the old quarrels and mistakes; one who believes in the present and future; one who knows that the war is over with the South, but that it is still raging with ignorance, injustice, and prejudice; one who believes in larger liberty for the human race."

THE Montreal Post relates the following: "In the police court yesterday, when Mr. MacGillivray was called, he objected to be sworn, as an oath was not binding upon him any more than his word. Judge Dugas—Do you believe in God? Mr. MacGillivray—I neither believe or disbelieve. Judge Dugas—Do you believe in a future state? Mr. MacGillivray—How can I believe in anything of which there is no proof? Judge Dugas—Do you make this declaration to prevent your being sworn? Mr. MacGillivray—I hav held these views for years. Judge Dugas—Do you believe in a future life? Mr. MacGillivray—I don't know anything about it. Judge Dugas—Do you mean to say that you hav no faith in the doctrin of a God and a future life? Mr. MacGillivray—I don't know anything about it. Judge Dugas—That is no answer. Mr. MacGillivray—There are two hundred and twenty-three doctrins; which do you mean? Judge Dugas—I don't think you are sincere. You are beating about the bush. Mr. MacGillivray—I could not say anything else. Judge Dugas—I must hav a straightforward answer. Do you believe in a future life and a God? There is no question of sect or doctrin in that question. Mr. MacGillivray—I hav no faith in the doctrin which says there is a God and a future life. Mr. MacGillivray was then permitted to affirm.

An Examination of Church History.

BEING LETTERS TO A CATHOLIC.—VII.

FRIEND D. C.: I had fully intended my last letter to finish this, to me at least, disagreeable task, as the deeper I enter your mysteries the more I become disgusted with them; but, finding I hav not as yet utilized a fiftieth part of the notes I had made in anticipation of our controversy, I feel to use a few more of them, and will call your attention to some of your most popular superstitions, which hav been foisted on you by that unfortunate imbecil, Pio Nono.

In 1839 a letter written by Jesus was brought to his attention. Jesus appeared, it seems, to saints Bridget, Elizabeth, and Matilda, gave them a written account of his passion, the number of soldiers who attended him, and kicks, blows, and wounds they inflicted. He had lost exactly 38,430 drops of blood. Pio Nono, then only archbishop of Imola, granted an indulgence of one hundred days to every one who would hang up a copy in his house, and say certain prayers. But when he became pope, a little girl in St. Marcel, France, received another letter from Jesus, which differed in many essential points from the first, and he increased the blood-letting to 3,000,800 drops. Pio Nono kindly accepted this letter also, and bestowed on all who bought it a variety of indulgences, and the faithful were promised that it possessed miraculous powers. Of this I had a practical demonstration.

A few years ago I had occasion to call on a builder, an Irish Catholic, who was doing some work for me. I found the house in disorder, and when he came to the parlor, in answer to my inquiry, he informed me that his wife had been confined, and the doctor, who had been called in, at the solicitation of the mid-wife, declared her case hopeless. "But," said he, with a smiling face, "she will not die. Of that I am certain." In the course of conversation he informed me that he had brought from Dublin an authentic copy of a letter written by Jesus to St. Bridget; that it possessed miraculous powers; was blessed by the pope, and guaranteed a sure preventiv for death in child-bed. In answer to my request, I was shown a framed copy of the first letter above referred to. Well, the doctor's judgment proved correct, for the lady died. The widower now has more faith in medicin and good nursing than in the letter, though at one time he thought he might hav been the innocent cause of the non-operation of this miraculous power, as he had forgotten till too late that one of the conditions was that the holder should not be in a state of sin.

The holy coat of Jesus is another case in point. It was supposed to be one of the garments for which the soldiers cast lots. So great was the veneration for it that at one time no less than eleven were exhibited in various parts of Europe, each being duly vouched for, but the preponderance of testimony seemed to center on one which dated back to the time of Gregory, in 596. In 1514 Leo X. thought that so many coats for one who declared he had no place wherein to lay his head might make people think he had been in the old clo' business, investigated the claims of all and decided in favor of the one exhibited at the cathedral of Treves. For three hundred years ten old coats went sorrowing, and a rich widow in 1843 caused Gregory XVI. to declare that Leo had been mistaken, and the cathedral of Argenteuil was accredited with having the genuin article. As Leo XIII. has not yet been heard from, your cathedral may be the next possessor of that wonderful garment. Possibly that may be Capel's mission to this country.

In my article on Mexico, I referred to the fact of the Aztecs being fond of hearts and preserving skulls and bones in their temples, and intimated that possibly your church had amalgamated a part of these ceremenies with hers, and you speak bitterly of this, saying I had gone out of my way to offer a direct insult. When I wrote that particular item, I spoke on general principles, as I felt satisfied there was no belief or ceremony of your church that could not be traced to some pagan source, and your gentle hint reminded me that I had not given the matter as thorough an investigation as I should hav done. So I hav taken considerable trouble to look into the matter, and hasten to assure you that I retract and apologize to the Aztecs. They never could hav been guilty of such a senseless and degrading worship as that of the "Sacred Heart." I will giv you the result of my investigations.

In the latter part of the seventeenth century the Jesuits were being run out of every decent community, so they found it necessary to make a bold stroke. About 1672 one of their number, Father La Columbiere, found among his penitents a hysterical nun named Marguerite Marie Alacoque. This woman claimed Jesus to be her constant companion; that he assured her he had ascended to heaven with his corporeal body, which, with the exception of his heart, had become etherealized. He had kept his heart still sensuous and sensible, because, being the seat of the affections, he desired it might still continue its sympathy and retain its love for mankind. Jesus advised her to assure his friends, the Jesuits, he desired a special reverence and worship for his heart, and would commit the care of it to their particular protection.

The Jesuits worked the case for all it was worth, and for two centuries it was a theological foot-ball. When Pio Nono, whom even your writers admit having been their tool, I had almost written fool, ascended the papal throne he decreed on Aug. 23, 1846, the nun to be "heroic," and on Aug. 19, 1864, made her a saint, the Jesuits testifying to her miracles. But the order was not satisfied. They obtained in France twelve million of signatures to a petition, bound them in thirty handsome volumes, which were duly forwarded to the pope, and, in answer, on April 22, 1875, a decree was passed consecrating the universal Catholic church to the sacred heart. Each of these twelve million signers had promised his efforts to the extinction of heresy and restoration of the temporal power.

Schools had been started all over France in the name of this new worship, and the female branch of the order, under the same name, monopolized the teaching of the girls. The French army was flooded with their boys; from 1854 to 1874, the single school of St. Genevieve sent more than one thousand of its pupils to St. Cyr, the French West Point. On June 16, 1875, the thirtieth anniversary of Pio Nono, the second centenary of the sacred heart was celebrated. In Paris, thirty acres of valuable land, donated through the exertions of Mrs. Eugenie Napoleon, and on which the Jesuit church of Montmarte had been built, was dedicated to the new worship. Sly fellows, those Jesuits; they make everything pay. Notwithstanding all the promises of Jesus and his sacred heart, look at the order now? Driven out of France, deprived of their ill-gotten gains, and a reward on their heads.

Before giving you some quotations, let me attract your attention to the statistics of the French minister of public instruction for 1867: That in the country districts, sixty-seven per cent of the bridegrooms and ninety-eight per cent of the brides were unable to sign their names; and possibly as a lawyer, if not as a Catholic, you may question the genuinness of a half dozen of these signatures.

Now let us turn to the life of Saint Marguerite Marie Alacoque, by Bishop Languet: At the age of four years she was so virtuous that even "the sight of men wounded her modesty and alarmed her innocence." Fearing she might lose her virtue, she retired to a convent, and there was visited by Jesus, who made love to her and appointed a day for their betrothal. When the time arrived, now I use her words, "he made me understand that he wished me to taste all that was most sweet in the tender caresses of his love. In fact, these divine caresses were from this time forward so overpowering that they made me quite beside myself, and rendered me almost incapable of any physical exertion, and it was a subject of such strange embarrassment to me that I dared not show myself."

That Jesus was very much smitten with this nun is evident, for in order to bind her more closely to himself he caused her to write the following in her own blood: "I constitute thee heir of my heart for time and for eternity, permitting thee to make use of it according to thy desire. I promis thee that thou shalt never lack succor until I lack power. Thou shalt be forever the beloved disciple, the plaything of my heart's good pleasure, the holocaust of its love. That alone shall be the object of all my desires. It shall repair and supply all thy deficiencies, and acquit thee of all thy obligations." O Beecher! Beecher! where is thy nest-hiding letter now?

Of course, a Jesuit could not write these lines without bringing in the Virgin, and I find the "queen of heaven" taking pity on her daughter-in-law, and one day while the nun was fatigued after a long interview with her son she came in and swept the dormitory for her, but mother-in-like gave her two slaps over the face for her laziness.

But Jesus turned out a very faithless lover after all, and, seemingly forgetful of the agreement in blood, came to her one day and "showed her his divine heart under the symbol of a glowing furnace; but she saw also two other hearts, which were about to unite there and lose themselvs in it, and he then said: "It is thus that my holy love unites these three holy hearts forever." Two of the hearts were those of Father La Columbiere and herself. When she told the priest of this "he was much confused by it."

I might go on and quote column after column, but I question if even a sporting paper would dare to publish the amorous scenes that take place between the lovers. Lest you may think that, as an Infidel, I am drawing on my imagination, and trying to injure your church, I will quote the opinion of one of your own people, De Caylus, Bishop of Auxerre.

"The life of Marie Alacoque," says he, "is undoubtedly, in all respects, one of the worst books of its class that has ever appeared; it is revolting to everyone, whether in the church or out of it. It has roused the indignation and horror of good men. Libertins hav made it the subject of raillery. I do not think it becoming even to speak of the amorous dialogs which are supposed to pass between Jesus Christ and Mary Alacoque. Everywhere Jesus Christ employs the language of human passion to declare his love for Mary. I am far from believing that such forms of speech—as sensual as they are indecent—may not mislead many souls," etc.

Here you hav the foundation of your latest form of worship, and if you can gather any consolation from it you are heartily welcome. I agree with your bishop, that the book is a disgrace to our civilization, and should be suppressed, and will add, the worship also. I hope you will no longer wonder at my apology to the Aztecs for having intimated that they were connected, even in the remotest degree, with your "Sacred Heart." The very name of the nun, A-la-coque, shows that it is nothing more than phallic worship thinly disguised under a sugar-coated Jesuit pill, and possibly inspired by some frequenter of the Jardin Mabille.

By the kindness of Mr. J. W. Corfield, who will be known to many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as one of a very earnest band of reformers, I am permitted to forward to you two copies of letters which may possibly be interesting to your readers by reason of the work and suffering undergone in the cause of truth by the men who wrote under such conditions that the answer to one letter is interlined with the original communication.

These two letters hav never yet been published, and to add, if possible, to the interest, I hav copied them so that the copies are line for line, and page for page, the same as the originals, except that in the originals the paper is written on both sides. I hav copied the reply from Taylor to Carlile in red ink, and would like to suggest that should you print these, it would be worth the little extra trouble to print the interlineations in a different type from the body, say in italic.

One thing noticeable in Carlile's letter is the charming frankness with which he addresses Taylor. I suppose the varied and lengthened prison experience of Carlile was some warrant for this outspokenness, but at this period, when both men to us seem equally important, it does appear somewhat extreme to read, "You hav done many things most unwisely, and scarcely anything in reason."

The tone of the whole of Carlile's letter is somewhat that of a man very much the elder writing to a young and new disciple who has got into trouble through the teachings of the elder. Taylor's reply adds to this feeling. "You hav, and it is well for you that you hav, better friends than Robert Taylor," says Carlile. And then Taylor naïvely admits, "I don't like him so well as I did myself."

Seeing that Taylor was six years the elder, and that both were in prison, it to-day reads rather droll that "your dignity is theatrical," "your letter was an outrage," when the writer was in prison on much the same sort of charge, and undertaking to cheer the other prisoner.

This letter throws a side-light on the matter of prison disciplin somewhat interesting. I do not know how matters are arranged in America, but I think there is much more freedom allowed to prisoners there than in England, generally. I think Mr. Bennett had much more chance for reading and writing, especially writing, than was allowed to the editor of the Freethinker, who in his published record of his prison life mentions that he was supplied with paper with very wide ruling, and to write between the ruling was prohibited; he evaded the intention of the rule to some extent by writing with almost microscopic fineness. A feature of prison life of the time of Carlile was an extreme of punishment, cruelty, and horrible general vindictivness on the part of the authorities, balanced to some extent by considerable liberty of action; this is shown by what Carlile says as to what he will or will not do, or allow to be done to him, and the suggestion as to food. Readers of Linton's memoirs of James Watson may remember that his wife lived with him in prison during part of his term.

It is one of the most approved humbugs for the Grundyites of to-day to assert that in England all are equal before the law, and that if a man is criminal enough to warrant imprisonment he is served no better and no worse than any other criminal. We hav had during the last few months two instances to giv the lie to this claim—one, Mr. Yates, editor of the World, condemned for libel; and the other, Mr. Stead, of the Pall Mall Gazette. The treatment accorded to these men, backed as they are by wealth and religion, reads very well with that accorded to the so-called blasphemer.

But in spite of all the liberty or license of old-time jails, perhaps because of it, there is a very serious meaning, a suggestion of terrible possibilities, in Carlile's charge against self-murder. He knew by his bitter experience at Dorchester, to which he refers, the horrors to be undergone; that a prisoner should commit suicide was for the authorities often the best thing which could happen, and without doubt means were taken to that end at times.

The letter was written on a sheet of full-sized foolscap, and, as usual at the time, was so folded as to form its own cover. Carlile's postscript, therefore, is on the same page as the indorsement or address. In case American readers may not be well up in the history of domestic developments I may explain that the "Jones's Prometheus" referred to were simply lucifer matches, and so the motto was very happy, and doubtless the lucifers were acceptable.

All that is written in red is written by Taylor. This is shown by the handwriting and the color of the ink, which is very different from Carlile's and from the ink used by him. I mention this again, as it may be noticed that the initials "R. T." are put to some places and not to others, as the five lines on the last page. This is as in the original.

I hav taken so much space to Carlile and Taylor that I am almost afraid to begin on the Taylor-Watson letter. Perhaps a few remarks may be permitted in view of the similarity of the position of affairs then and now.

As to petitions, I am a very firm believer in the idleness of them without the other half, the argument. For over five years petition upon petition and resolutions in heaps were used to insist on the plain constitutional right that Northampton has to two members. Mr. Bradlaugh has taken his seat; but, as a crown advocate once said of a political prisoner who was acquitted upon trial after a long imprisonment, "although you acquit him, God himself can't undo what he has suffered." During the years of this fight, besides the worry and wear caused to Mr. Bradlaugh and his immediate workers, opportunity has been taken by the rogues in power to do things, illegally in many cases, for which generations yet unborn will hav to suffer and pay. Ireland stands a chance of some measures of speedy justice but very much because of the enlarged scope of the arguments used.

Hetherington's "metaphysical warp" is seen in too many of to-day's workers against bigotry, and that, added to the indifference which Taylor speaks out against, is as much of a curse to-day as then. Are not some of the American people just a little sorry for allowing by carelessness the passing of the last set of Blue Laws? And is it not very much easier to prevent a restriction of a right or liberty than to regain it when once curtailed? What Taylor says as to pulling together and the want of it should be carefully taken into consideration by Freethinkers and Liberals all over the world. We can all of us call to mind recent proofs that there are a number yet who act as if they really would rather sink the ship than sail together. In spite of all the work of men such as these now being written about, and all the advances made since their time, there is from time to time plenty of evidence afforded to prove that the bigot of to-day has all the will to go in for all the old methods, even the Iron Virgin of Nuremberg; they only lack the power, to gain which "they lie, they perjure, they trick and catch." We should constantly bear in mind that unless we hang together we hav a very great chance of hanging separately.

Having just seen the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1866, I take leave to draw special attention to the last paragraph of James Parton's note on Voltaire, as it has much bearing on this matter of pulling together and on views which are sometimes expressed in criticism of Carlile and the older reformers.

It may not be possible for the workers and writers of the new generation to feel the same amount of veneration for past workers as do the few, very few, who worked with them. You will see by the pamphlet and circular inclosed how Mr. Corfield recently expressed his respect to the men I refer to, and with all of whom, excepting, of course, John Bellers, 1696, and Thomas Spence, he worked and was more or less intimate. Some may think such an expression extreme. I submit it is a better extreme than the extreme of fault-finding which is sometimes given vent to by writers who charge Carlile and his colleagues with coarseness and violent language. He and they "took the course that then seemed best," and I will go further, and say, as Ruskin says: "You will find in the end that no man could hav done it but exactly the man who did it" ("Queen of the Air"). This may be worth the attention of some captious critics. THOMAS SHORE, JR.

CARLILE TO TAYLOR.

GILTSPUR STREET COMPTER, July 27, [1832?]

The glorious 27th! Drink to it, if it be in water!

DEAR SIR: I hav received your bulletin of yesterday this morning. It is absolutely necessary that you should put yourself, and allow your friends to put you, under a disciplin. Let me proclaim that you will not see a friend until you can see a friend, as I can see a friend, for free ingress and conversation, in your jail apartment. [*Yes! yes! R. T.] This should hav been determined at first, which would hav most certainly been my determination. [Why not mention this before? R. T.] My view of your struggle in jail is that you hav done many things most unwisely, and scarcely anything in reason according with the necessities of your situation. [Well, forgiv me! R. T.] I will begin with granting one thing, and that is, that I had not conceived an idea of the existence of such an atrocious set of magisterial villains as hav you in their clutches. [Nor I either. R. T.] I thought that I had met the worst in England in Dorsetshire, but I forget their crimes toward me when I contemplate those of the Surrey magistrates toward you. I fear there is a mischief brewing for you [And so do I. R. T.] of which you do not dream. [I hav good nights, and don't dream of anything. R. T.] I do not rest on my own surmises so much as on the relation of the town whispers to this new regulation. I cannot say more at present than that we hav a formidable preparation for it. You hav, and it is well for you that you hav, better friends than Robert Taylor. [I don't like him so well as I did myself. R. T.]

For my part, I hav determined that I will never partake of an indignity offered me. I would neither hav seen a friend at the iron gratings nor at the palisadings. I would hav waited silently and patiently until there had been a barricade, at which I could hav seen and shaken hands with a friend. [What do you mean by "barricade?" R. T.]

Retire to your cell. [I will. R. T.] Get in what books you can. Write to me by post as much as you please, and what you please. Only begin again to number the letters, and pray keep the numbers by you for reference in your journal, that there may be no doubt if a number be missing. Liv as well as you can in food, and take what exercise your mind can bear under such restraint. [I woefully want air. R. T.] I think you will do well not to write to any person but to me [I will not. R. T.] unless it be in the shape of common civilities to your friends. Your two letters to Lord Melbourne do you no credit. The first was a silly effusion, the second absolutely an outrage. I fear your admirers will never be able to elect you to be a general or a statesman. You must alter very much ever to hav my vote for either appointment. [I will get your vote, and deserve it too! R. T.] Your warfare is truly of the church militant order. It is not precisely what we want in this "age of reason." Your dignity is theatrical, and confined to the stage with an applauding audience. Hav mercy upon your friends, and save them the means of saving you. [I will! I will! I will! R. T.] If you will be silent toward every person but me, I will undertake to cheer you in your dungeon. [Agreed. Agreed. Upon my promis, agreed. R. T.]

I want—particularly, especially, want—the journal for which I wrote, and which you promised me on Saturday. [Here it is.] As matters now stand, I would hav you sketch and send me daily a copy of your journal. Otherwise, what you write in Horsemonger Lane jail may be burnt in Horsemonger Lane jail. What you send to me is preserved in publicity, if it reach me. The want of this journal from you has spoiled my letter to Lord Melbourne this week, unless I succeed in getting it to-day. [This letter had been opened and read before delivered to me.]

I will send you my exposure of Freemasonry. Study it, that is, get it by heart. [No, I won't.] It may appear nonsense, but if you do get it by heart you will turn it to good account. You were deficient in your lectures of a knowledge of modern Masonry. [Deficient only of knowledge not worth acquiring.]

I send off this as soon as Thomas comes. If it reach you in time he may wait for an answer.

When you say "liberty is lost forever" if you are not brought out of that den, you mean, of course, your individual liberty. [I ought to hav meant so. R. T.] I cannot allow of that license of language which induces a man, one man, to think that all the world hinges on his fate. [No more can I. R. T.] If you die in jail, your death so brought about will but accelerate the general liberty of your survivors. [And welcome!] But be patient for a (damned) (not an "eternal") little while, and if you love, or as you love, the progressing welfare of the human race, I charge you not to kill yourself. [On my honor, my dear friend, I hav never a thought at any moment of such a folly. R. T.]

RICHARD CARLILE.

P.S.—It was a maxim of Cato's never to travel by water when the journey could be made by land. Our gracious king on Monday next is about to travel by water because he is afraid to travel by land. He shall hear the name of Taylor and Horsemonger Lane jail. [Mr. Watson brought me £1 14s., which had been collected at Windmill street. R. T.]

From Richard Carlile in the Giltspur Street Compter to the Rev. Robert Taylor in Horsemonger Lane Jail, with a box of Jones's Prometheus and 17s. 6d., change of a sovereign.

"Nascitur flammeus et moritur flammeus."

Admirable! There is a motto for you, Prometheus.

[Suppose I say I will see nobody but the servant, Thomas, as I hav no right to subject my friends to humiliation? Yet how am I to get things carried back and forward if I don't see Thomas?]

ROBERT TAYLOR TO JAMES WATSON.

DEAR MR. WATSON: As a fellow-prisoner and a fellow-sufferer with you in different departments of one and the self-same just, and great, and glorious cause, I should owe you the best expression of of my sympathies, even if I knew no more of you than what might be learned from the sheets of the best and most manly and philosophical work that has ever been devoted to the moral emancipation of the laboring classes—The Working Man's Friend. But its editor has been very especially my friend, and though my remembrances seem to me to be the most contemptible of any man alive, they are all that I am worth, and they shall be devoted to your service. You acted by me, Watson, in a peculiarly noble manner. I know more about it than it becomes me to speak of. It is index enough to say that you had been my friend, and that when I fell into trouble, then it was that you took your opportunity to feel and act by me as if that friendship had never for one moment been suspended. This was a nobility of soul which dukes and lords know nothing of. But you are a prisoner, my friend, and an oppressed and injured man, and I know the heart of a prisoner, and of such a prisoner, too sensibly and too smartingly to be capable of withholding the sweetness of a good-natured word when it is possible that I may hav it in my power to pour that healing balsam on his affiictions. So, my friend, you will know how to apply it; but not all the gums of the blest Araby are of such sanativ efficacy as to feel—as you shall hav a right to feel when you shall know—that the most virtuous and excellent individual of the whole human race, whose good opinion I know you value, as I do, more than life itself, spoke of you to me on Saturday last in the very highest terms in which you could wish to be spoken of, though not higher than I could and did reach up to, and affix my most heartfelt and grateful confirmation. You hav reason, then, to be able to outface the brow of bragging insolence, and to stand firm afoot before the detestable petty tyrants, who hav nothing about them that would not make as great and consequential a personage of any unhanged thief as of themselvs. Keep up your courage, Watson, for this reason—because you hav a right to be courageous.

Your petition against the banker Hoare was excellent, and most strikingly so, from its judicious and modest temperance. But I calculate that your experience has taught you, as mine has, to limit your expectations on petitioning to the effect of the exhibition merely of your wrongs, without a dream of probable redress. I want to find, if I can, a single instance (one out of the whole world's history) of a petition which was ever granted on the claim and merit of the petition merely. To my mind it seems that no petition ever was or will be successful but under the predicaments, either expressed or understood, of holding the petition in one hand, with a brickbat in the other, so that the scope of the argument may be utrum horium mavit.

I much admire your excellent plan of affixing such striking and beautiful quotations from Shelley, Southey, Otway, etc.; they indicate the man of taste, and, which is still a higher recommendation, the man of reading. You need not, I should suppose, confine yourself to the poets, nor make any scruple of repeating a quotation frequently when it may serve as an indication of the character of the matter of the number. The quotations seem to me to stand as guarantees for the diligence of the editor, as it really is, and I know the effect to be so; that something like a resentful disgust arises in the mind of a true lover of knowledge when he sees his attention challenged to the writings of one whose writings show at once that he has never been a reader.

This is fatal to the vapid compositions of some whose names you may guess at; who, although they do not profess to respect inspiration in others, act as if they believed they were inspired themselvs.

I was sorry to see that in your copy of the Sunday coercion bill, you omit the very first sentence of the preamble, which sentence happens to be the most pregnantly mischievous, and to admit of the heavier battery of such artillery as religionists themselvs would allow to be brought into play. Of the whole piece of stuff, Mr. Hetherington strikes hard and well, but not on the nail's head; there is, I know, a metaphysical warp and somethingness of the tabernacle about him that prevents the possibility of his putting in a hit at hypocrisy which would be likely to hurt it. It is all askew about "how does Sir Andrew Agnew know what the Lord's holy will is?" The line of impingence would hav come down vertically upon what might be fairly argued to be a blasphemous innuendo against the all-sufficient and only acceptable sacrifice of the death of K——t, whose sacrifice would afford no ground of faith and hope, if it be not more acceptable to God, and infinitly more than any true and sincere worship which his creatures could offer him. You see the use which might be made of the following out of this suggestion, and so, no more of it.

But, Watson, all my auguries assure me that the bill, hideous and horrible as it is, will pass, and pass by means of that very indifference and contempt which its monstrous character provokes. It irritates me out of all politeness when I hear the shallow noodles who know nothing of the machinations of priestcraft, content with snapping the finger, where they should clench the fist, and satisfied with crying out, "Oh, it never can pass! It's impossible! It's too absurd!" Ay, and the enemy wishes nothing more than this. By this indifference the duty of resistance will go begging, each one will put it off from himself, and the bill will pass while men sleep, to awaken too late to the reality of the horrors which they had deemed too improbable to be feared. And "Who'd hav thought it?" and "O my God!" will be the ejaculations of the thousands who shall see all the possible happiness of the poor man's existence crushed under the wheels of the Christian Juggernaut—no place to meet in for rational converse on his winter Sunday, no excursion into sweeter air in the summer. And then the suggestion of a repeal or modification of the act, after it shall hav once passed, will bring on a man such charges of Atheism, etc., etc., as there is not virtue enough in Mr. Hume, Roebuck, Cobbett, nor would be in Mr. Hetherington himself, to venture to encounter, so hypocrisy will triumph, and the aristocrats, not being inconvenienced themselvs, will neither feel nor care for the weight of the fetters on the working classes.

My experience has shown me that there is no wickedness too wicked, no villainy too villainous, to be resorted to by the religious fiends, our tyrants, for the sanctification of their tyranny over us. They lie, they perjure, they trick, they catch, and all with such an air of solemn gravity as paralyzes the power of resistance. But their power results from a principle which is fatally wanting among their opponents. They combine, they pull together, and are therefore omnipotent.

We must learn a little of this from them. The three individuals of the whole human race who hav most opposed this principle are, as it seems to me, Owen, Carlile, and Hetherington, who hav each seemed to act as if they would [rather] sink the ship than sail together. Your converse with Hetherington will, I hope, tend to cure his mind of that mischievous and vitiating principle of Hetheringtonism which givs an ugly cadence to every sentence he constructs, and warps him mightily from the rectitude which he propounds. If I should come out before you I shall make it one of my first duties to come and see you, as it will be one of my first pleasures to shake hands with a man whom your superior philosophy shall hav recovered from the sectarian littleness which lies like an incubus on his nobler nature.

I remain, dear Watson,

Yours with great respect, ROBERT TAYLOR,

Horsemonger Lane Jail, April 8, 1833, being the 644th day of my second martyrdom.

To Mr. James Watson, 33 Windmill street, or to be forwarded to him.

*These interpolations in brackets and italics are the replies of Taylor, written in different colored ink between the lines of Carlile's letter.

Mr. Pot's Contribution.

There is a little private poker club in Chicago, whose members, according to the Mail of that city, meet at each other's homes and play a modest game, winding up with a jack pot, which is "liberally sweetened" until it is of good proportions. On a recent Saturday evening the final jack pot grew until it contained $120, and before the betting it was decided that the winner should put it on the contribution plate at church next morning. It was won by a regular church-goer and rather liberal giver, who, fearing such a contribution would provoke comment, asked leave of the party to make it up in a package and hand it to the sexton. This was agreed to on condition that it was to be labeled, "From a j. pot." This was done. The sexton took it immediately to the pastor, who was so highly delighted that he announced from the pulpit that "a munificent friend of the church—a Mr. A. J. Pot—whom it was not his pleasure to know personally, he was sorry to say," had that morning sent in a most generous donation of $128 to the church fund.

The Liberal Club.

There were divine services at the 400th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. A large congregation was present, which speaks well for the religious enthusiasm of the members, as the weather was rough enough to justify anyone in staying at home and rubbing up against the stove. The papers Saturday morning reported that the wind had been blowing eighty-four miles an hour.

At eight o'clock, the door being left open, the Rev. Mr. Lloyd blew in. This was the speaker of the evening, his subject being "Immortality in the Light of Science." Mr. Wakeman introduced him as one of the watchmen on the walls of Zion, looking out for new and desirable truths. It was with great pleasure that the president presented Mr. Lloyd to the Liberal Club audience.

Mr. Lloyd is a Congregational minister who does regular preaching in a church in this city. He is also a member of the Nineteenth Century Club. He is a rather queer-looking duck, and his personal appearance gave small indication of the ability which he shortly developed. Mr. Lloyd prefaced his remarks by announcing his intention of obtaining a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was interested in the adventures of Jonah and the whale. Then he proceeded to say that he was earnestly and honestly trying to find the truth in regard to immortality. The greatest minds of every age hav monkeyed with the subject. Man has an inherent desire that this life should be continued in our next, and his personality is projected on the surface of his consciousness. Referring to Frederic Harrison, Mr. Lloyd said that Harrison had a conception of things equaled only by that of Christ himself. George Eliot's "Choir Invisible" also pleased Mr. Lloyd so much that he recited it in full. There was something of the hymn about the poem as the preacher gave it, but it was not by any means spoiled in the recitation. The "Choir Invisible" Mr. Lloyd considered infinitly nobler than the eternity of harp-playing looked forward to by some Christians. The speaker proceeded to say that he accepted evolution, which relieves God of responsibility for many things derogatory to his character. Perhaps somewhere in the evolutionary process life picks up the faculty of continuance. As for Mr. Lloyd, he believed in a soul and immortality. Science had not disproved it, and there was no reason why we should doubt it. And he further held that when he was dead, and one voice said, "Dust to dust, ashes to ashes," another voice would say, "Life to life, soul to soul, spirit to spirit."

The lecture was much like a sermon.

Mr. Wakeman brought the audience back to temporal affairs by saying that they should all buy a ticket for the coming month. Every one should come up to the help of the treasurer against the landlord, who was the great enemy. The floor was open for the discussion of the able lecture to which we had listened in speeches of ten minutes each.

Mr. Putnam thereupon arose and spoke for twenty minutes. He ran over the various points of the lecture, and blunted them somewhat. He said it was not the province of science to disprove immortality or anything else. There were two methods of procedure, either of which might be adopted in a discussion. One was the theological method, which starts out with an assumption, and proceeds to adapt the facts to the theory. The other was the scientific method, which begins with the facts, and formulates a theory in accordance with them. Mr. Lloyd had pursued the theological method. There might be a God and a future life, but the processes of evolution could furnish no evidence that such was the fact.

Mr. Langerfeld desired to thank the speaker of the evening for demonstrating that a man could be a preacher and still speak respectfully of the Positivists. It was not known before that such a thing was possible. Mr. Langerfeld then announced that he would indulge in a little criticism. He would remind Mr. Lloyd that this was not the Nineteenth Century Club, and that he need not therefore look for all the euphuisms which distinguished that society. If Mr. Langerfeld's criticism appeared rough, it must not, he said, be attributed to anything except a desire to be brief. The speaker then pointed out to the reverend gentleman the places where, in his estimation, the latter had dulled.

Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol made a modest little speech. She did not take the platform, but merely arose to express her appreciation of the lecture. Then Mrs. Bristol went on to say that she was brought up in the backwoods, but always believed in immortality. Reading a work by Herbert Spencer confirmed her in that belief, and she was somewhat surprised to find that others interpreted Mr. Spencer as a sordid believer in this world.

Prof. Van Buren Denslow, who has just joined the club, defined Mr. Lloyd's argument as a Christio-scientific one. Mr. Denslow said, touching the resurrection of Christ, that if Christ was a god-man his resurrection furnished no proof that we should rise again, as we are not god-men, and what was possible to him might be impossible to us. If he was not a god-man, then his value as a precedent would depend on the confidence we place in the account of his resurrection. The Christian heaven, with its harps and things, Mr. Denslow said, would make a man weary of paradise in less than two hours unless the players possessed great skill; and it would not take half the time to disgust him with the egotism of a supreme being who could endure continual adulation. The speaker recognized much in nature which he could not explain. For instance, what taught the cuckoo, which of itself is incapable of hatching its eggs, to lay them in the nests of fifty different birds, and always to match the other bird's eggs both in size and color? If the natural faculties of men should make them immortal, the superior faculties possessed by some lower animals should make them immortal also. He believed, with Von Hartmann, that there was an underlying and all-pervading something that made things as they are.

Mr. Brophy took up the lecturer's assertion that because science did not disprove immortality there was no reason to doubt it. He said this was equivalent to one man charging another with stealing a dog, and claiming that unless the accused should prove his innocence the jury would hav no excuse for acquitting him.

Brother King had attended the club that evening because some one told him it was a good time to be there, as everybody was to be presented by the lecturer with an immortal soul. He noticed that the critics seemed averse to accepting the gift. Mr. King explained that the reason Liberals objected to this dogma of immortality was because theologians had connected it with ethics and had taught that belief or disbelief in it was attended with dire and everlasting consequences. For the personal God and personal immortality the Liberals would substitute a social God and a social or corporate immortality. Mr. King did himself great credit.

At this time it was eleven o'clock, and the Rev. Mr. Lloyd was invited to administer to his critics the proper antidotes for the heresies they had imbibed. He first congratulated the club on the acquisition of so powerful a member as Mr. Denslow. Then he said that the previous speakers had been wandering on foreign ground. He had too much faith in the discriminating powers of the intelligent audience which he saw before him to believe for a moment that it would accredit his critics with having in any manner answered his arguments. Mr. Lloyd seemed to possess but little of the faith which was delivered to the saints. He spoke very irreverently of Jonah and alluded to Tertullian as a dead issue. A devout Christian Spiritualist could giv him a long start and get to heaven first, if reaching that locality depends in any degree on veneration for alleged sacred things.

At the next meeting the land question will be discussed by Mr. Washburn. Following him, John E. Remsburg addresses the club on some topic of interest not yet announced. Treasurer Morris will admit any one who pays him five cents. The meetings increase in value with each succeeding week. The club has now held 400 sessions, yet age does not wither it, nor custom stale its infinit variety.

Canadian Gossip.

Toronto has been favored during the past week with a visit (or visitation) from the celebrated Rev. Dr. Tiffany, of New York, who, by some means known only to himself, has discovered the objects, plans, and modus operandi of the Lord in regard to the world, its creation, and ultimate destiny of the inhabitants thereof, and is giving the whole scheme away to the wondering public.

Among other things, he tells us that "God is busily engaged in working out his grand idea, formed after the fall of man, of redeeming all mankind with great glory, which is a work of ages. He allowed four thousand years to elapse before he began the work of redemption, but he is calm and ever working, a heavenly calm, so to speak, and it will take ages to complete the work." In answer to the lying Infidel statement that Christianity is dying out he tells us that "in one hundred years, or from the eighteenth (1784) to the nineteenth century (1884) the number of Christians increased from two hundred to four hundred and ten millions." Great Scott! Again he says: "Christ will in his own good time subdue all that is evil—bad literature [I expect THE TRUTH SEEKER comes under that head], the Atheistic tendencies in science, disease, and finally death." So mote it be!

During the past year we hav had all the "big guns," Beecher, Talmage, Swing, and now Tiffany. They each know all about the divine plan, and they all hav it differently. One might think there are as many "divine plans" as there are preachers—"you pays your money and you takes your choice." But we hav a prophet of our own, Dr. Wild, who downs them all. According to the gospel of Wild, the world will be consumed by fire in the year 1935. They who are living at that time will be caught up into the clouds while the world's cremation is going on. There is something cheerful in this view of the matter. Some of us young heads may liv to see the grandest exhibition of celestial pyrotechnics that mortals ever gazed upon. Let us hope it will happen on the Fourth of July.

Among the celebrities who hav been here lately I forgot to mention the names of Matthew Arnold and Canon Farrar, although as Farrar's I can understand they can hardly be considered in the same boat with the others. We hav also the celebrated Rev. Dr. Sexton, of London, Eng., who is at present lecturing in the country. His special mission seems to be the annihilation of Infidels. He lectures this week in the town of Ayr, Ont., being brought there for the special purpose of counteracting the influence of the lectures delivered there a few weeks ago by Mr. Watts. Freethinkers are particularly invited to attend. In this case, however, Mr. Watts will probably hav the last say, as our president, Mr. Algie, has made arrangements for a couple more lectures by Mr. Watts in Ayr on his return to Canada. He is also trying to arrange lectures for Mr. Watts in Orangeville, Barrie, and other places, and while doing so has managed to get up a little excitement on his own account. He is engaged in a debate this week at the Science Hall, Alton, with a traveling preacher who hails from Dayton, O., the Rev. Mr. McKeown. You will probably get a report of the affair from headquarters in a few days. There is a rather amusing incident connected with this debate which the reverend gentleman tells. When he arrived in Alton he went into the bar of the hotel (thinking probably that that was the most likely place to find an Infidel) and inquired for Mr. Algie. He there encountered a slightly inebriated individual, who said: "'Scuse me —hic—minister of—hic—gospel, I 'spose?" "Yes." "What denomination?" "Baptist." "Well—hic—sorry. I'm a—hic—Presbyterian, I am. But—hic—don't yer go near them—hic—Algies. They're a bad lot—hic—and they don't—hic—know nothin'." The parson found Mr. Algie at his office, and after spending a few hours in "Liberty Hall" he gave it as his opinion that for "a bad lot" they were certainly the most comfortable and happy family he had met for a long time—an opinion in which all who hav enjoyed their generous hospitality will heartily concur.

The great moral wave which struck Toronto a few weeks ago is still booming. The police inspector has notified the cigar-store proprietors and all barber shops, including the hotel shops, to close on Sunday, and now the traveling public are informed that "no faces are shaved, and only souls are saved on Sunday." The customs authorities hav seized a consignment of Infidel books addressed to W. B. Cooke. The New York World and Police Gazette will not be allowed to come into this country any more. The bar rooms are to hav all screens removed, and clear glass fronts put in, so that the poor sinners must drink under the public gaze. This last idea emanates from the ministerial association. (Wonder how the same publicity would work in their business.)

The keepers of all houses of ill fame hav been notified to leave the city, and all convicts, as their terms of imprisonment expire, will be provided with passes to some more congenial clime. "Now, by St. Paul, the work goes bravely on," and the Bible is to be again read in the public schools. They hav been using a compilation of Bible selections for some time, but the school board voted at their last meeting to hav the "book" restored and "put into the hands of the pupils in all its purity." They poison the fountain while vainly trying to dam the flood.

Boonton Secular Union.

Through the zeal of Edwin Worman, the lifelong champion of Secularism, aided by the veteran Freethinker, John Maxfield, and the Booth family—ever united in every good work, adorning by their lives their profession of Secularism—Mrs. F. C. Reynolds and myself gave a brief course of lectures at this place, resulting in sixteen persons enrolling themselvs members of the Secular Union. Tuesday evening, the 23d, the first meeting was called at the Booth mansion. By-laws were adopted, a science school inaugurated, and the following excellent list of officers elected: President, Edwin Worman; vice-president, Mrs. A. M. Booth; secretary, Miss Florence Hennion; treasurer, Thomas Dennis; vigilance committee, Hubert Booth, John Maxfield, and Kate Booth; educational committee, Mrs. A. M. Booth, Thomas Dennis, Florence Hennion; social committee, Thomas Booth, Ada Booth, and Jessie Booth.

Subject of study for ensuing week and Sunday class: "The Nine Demands of Liberalism." Dues payable monthly in advance: Man and wife, 25 cents per month; unmarried men, 25 cents; unmarried women, 10 cents; minors, between twelve and sixteen, 5 cents. All paid dues for the month in advance, and the meeting adjourned with a vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds, and three times three cheers for the Boonton Secular Union.

The following givs a good account of frontier work:

OHLMAN, WYO., Feb. 22, 286.

S. P. PUTNAM, Dear Sir: We had a splendid turnout at our meeting yesterday, considering the number of people in our neighborhood and the bad roads, which are almost impassable for freighters this time of the year. A very good lecture was delivered by T. F. Hersey, at the conclusion of which he challenged any respectable and regularly ordained minister to debate on theological questions.

If we could arrange for a lecturer to come over this road we could probably organize an auxiliary society in Sheridan and Buffalo. There are good halls to be had in each place. I think we can build a hall of our own in Ohlman after a while. In the mean time we hav the use of a hall at Dayton four miles away free of charge. There is a good country about us, and there are many Liberals. We are one hundred miles from the Northern Pacific Railroad. I shall do the best I can to raise the means so that you can lecture for us on your return from Utah. Yours truly,

GUS HOGAN.

Another veteran has gone—William S. Bailey, of Nashville, Tenn., editor of the Liberal. I remember with pleasure my meeting him at Nashville in my work of last year. Although over eighty years of age, he was still an earnest and radical Freethinker, and was always ready to do his share of the labor. His life has been a long and eventful one. He has been a pioneer from youth to age, and in death he receives the honor of a brave and sincere reformer.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Edmund W. Mitchell.

Edmund W. Mitchell died at West Junius, N. Y., on Monday, Feb. 22d, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. He was born in Maine, and in early manhood came to West Junius, where for many years he has been a useful and honored citizen. He has held offices of public trust; has always been an ardent reformer, being especially interested in the Anti-slavery cause and the progress of Freethought. He has never concealed his Radical and Liberal convictions. He has been thoroughly respected in a Christian community, and no difference of opinion has lessened the popular acknowledgment of his integrity. His word was as good as his bond. In all the relations of business he had the confidence of his associates.

He leaves a wife and six children, who are in entire sympathy with his advanced ideas. His wife has been a most faithful companion in all his work for human welfare.

The funeral services were held in the old Quaker meeting-house at Waterloo, N. Y., about two miles from his home. This building was famous in the days of Antislavery conflict, and resounded with the voice of Garrison, Pillsbury, Foster, and other of those devoted adherents of liberty. Here for over a quarter of a century hav been held every June the yearly meetings of the Friends of Progress. Mr. Mitchell and Mr. Henry Bonnell, of Waterloo, and others hav been prominent supporters of these gatherings, wherein every variety of opinion has been expressed. From all the surrounding country the attendance was large, and these assemblies hav become quite a feature in the reform movement of western New York.

It was fitting to bid the last sad farewell to our friend in the place which he had helped to consecrate with his own fervent labors. There was a large number of friends and citizens present. The services were conducted by Samuel P. Putnam. He said:

To understand the character of our friend we must know the ideas and motivs of his life. What were these?

First, he believed simply in nature. He knew of nothing above or beyond. This universe was to him the unbeginning and the unending. He recognized its laws, and to obey them was the highest wisdom.

Secondly, in nature the highest form of life and intelligence to him was Humanity. This was the supreme being from whence sprung the noblest motivs of action. Human relations were to our friend the highest and most sacred relations, and involved the greatest duties of which a man is capable. To be a good husband, father, citizen, friend, and neighbor was to his mind the best that was possible to do. There is no conceivable quality of being higher than that of Humanity. If we conceive of a God, he must hav the qualities of human love, justice, wisdom, and power, or he is nothing to our heart and hope. The old scriptures say that we must love man in order to love God. Only through man can we reach any worthy conception of God. Infinit goodness must be like human goodness or it is no goodness at all. So, whether there be a God or not, Humanity is the supreme quality of being—in essence there can be nothing nobler or more beautiful. Therefore the relations of one human being to another are the highest relations of duty and service that are conceivable.

Our friend was commonly known as an Infidel; an honorable name, because of the history that belongs to it. It is said that the Infidel believes nothing. This is untrue. The Infidel does believe, and he believes most vividly, for his belief is founded upon and is one with his knowledge. He believes all that the human mind can believe in truthfulness. He believes in Nature, its majesty and beauty, its wondrous laws, its mighty forces. He believes in the sunshine and the flowers, the blue sky, the seed-time, and the harvest. He believes in humanity, in what it is and what it can be. He believes in human goodness, virtue, heroism, self-sacrifice, love, affection, duties, and labors. What grander and more inspiring belief can one hav than this? This was the belief of our friend, this was his creed, his philosophy. Through this we see the nobleness of his life. It was rich, full, free, radiant, because he accepted the truth, and only the truth.

As we stand by his grave we can hav no fear for him. He can front the universe because he has been a faithful man. If he survives the shock of death, the same power that makes for beauty and virtue here, will giv the same brightness in the hereafter. All life is one; Nature, which givs the sun and flowers now, the harvest, the fruit, will always do the same in every realm of being and effort. If our friend sleeps, he sleeps well; if he livs, he livs with that same power which is present in this world, and the same laws, and the same beneficence are with him as with us.

We must weep, but our tears glisten with the sunlight of memory and hope. Our friend has given to us a priceless inheritance. It is a joy to recall his life through the many years that are past; to think of his good deeds; of the flowers, the seeds of which he planted; the harvest that he helped to make, the paths that he made joyous. Through memory, and through love, in death he becomes a deathless impulse. We shall be more true and brave, more kind and neighborly, because he has left for us so beautiful an example. He will be a constant inspiration—a presence still in this elevating influence, which, like the light of stars, is made most potent by the darkness that shadows his being. Does he not also giv us hope? Hope in this world, hope in Humanity, hope in progress, hope in virtue. The to-morrow is brighter because he has lived with us to-day, because he has shown what man can do in the strength of his own nature. Thus grief flows to joy deeper than ever, for life is more grand and solemn as we stand by the open grave.

From the grave we go forth into the world and its constant struggle with greater heart and hope, for our brother hath left living words behind that like a trumpet call summon us to duty.

He speaks the word Liberty. He struck the chains from the oppressed, the shackles from the body. The slave could bless him for his aid. He speaks also for mental freedom, the foundation of morality, the beginning of all virtue.

He speaks the word Science. He submitted to Science. It was to him the gospel of life, the only source of knowledge, the sole interpreter of the universe, and the guide of human effort.

He speaks the word Humanity, the highest word of all, that for which liberty and science are—the ennoblement of man, his happiness, the building of heaven on earth, the attainment of that earthly paradise which is the dream of all.

We lay our brother in the grave; farewell, farewell, we say. Farewell, kind husband, dear father, upright citizen, gentle neighbor, brave reformer, friend of humanity, lover of progress, farewell! Dust returns to dust, but thou shalt liv in the memory and the affections of those that mourn thy death. Thy death shall be a blessed teacher; it shall teach love, devotion, kindness, and sympathy. Hereafter, because of thy now silent lips, the mother shall be more dear to her children and the children more blessed to the mother. We cover thee with earth and giv the last look to thy dead face, but in the chambers of remembrance thou shalt shine—in the thoughts of wife and children, of friends and neighbors, of the world which is better and happier because thou hast lived. To the bosom of nature we commend thy body, but thy virtue still abides in the stream of humanity, in all the inspirations of human progress.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, printed in New York city, is very much occupied now in aiding the effort to open the museums of that city on Sundays. This will be for the benefit of the laboring classes, who can get no time on other days to visit these places of instructiv entertainment. But the hide-bound church bosses are fighting the scheme with all their power, because, they affirm, it will desecrate the Sabbath. We hope the plan will succeed.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is among the very best of Freethought papers. Among its numerous entertaining articles is one entitled "An Examination of Church History," by some one who knows the early history of the Catholic church. The paper is broad and liberal in its views.

A Jewish Notion of Genesis.

The opening chapters of the Bible, as a treatis on geology, may or may not present truth. I incline to the belief that they do not. For all the attempts to prove that they do, do violence to every sound principle of interpretation. Days are lengthened into periods; light is drawn out into cosmic fire. With the magician's wand words and phrases are transmuted into technical terms of a manual on geology. And the strangest thing of all—after all the labor spent—is that the scientific mind which thousands of years anticipated both Darwin and Lyell, should hav been such a bungling tyro in the easier art of expression as to cloud up his meaning most egregiously, we even can only get at the real kernel by piercing in the sweat of the brow through the hard husk! And all ages before herein failed to draw the sweeter milk of the truth treasured for thinking mankind. Was before the Copernican system the world not equally sure that Ptolemy and Moses were agreed? And before Ptolemy, and after, were not Aristotle and the Pentateuch teaching the same things? How dangerous this method of interpretation is, and how elastic, the recent controversy between Gladstone and Huxley showed to all that had eyes to see. With what right will you dispute that the plural in the name of the deity and his speech is not a proof of the trinity, if you allow his other positions? You cannot come with rebuttals from Philo or the Midrash, showing that they explained the passage differently, and more correctly. The magician who reconciles Darwinism and geology with the first chapter of Genesis, has an equal right to reconcile Mosaism with Trinitarianism. Yea, the whole method is—Christian. —E. H. G, in the Jewish Reformer.

AN ENGLISHMAN'S IDEA.

Modern critics, believing or unbelieving, who hav studied the Biblical books as literature—studied them, for instance, as Professor Dowden has studied Shakspere—concur in pronouncing the Bible absolutely free from natural science. They find there history, poetry, moral philosophy, theology, lives and letters, mystical, devotional, and didactic pieces; but science there is none. Natural objects are, of course, repeatedly referred to, and with unsurpassed sympathy and accuracy of observation; but neither in the intention of any of the innumerable authors nor in the execution of their work is there any direct trace of scientific teaching. Could anyone with any historic imagination for a moment expect that there would hav been? There was no science then. Scientific questions were not even asked then. To hav given men science would not only hav been an anachronism, but a source of mystification and confusion all along the line. The almost painful silence —indeed, the absolute sterility—of the Bible with regard to science is so marked as to hav led men to question the very beneficence of God. Why was not the use of the stars explained to navigators, or chloroform to surgeons? Why is a man left to die on the hillside when the medicinal plant which could save him, did he but know it, lies at his feet? What is it to early man to know how the moon was made? What he wants to know is how bread is made. How fish are to be caught, fowls snared, beasts trapped and their skins tanned—these are his problems.—Prof. Henry Drummond in the Nineteenth Century.

Lectures and Meetings.

E. C. WALKER'S lecture engagements at present are: six lectures at Silvan Springs, Ark., beginning March 13th; St. Joseph, Mo., April 4th. Between these dates engagements are wanted in southeastern Kansas, southwestern Missouri, and northern Arkansas. After April 6th work is wanted on the western divisions of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé, the Southern Kansas, and the St. Louis and San Francisco during the remainder of that month and first ten days of May. Address him at Valley Falls, Kan.

A COURSE of four lectures will be delivered before Friendship Liberal League in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Philadelphia, Pa., by Charles Watts, as follows: Sunday, March 14th, at 2:30 P.M., subject, "Civilization: What has Promoted and What has Retarded It;" at 7:30 P.M., subject, "The True Philosophy of Life." Sunday, March 21st, at 2:30 P.M., subject, "Freethought: Its Struggles and Triumphs;" at 7:30 P.M., subject, "The New Testament: Its History and Its Teachings." N. B.—These lectures are free to the public. Liberals throughout the state are cordially invited to be present.

J. E. REMSBURG'S meeting at Hastings, Mich., Feb. 20th and 21st, was a great success. When the doors of the Opera House were opened Saturday evening, every seat was quickly filled, and still the crowd came pouring in. Masonic Hall near by was emptied of its chairs and two hundred additional seats provided. The stage was covered with chairs, and still many were compelled to stand. The meeting Sunday afternoon was but a repetition of this, while on Sunday evening many were unable to gain admittance. On Monday morning Mr. Remsburg left Hastings, and the same evening spoke in Holland, N. Y., more than four hundred miles distant. Mr. Remsburg carried out his program for February as announced, excepting his appointment at Wayland, Mich., which had to be postponed on account of inability to secure hall for date set. In addition to appointments announced he lectured at Naples, N. Y. From Feb. 4th to Feb. 28th he delivered twenty-six lectures.

Selections.

A Protest and a Plea.

In the Nineteenth Century of last November Mr. Gladstone published a remarkable article, which has already received two answers. Professor Huxley has dealt with its science, Professor Max Müller with its mythology and etymology; and even the "Ulysses of dialectics" will, I think, find it hard to reply to or refute either the one or the other. This protest of mine is founded on a much smaller point, but one on which I am entitled to speak, inasmuch as Mr. Gladstone did me the honor to allude to me directly and by quotation, though not by name.

The phrase to which I object occurs in a paragraph which expresses surprise "not only at the fact, but at the manner in which in this day, writers, whose name is legion, unimpeached in character and abounding in talent, not only put away from them, cast into shadow or into the very gulf of negation itself, the conception of a deity, an acting and ruling deity. Of this belief, which has satisfied the doubts, and wiped away the tears, and found guidance for the footsteps of so many a weary wanderer on earth, which among the best and greatest of our race has been so cherished by those who had it, and so longed and sought for by those who had it not, we might suppose that if at length we had discovered that it was in the light of truth untenable, that the accumulated testimony of man was worthless, and that his wisdom was but folly, yet at least the decencies of mourning would be vouchsafed to this irreparable loss. Instead of this, it is with a joy and exultation that might almost recall the frantic orgies of the Commune that this, at least at first sight, terrific and overwhelming calamity is accepted and recorded as a gain." (The italics are my own.)

The phrase is cruel, misdirecting, unjust. As reverently as those who believe that the Bible is the word of God—the ipsissima verba—and the church of Christ the sole ark of salvation, do we, who doubt of both, worship the truth and stretch out our hands to the light. If we think that such religions as the world has hitherto seen have been subjective and not given from without—self-generated and not revealed—it is not because we are indifferent to the religious idea, not because we want to get rid of a restraining moral influence, nor yet because we despise the consolations of faith and the peace which follows prayer. It is simply because certain things, integral to those revelations, cannot stand the test of scientific truth, and fall to pieces under the touch of reason. And what is this joy, this exultation, to which Mr. Gladstone assigns so shameful a parallelism? Is it in our sense of freedom, through our deliverance from the cruel superstitions which have overwhelmed brave men with abject terror, reduced feeble minds to imbecility and inflamed ardent ones to madness—which have ruined the happiness of multitudes, destroyed innumerable lives, and put instruments of torture into the hands of fanatics wherewith to oppress their victims, till the hell they preached was translated to earth, and the devil they painted was embodied in their own persons? Must we bury that devil with the "decencies of mourning," and hang up wreaths of parsley and crowns of immortelles on the closed gates of hell? Yet neither the one nor the other is to be extricated from the correlative ideas of God and heaven as given to us by the Bible and the Christian churches. What is our exultation? To feel that we are men, surrounded by unfathomable mysteries, but free from the fears which desolate and degrade—to feel that we can look up to heaven above unabashed if questioning—that we are one with the nature we do not yet understand, but part of the whole, and not ruled off to a special destiny of eternal torment—to have broken our ghastly idol, the Moloch of our sorrow, bloodstained and tear-bedewed, and to have enshrined in its place Infinity and Law—this is our joy, deep, solemn, self-respecting, abiding; and we would that all humanity shared it. But to question the objective truth of the anthropomorphic religions accepted by man as revelations, and to have cast from us the hideous superstitions bound up with them, is not to repeat the "frantic orgies of the Commune."

The theory of direct revelation creates a dilemma from which I see no escape. Either it is necessary for the spiritual well-being of man that truths taught by God himself should be known and believed, or it is not. If the former, then we are landed in the mystery of Partiality and the Favored Nation; with the corollary of injustice to those excluded for no fault of their own—by the mere accident of their birth deprived of benefits essential to their eternal happiness. If the latter, then it seems scarcely worth the trouble for Omnipotence to have delivered a message in the tremendous form assumed by Christians, if the fate of the excluded is not touched thereby, and everything is made pleasant at last for every one all round. If we accept the theory of a Unified Truth delivered by direct revelation, we are forced into the position occupied by Roman Catholics and Mohammedans—that is, the exclusion of unbelievers from the privileges promised to the faithful—and the consequent injustice of the divine being, who favors some and disinherits others, irrespective of personal merits and for motives of pure caprice.

Better than a divine source seems to me the purely human origin of this belief in a specialized and partial revelation, and how it is the translation into religion of that passionate patriotism which makes its own tribe, race, nation, the finest in the world, the preservation and supremacy of which is of the first importance. It is no other than the egotism which is necessary for self-preservation, but which cannot bear the test of reason exterior to itself. Standing apart from all, and impartial to all, we can judge better than when we are face to face with one alone. And standing apart, judging for the whole human race and on the broad grounds of equal justice, we see how infinitely unjust would be any partial revelation—any creation of a favored nation which should exclude from participation in its benefits the innocent disinherited. If we find joy, too, in this deliverance from the injustice involved in partial, local, and racial revelations—revelations made to some and withheld from others—it is because we open the doors of truth to all humanity alike—making it general and not special—because we think our spiritual democracy a nobler thing than the creation of an aristocracy among souls, where inherited belief in Christ, Mohammed, Jehovah, or Vishnù confers celestial rank and eternal privileges, denied to the excluded. But to see only the mind of man in concrete religious systems is not to deny nor to despise the religious idea—the instinct of reverence for the Highest Ideal—the worship which is inspired by the sense of Infinity—the confession of that Something beyond ourselves and our knowledge, which some men call God, and others the Unknowable, and others, again, the Law of Righteousness by which we are governed and to which we strive to attain.

The very fact that there are more religions than one in the world, and that each consoles and sustains its worshiper, surely of itself proves the subjective quality of creeds. Who can deny the power which belief in the gods of Olympus had on men? When wild thoughts and tumultuous desires disturbed the Greek girl's heart, did she derive no calming spiritual influence when she fled to the altar of Artemis and laid her offerings before the goddess, beseeching her divine support? Where was the difference between her prayer and that of her younger sister who kneels before the shrine of the Virgin to-day, or turns in fear of herself to her patron saint, her guardian angel, asking each to defend her from sinful thoughts? Was the story of Actæon, slain for his presumptuous intrusion on divine privacy, less real to the Greek than is to the Jew that of the fifty thousand and three score and ten men of Beth-shemesh, smitten because they had looked into the Ark of the Lord? When women, in their hour of trial, cried out to Lucina, was it with a different feeling from that which makes the Sicilian invoke the aid of la Madonna della Catena? Was the mystery of the birth of Dionysos more incredible than that of the Miraculous Conception, or the avatar of Crishna? Like our own Divine Triad, unseen by excess of light, hidden behind the clouds, veiled in the summer sunshine, heard in the tempest, and present in the darkness of the night, ever unseen but ever there, the gods of Olympus drew in council together and watched over the affairs of the men they had made. And the pious believed what they did not see, and worshiped by faith, not knowledge. When some bold skeptic denying possibility, or ardent believer seeking to realize his faith, climbed to the top of the Sacred Hill, searching for proof, what did he find? Was there but one feather of eagle or of dove, of peacock or of owl, to attest the truth of the greater by the evidence of the less?—one solitary stain of the old gray stone, swept by the wind and bleached by the snow, which showed where the nectar had fallen from Hebe's cup or Ganymede's unpracticed hand?—one spangle of gold from the girdle worn by the "Most Beautiful?" Was there one smallest material proof of the existence of those Divine Twelve, to whom so many temples had been raised, so many prayers addressed? Do we believe their objective existence now? and have we buried them with the "decencies of mourning?" What to us is that vision of Athene which inspired the artist and cheered the faint and feeble?—what the worth of those processions and prayers, those offerings and sacrifices, which then were held all-powerful to avert war or secure victory, to give good crops to the land and bring divine favor to the devout? What to us are those divine advocacies or enmities in which Achaian and Trojan so implicitly trusted? Do we believe in the visit of Jove and Mercury to Baucis and Philemon—even those of us who accept as divine the stories in the Bible of how God and his angels came down to visit Adam and Eve, Abram and Sara, Moses and Mary? Where are the satyrs who frightened the nymphs in the woods, and the fauns who linked the human with the brute? Where are the rude gods of the river, fathers of men?—the Eumenides and Ate, Styx and Cerberus? Do we not now confess their phantasmal, subjective, self-generated existence? Do we not say: "These things never were, but were only thought to be?" Yet one of the charges which cost Socrates his life was that he despised the tutelary deities of the state, putting in their place another divinity; which was as if a medieval Spaniard should have denied the actual appearance of Saint Jago at the battle of Clavijo; or his brother monks have questioned the holy visitation to Fra Angelico; or as when some modern thinker stands apart from the anthropomorphism of the Christian creed, doubts direct revelation, and questions the divine authorship of the first chapter of Genesis, in favor of unchangeable law and progressive improvement in knowledge, brain-power, and cosmic conceptions.

Admit the theory of an Omnipotent Artificer outside Law—of an Author of Creation who could have made all things differently if he would—and we are caught in a network of contradictions from which there is no possibility of freeing ourselves. Where do we find the benevolence of that acting and ruling deity, belief in whom has, truly enough, "satisfied the doubts, wiped away the tears, and found guidance for the footsteps of so many a weary wanderer on the earth?" Not in nature, of which man is but one manifestation among the countless millions. All through nature we find pain and strife and death as the charter of existence. The weak are the prey of the strong, and life must incessantly be sacrificed that life may continue to exist. We make great account of our own pains, and put up prayers in churches when certain microscopic organisms have taken possession of us, and are rapidly destroying our vitality; but who prays Omnipotence for the small crab held down by the big one, and slowly picked to death by those ruthless pincers tearing fragment after fragment from the quivering flesh beneath the shell? What feebler-winged creature invokes supernatural aid against the terrible dragon-fly, the murderous wasp, bearing down on it for destruction? Look at the spider, the vulture, the tiger, the cannibal, and the tyrant among men. Are they not all parts of one great whole—integral to creation as it is—different manifestations of the same law? But if not the result of law, working inexorably and automatically from its own center, then are they the deliberate work of an independent creator, who might have done differently and more mercifully if he would. In which theory lies the most reasonableness and the most humility?—in that which confesses ignorance of the causa causans, or in that which creates unanswerable contradictions because of its declaration of knowledge, and its ascription of pain, misery, and death to the will of a beneficent deity and an omnipotent and all-wise father?

If there be any truth in science at all, and astronomy, geology, chemistry, biology are not so many delusions of the senses, there was a time when our ancestor—whom, for want of a better term, we call Primitive Man—was removed from the brute only in somuch as he had a more erect carriage, a little bigger brain, and more completely differentiated members. Of religion, morality, decency, pity, social law, patriotism, he understood no more than the ape, his brother. He was as much outside the pale of the moral law as the spider or the vulture. In his murders, his cannibalism, his bestialities was no sin, because there was no knowledge. He was simply a brute, inclosing in himself potentialities of future development. The product of the law of evolution, he had within him the power of evolution. By slow degrees his brain grew and his thoughts ripened. He learnt the value of fixed laws for government, and the consequent need of obedience, with punishment for infraction. He developed a conscience, and he developed morality; and among his moral qualities he developed pity for suffering. Fear of the pitiless elements, of the ferocity of wild beasts, ignorance of causes and consequent fear of results, together with dreams, sickness, and death, had already created an Elemental God. When the social conscience was born, the creation of a Moral God, the pitiful helper of man, followed as of necessity—by the same law as that which created the elemental deity, and made visible fetishes of stones and trees, prefacing the graven images and painted idols. Imperfect social conditions necessitated a Court of Ultimate Appeal. The man oppressed here by his stronger superior, and helpless in a state of society where might was right and law was not justice, needed some one to redress his wrongs—if not now nor here, yet in the future—the beyond. The tyranny of the potent kings must be punished by the wrath of the one omnipotent; the sufferings of the innocent and helpless must be avenged by the eternal ruler who holds the scales and metes out justice. But our God was, and is, the transcript of our social condition—the measure of our knowledge. The social and personal wrongs of which we make so much account are but the translation into human action of the material sufferings pervading all animate creation. Why must a man be eternally compensated for a cruel and untimely death, or for the loss of his worldly goods and gear, while the worm, pulled asunder by two blackbirds or slowly devoured by flies—which tried Frederick Robertson's faith so sharply—the smaller lobster, which is ejected from its safe hiding-place among the rocks and thrown out into the waste of the sea to perish by its enemies, is but fulfilling its appointed destiny, without which life would not exist at all? This necessity for a Court of Ultimate Appeal and a righteous Judge who shall compensate those who have been afflicted here, while punishing the oppressors, seems to me no more a necessity when life is over than compensation for the worm or the lobster. Each is the same thing, differentiated by circumstances and conditions—the homogeneity of nature and the invariability of the universal law being surely among the first lessons to be learned by those who dare to think.

Better and truer than the individual consolations of eternity are the general ameliorations wrought in time. By the law of evolution which rules society—the expression of man's mind—just as it rules the translation of organisms, wrong and injustice create better laws when the human brain has advanced to the point when it can understand that injustice and shape a nobler ideal. The world, which in its barbarous nonage prostrates itself at the feet of crowned robbers covetous of their neighbors' vineyards—of royal murderers setting obstructive husbands in the front of the battle that the wives may be possessed in peace—in its manhood sees the greater good of equal justice to all, and preaches the nobler law of rights and duties as against that of submission and privileges. The specialized inheritance of the few enlarges itself into the generous democracy of Christ, which swept down the barriers of the court and rent the veil of the temple. The Favored Nation was called on to share; the aristocrats of heaven had to enlarge their borders, and the Elect to add new thrones to their number. But as presbyter, once a liberal protest, grew to be only "old priest writ large," so Christianity, which was in the beginning as wide as humanity, by the law of consolidation and contraction working in things spiritual as well as material, has become as close a guild and as exclusive a sect as the Judaism it was pledged to displace. By the dogma of a Unified Truth, of a divine and direct revelation, giving privileges to those who believe and entailing loss on those who are excluded, the Savior, whose salvation was in his universality, has been narrowed into a sectarian deity, like Jehovah, like Allah, like Vishnù. It is the Agnostic who now takes up this lapsed creed of universality—who preaches afresh the democracy of souls—who, in his belief that the religious idea is one to be improved and finally perfected by evolution and knowledge, sees the true salvation of men and their final redemption from error. In this belief lie his hope for the future and his patience with the present. He trusts to time to carry on the work of mental enlargement, as it has already, together with that of physical improvement; he trusts to science to give us increase of veritable knowledge—and he knows that his trust is not in vain.

All bitterness and reproach, all persecution and scorn, are among the things dead and done with to the Agnostic. As little as he would curse the elements which wrecked his house and ruined his land would he curse—though he would prevent—the spiritual cruelties of his brother, acting according to the law of an uneducated mind, a brutish nature, and walking by the dim light of that dawn which is not yet morning. He knows that humanity must fulfil the universal law, and from low, amorphous beginnings reach up to moral nobleness and spiritual beauty. He knows that all society is experimental, all laws are tentative; that the stream of tendency does indeed make for righteousness, with many windings and much doubling back on its way, but always flowing onward from the darkness to the light—from the narrow rock in the mountain to the broad and infinite sea. In the abhorrence which good men feel for crime he sees the ultimate destruction of crime; in the great Man-God which forms the ideal of all religions he sees the projection of humanity itself on the screen of the future; in the fact that this humanity has ever touched the level of Moses, Buddha, Christ, he sees the possibilities of the whole race. He knows and humbly confesses the great wall of the Unknown between him and the Ultimate Verity. But in measuring where he stands now from that brutish Primitive who was his ancestor, he sees no limit to further infinite advance. He sees no limit save that of the individual. Every man must be born helpless, and if he lives to the end of his tether he must die decayed, carrying his experiences with him. All the same the race survives.

Let it be so. The individual is nothing. He is no more than the diatom, the bit of protoplasm which helps to make a geological stratum and a biological world. From the individual as he is now—striving after righteousness, suffering for truth, offering himself as a fragment in the great stepping-stone—will come the race which shall some day be as gods, knowing good and evil. The storms of the present may wither the vines and blight the fig-trees, but the roots remain; and it is better to be among the eternal roots of Yggdrasil, barren of beauty for ourselves, but helping in the life and solace of others, than to be one of the fairest of the annuals—things born of the day and perishing with the day, leaving nothing permanent nor solid behind. Ah! better than all personal gain of riches or of love, which perish with our lives, is that immortality of influence found in the example of those who have done a noble deed or spoken a brave truth! Worst of all the errors, most deadly of all the irreligious denials, is that egotistic preference of individual gain over the general well-being. Not against those who doubt the divine personality they cannot see—who question the fatherly care and beneficence of an omnipotent artificer who has made sorrow, suffering disease, and death necessities of existence—but against the egotists who make the unit of more importance than the whole should such men as Mr. Gladstone turn their arms. Speculative opinions are incapable of proof, but moral heroism is a certain quantity; and the belief in and practice of Altruism are essentially parts of that code which has to come to the front in the future. Once men did not see the higher ideal contained in the spiritualized Lord whom Paul preached, over the deities whom Ovid vulgarized. They preferred their joyous hymns and picturesque processions to the colder, more sublime, less tangible worship of the "pale Galilean," belief in whom included the socialism of general poverty for this world and the hope of happiness transferred from life here to life after death. What was it to the joyous Greek, to the strong and sensual Roman, to whom Hades was but a world of shadows, to be told to give up all here—all that was lovable, pleasurable, tangible—for the hypothetical joys of heaven? Did he not say: "I will take when I can and hold by what I know?" just as those to whom Altruism is unwelcome because of its destruction of egotism say: "What to me is the race? I suffer—I love—I desire; what do I care for the rest?" But it has to come. The nobler life is inevitable; and the day when Duty shall overcome Pleasure, and Altruism be stronger than Individualism, is as certain in the future as is the calculation of an eclipse or a new discovery in chemistry.

The loss out of his life of a personal deity does not dismay the Agnostic, and the destruction of his belief in direct revelation has not left him desolate. As a brave man knows how to die and pass into the darkness of the grave with calmness and dignity, so a brave soul knows how to live by the light of an educated conscience only—that conscience being the result of gradual development, as much as is the sense of justice and the consciousness of shame. He waits for the time when better knowledge shall enable men to reconcile the mystery of the material cruelty of nature with the pity, the justice, the moral sense, which are the active and substantive possessions of man only—who, after all, is only matter conscious of itself to the highest degree yet attained. He does not know why the House of Life should be thus divided against itself, nor why he, who is only a higher translation of the Force which expresses itself in the worm and the crab, should feel pity when he sees the one pulled asunder by two blackbirds—a sickening kind of indignation when the living flesh of the other is being slowly picked out by the pincers of the stronger. One with nature, and the product of material things, his revulsion from the circumstances of his origin is not to be explained by the theory of a moral sense—that something extra added by the God who has originated these circumstances. This would be to make the creator ashamed of his own creation, and to make man his judge and assessor. It is a mystery; and the greatest of the many by which we are surrounded. Why matter, fully conscious of itself in the mind of man, should find the inevitable law, the unalterable conditions of life, cruel, and should do what it can to ameliorate them, is an enigma not to be explained away by the story of Adam and Eve—a talking snake standing erect—a God who walked in the garden in the cool of the evening—a Forbidden Tree and a Tree of Life—or any other of the mythological circumstances to which the orthodox pin their faith, finding them sufficient for their peace.

Let us go out into the open and judge for ourselves. Let us climb to the top of Mount Olympus, of Ararat, of Meru; let us lift up the lid of the Ark of the Covenant, enter the Sepulcher, touch the stone at Mecca, feel the wheels of the car of Juggernaut, and test what we find by the aid of reason and such science as we possess. If we find there things which vanish as we look—things vaporous as clouds that cannot be held—unstable as the river mist which cannot be compelled—can we still believe in the objective existence of the faiths bound up with these things? Or shall we not rather say they are all of the same order—prophet and pythoness, angel and demi-god, Madonna and Hera, Crishna and Christ, Jehovah and Zeus—they are all names, not persons, and all represent analogous conditions of brain differentiated by climate and the tendencies of the race? Beyond them all lies the boundless and impersonal Infinite—the grandeur of impartial law—the prizes to be won from the depths of the as yet unknown—and the one concrete imperishable essence of all religion—our duty to our fellow-men, and our duty in self-respect to ourselves.

Always the popular faith has been the last word, the supreme revelation, to those who believe; and always the first doubters—the Uhlans preceding the army of destroyers and subsequent reconstructors—have been made martyrs to their negation. To be said to doubt the tutelar deities of the city cost Socrates his life—Socrates, who, before all men, taught reverence and preached virtue. To deny that Jesus, the Son of Mary, was God Incarnate has cost many hundreds of lives. To question the divine mission of Mohammed has been as fatal to thousands as was the denial of the supremacy of Jehovah to the priests of Baal. The world reveres its idols, and looks neither to the fashion of their make nor to the passions they typify. Jealous or cruel, punishing the children for the father's sin or demanding the sacrifice of the innocent for the redemption of the guilty—these idols are precious beyond all else, and their worship is held as dear as life itself. And ever the deniers of their divinity have been accused of preaching the wildest immorality as well as the most godless irreligion, and of desiring to break all the wholesome restraints which keep men from crime and vice and force them to obey the moral law. "The frantic orgies of the Commune!" Yes, that is the modern name for the old stone. It is always the same stone, renamed according to circumstances. But by and by the world comes up to these pioneers. Then it ceases to revile, and takes their place, crying out: "We knew all this before; you are telling us no new thing."

There is no more sin in questioning the objective truth of religious systems than there is in verifying a scientific position. We seek the truth, and the fact of this seeking is the proof that we have not yet found. "Judicial blindness" is the phrase of certainty so far as the individual is concerned. But his realization does nothing for another; on the contrary, that one man realizes one thing and his brother another incontestably proves the subjective quality of each creed. The cry of the human heart is yet unanswered, and the reconciling medium between man's moral sense and the natural law is yet to seek. The world stands with parched lips, waiting for this dew of Hermon by which its thirst will be slaked; and till we can reconcile these two opposing manifestations of the same Force it must remain unsatisfied. The solution is not to be found in the doctrine of Original Perfection, the Fall, and the consequent sufferings of all life for the childish disobedience of one man. Meanwhile, we who believe in the future of humanity by the law of progress wait, hoping and of good heart. Schools are our temples; science is our ritual; time is our heaven; the human race contains our future gods; and the Satan we have to conquer and to chain is that arid Egotism which despises for the race what it cannot enjoy in its own person, and cares more for the salvation of its own individuality than it does for the redemption of the world. If in this creed can be found any analogy to the frantic orgies of the Commune, I for one am content to stand in the pillory, and let Mr. Gladstone and his co-religionists pelt me at their pleasure

Seeing God.

Moritz Saphir, a distinguished writer and a Jew, died in 1858 at the age of sixty-four. He was a special favorit of King Ludwig-Carl (Louis-Charles) of Bavaria, who abdicated the throne in 1848 in consequence of an unholy alliance with Lola Montes. King Louis was a Catholic, and his wife a Protestant. This royal equation of religious profession was necessary to the maintenance of the equilibrium of the kingdom. Louis persuaded Saphir to become a Catholic. By and by the queen induced the Catholic Jew to embrace Protestantism. His conversion in both cases was easy. But on a festiv occasion, while in a convivial mood, he amused the king and his parasites by saying: "When I was a Jew my God saw me, but I didn't see him. When I became a Catholic I saw my God (pointing to Christ on a cross), but he didn't see me. When I became a Protestant my God didn't see me, and I didn't see him." Antichrist.

Religion and Scotch Whisky.

A Scotchman said: "When I was a lad I belonged to a religious family. My father would never go out or allow us to do so on Sunday, except to see the 'beauties of nature,' though I think that he was temporizing with his conscience when he went out to walk, even on that plea. We used to be sent to church and Sunday-school regularly with our Bibles in our hands—every one carries a Bible when he goes to church in Edinburgh—and one Sunday, when I lost my Bible up on Arthur's Seat I had to lie about it, and say that I lost it in my seat in church. But what would astonish the spiritual dudes of this town and generation was the fact that Sunday-school conventions used to be held in the gin-mills. Oh, it's a fact! Every Wednesday night, sir, the Sunday-school superintendents and teachers used to meet in a pot-house, light their long "churchwardens," call for a can apiece of stiff grog, and sit there with it before them, sipping at intervals and discussing lessons and methods. That was before the time of the temperance agitation, and those old hard-shells thought there was nothing more anomalous in sitting in a gin-mill to talk religion than your Sunday-school teacher nowadays does in discussing church affairs at a Dorcas society tea-party."

The Irish Problem a Religious Issue.

When the Irish Nationalists and Home Rulers were in a hopeless minority in Ireland, and the outlook for an Irish parliament was years in the distance, the pope, and, of course, his prelates and priests in Ireland, held aloof, and extended no aid to the people. When, however, the fight between the Liberals and Tories became so close that it was evident the Irish contingent in Parliament would hold the balance of power, and could dictate terms to either party called to govern, the pope sent word to Archbishop Walsh to see that none but Catholics were elected. He did not put his instructions in just these words, but the meaning was there. Archbishop Walsh sent out a circular to the priests, instructing them to take part in the nominating conventions, and the result is, of course, nearly a solid parliamentary delegation of Catholics.

Upon the defeat of the Tory ministry, and the advent of Mr. Gladstone to power, the Tories seized upon this sectarianism as a political weapon. Charges are made that Home Rule means Catholic rule, and consequent persecution of Protestantism. Whether this be true or not, the political struggle is assuming a distinctly religious color. Construing the return of nearly all Catholics to be a challenge, Lord Randolph Churchill, the Tory leader, has responded with the cry of Orangemen to the front, and unless he is choked off by Salisbury he promises to stir up a lively religious riot. Last week he visited Belfast with the avowed purpose of inflaming the Protestants to declare that they will hav a civil war rather than home rule. His speech was directed against popery, and his denunciation of the confessional was very bitter. It was, in fact, a harang of the sixteenth century kind, when religion entered into every question of the day.

If Mr. Churchill had spoken from a secular point of view, indicating the dangers from an exclusiv Catholic rule; if he had advocated the establishment of a government for Ireland which should ignore and refuse to provide for religion, he might hav the sympathy of a great many good people who wish Ireland well, but know that it never can be well with her as long as her people are taxed to the last shilling to support a horde of priests. As it is, he is but the fomenter of religious strife, a Protestant partisan, a demagog of a politician, instead of a patriot. When Catholic and Protestant get each other by the throat, the country is lost sight of, and the sect becomes the impelling force and object for victory. History very clearly demonstrates this. Time and again has Ireland been ravaged by contending religious armies. The instructions of the pope previous to the election last fall and the present attitude of the Orangemen make in not impossible that she may be again.

A Stagnation in Methodism.

The Detroit Evening News is constantly prodding the churches of Michigan with a sharp stick. Two weeks ago it read the Baptists a severe lesson upon their general inutility in the community, and now it gently warns the Methodists that they are about equally useless. In casting up the church work of the Baptists in Michigan, the News found that they had increased their membership during 1885 by only eight hundred and six, at an expense of $327.89 per head. This, the News candidly admits, is a dismal failure.

The Methodists of the state number something like sixty thousand. They own over two millions and a quarter of untaxed real estate. The expenses for ministerial support for 1885 were $355,021; for current expenditures, $67,571, a total of $422,592. The number of converts was 1,784, making the cost per head $242. The Baptists, says the News, "believe that when once a person is converted it stands for all eternity. God, they say, does his work so thoroughly the first time that he never has to do it over again. The Methodists, on the other hand, teach that a converted person can 'fall from grace,' and therefore needs to be reconverted before he can be saved. With the Methodists, therefore, it may be said that the Sunday services are as well for the saved as for the lost. The saints must be kept in the straight and narrow path, while the sinners must be enticed from the broad road that leads to everlasting damnation. Just how much of the expenses, therefore, should be put down to the cost of saving sinners, and how much should be set against the expense of keeping sinners saved, we leave each reader to figure out for himself."

This is cold-blooded reckoning to apply to such a fervid subject as religion, and will, we fancy, be unpalatable to the churches. But what can they say? Figures do not lie, and if the Methodists honestly believe that not only conversion to Christianity in general, but a quickening of spiritual life and a new birth in Christ in particular, is necessary to escape eternal damnation, they ought to feel grateful to the editor who calls their attention to the awful state of affairs now prevailing. Moreover, should they not at once seek for the reason of the almost utter impotence of Methodism, which was once so powerful with the illiterate and unreasoning masses?

This question is not a new one. It has been agitating the leaders of Methodism for several years. Many answers to it hav been given by those outside and inside the church. Some eminent Methodist authorities consider the church fair to hav been a great source of mischief. Respect for religion, they argue, must inevitably decline when the worldly see its advocates and supporters openly using means to cheat the public out of its cash which bear such close resemblance to gambling that they cannot distinguish between the two. Others take the view that revivals drive away from the church many more than they gain. Revivals, they say, gather in only those whose emotions are easily wrought upon, and who backslide at the first opportunity, to the merriment of the scoffers and the detriment of the church. Revivals, too (add these church critics), often unsettle the reason of converts, and increase the population of insane asylums. They hav also to admit the justice of the reproach of the pathologists who point out that the emotions awakened by the spiritual new birth conduce very frequently to physical new births. Other Methodist critics (and we may cite Dr. Buckley in this instance) urge that the habit of long prayers by aged and prosy class-leaders has a tendency to keep the seats empty at prayer-meetings. Another class of critics (but these are evidently hostil, and perhaps should not be quoted) say that the frequency with which Methodist ministers are before the courts in company with a female parishioner exerts a strong influence upon the minds of the unregenerate people, and does much toward retarding the lengthening of the church-roll. The average man, these critics allege, feels a hesitancy about subjecting his wife and daughters to the temptations of pastoral visits, church sociables, and emotional prayer-meetings. But the severest criticism we remember to hav read is that of Bishop Randolph S. Foster, of the Ohio conference. Mr. Foster entered the Methodist ministry in 1837, and was ordained bishop in 1872. He is one of the old-fashioned Methodists, who would hav the clergy follow the example of John Wesley, and preach in barns, or the streets, or in almshouses and prisons, wherever a congregation could be gathered together, or forced by workhouse keepers and jailers to listen to him. He does not believe in the modern Liberalism that is creeping into the church and finds expression in literary essays from the pulpits. "The church of to-day," he thunders, "is courting the world. Its members are trying to bring it down to the level of the ungodly." Mr. Foster sees in balls, and theaters, and art, a dangerous force making inroads into the sacred inclosure, and as an effect only the increased fuss made over Lent, and Easter, and Good Friday. In this, however, there is no gain. These occasions are used principally because they afford the opportunity for display of dresses and outward piety, without the inner substance, and for the ornamentation of churches. Methodists, he asserts, "in violation of God's words and their own disciplin, dress as extravagantly and as fashionably as any other class. The ladies, often the wives and daughters of the ministers, put on pearls, and gold, and costly array. The plain dress insisted upon by John Wesley, and worn by Hester Ann Rogers, would now be regarded in Methodist circles as fanaticism." In this assimilation with the world, the bishop sees terrific consequences. But added to it "is the neglect of the poor, substitution of the form for the fact of godliness, a hireling ministry, and an impure gospel, which, summed up, is a fashionable church." In the music, too, there is damnation: "Elaborately dressed and ornamented choirs, who in many cases make no profession of religion, and are often sneering skeptics, go through a cold artistic or operatic performance, which is as much in harmony with spiritual worship as an opera or theater. Under such worldly performances," he says, "spirituality is frozen to death." The difference between the Methodism of old and of the present he finds to be great. "Formerly every Methodist attended class and gave testimony of experimental religion. Now the class-meeting is attended by very few, and in many churches abandoned. Seldom the stewards, trustees, and leaders of the church attend class. Formerly nearly every Methodist prayed, testified, or exhorted in prayer-meeting. Now but very few are heard. Formerly shouts and praises were heard; now such demonstrations of holy enthusiasm and joy are regarded as fanaticism. Worldly socials, fairs, festivals, concerts, and such like hav taken the place of the religious gatherings, revival meetings, class and prayer-meetings of earlier days. How true that the Methodist disciplin is a dead letter. Its rules forbid the wearing of gold, or pearls, or costly array, yet no one ever thinks of disciplining its members for violating them. They forbid the reading of such books and the taking of such diversions as do not minister to godliness; yet the church itself goes to shows, and frolics, and festivals, and fairs, which destroy the spiritual life of the young as well as the old. The extent to which this is now carried on is appalling. The spiritual death it carries in its train will only be known when the millions it has swept into hell stand before the judgment." This is Bishop Foster's opinion of the pews, but his arraignment of the pulpit is no less severe. The early Methodist ministers, he says, went forth to suffering and sacrifice. They sought places of privation rather than of ease. They had no large salaries, gorgeous parsonages, non-luxury-loving congregations. All this is now changed, "Oh, how changed!" he exclaims. "A hireling ministry will be a feeble, a timid, a truckling, a time-serving ministry, without faith, endurance, and holy power. Methodism formerly dealt in the great central truth. Now the pulpits deal largely in generalities, and in popular lectures. The glorious doctrin of entire sanctification is rarely heard and seldom witnesed to in the pulpits."

Perhaps in some one of these explanations the Evening News can find a satisfactory answer to its query, why do the Methodists spend so much money and hav so little to show for it? But if not, then let the editor look deeper into the question, and it will find that the Baptists and the Methodists are not alone in their suspended growth. Every sect but the Catholics is losing its hold upon the people, and every denomination but Rome is permeated with heresy.

And though they should gain in numbers they are steadily losing in principle. The creeds of the past no longer satisfy the people. They hav outgrown them, as a child outgrows the nursery rhymes that once amused and fed its mind. One after another of the dogmas is quietly dropped and relegated to the lumber room, to gather dust and be finally forgotten. Even the bishop's darling dogma of entire sanctification is scouted as only the mental athletics of a puritanical hypochondriac. Who would believe, after a horse trade with a deacon, that "the saints grow in grace, perfecting holiness in the fear of God?" There are but few sections in the Methodist articles of religion, from "faith in the holy trinity" to "a Christian man's oath," that the people believe. The reason is that the entire foundation of the whole system of Christianity has been undermined by the scholarship of the last quarter of a century. A man nowadays who believes in the "fall of man" is regarded as a fossil. Yet upon it depends the whole scheme of salvation. If God did not create Adam as recorded in Genesis, if he was not perfect before the "fall," of what use was Christ's sacrifice on Calvary? Evolution shows, as Beecher puts it, that man began at zero and has been rising ever since, instead of having once been perfect and falling constantly.

The growth of the world to-day, it cannot be denied, is farther and farther away from a belief in the scriptures, as a "sufficiency for salvation." The better sense of mankind rejects the ferocious dogma of hell, and it certainly is an unprovable speculation. But what is theology without a hell with which to terrify the people into the fold? Christ's three days in the tomb are called a prolonged syncope, and the resurrection a figure of speech. What medical man will risk his reputation by vouching it possible for Christ to truly rise from the dead, take his own body, "with all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature," and ascend into heaven and there sit "until he return to judge all men at the last day?" The machinery of the church is altogether too cumbersome, and impossible of being put into action. A man cannot believe unless a statement appear to him reasonable. To the people of Michigan, as to the rest of mankind, Methodism probably does not so appear, and that is the cause of the poor showing made by the churches. They hav outgrown the Methodism of Wesley, and the Methodism of to-day does not sufficiently impress them with its importance. If there is no hell to be saved from, they probably argue, and if the scheme offered is worthless though there were, of what use is it to join a church? There is better amusement at the theaters, more solid information to be gathered from books, and if one must meditate upon the briefness of human life, why, a visit to a graveyard is a little more cheering than the average Methodist sermon. Let the Detroit editor brighten up. There are many things to get in this world of vastly more importance than religion.

William Shreeve Bailey Dead.

The last issue of the Nashville, Tenn., Liberal brings the unwelcome intelligence that its venerable editor has learned all there is of life and death. He was in good health until February 17th, on which date he contracted a cold that rapidly developed into pneumonia, and after an illness of three days he died at the close of Saturday, the 20th ult. The funeral occurred on Tuesday, February 23d, the services being conducted by Dr. Thomas Foster.

Mr. Bailey was eighty years of age. His life had been one of constant struggle, as indeed were the lives of all the antislavery agitators, of whom he was one of the bravest. He was born in Centerville, Ohio, February 10, 1806. In his boyhood he received a good education, and later entered upon a preparatory course of study for the ministry. He was compelled to sacrifice this ambition, and learned the machinist trade, afterward engaging in business for himself in Newport, Ky. Here, in 1851, being obliged to take a printing office in payment of debts due him, he entered into the printing business, publishing a small daily paper, the Evening News. Being an outspoken Abolitionist, vigorously denouncing negro slavery, his establishment was soon destroyed by an incendiary fire. The citizens who sympathized with him at once raised funds, and he was soon the editor of the Free South, a weekly with the emancipation of the slaves as its avowed object. On October 28th, 1859, his office was attacked by a mob, and the press and type taken out, put upon a ferry-boat, conveyed to the middle of the Ohio river, and there sunk. The immediate pretext for this outrage, Dr. Foster says, was an editorial in which Mr. Bailey expressed his belief "that John Brown, in his Harper's Ferry raid, was actuated by religious convictions and humane considerations of right; that he was honest, if mistaken." Northern citizens who were in sympathy with Mr. Bailey contributed funds sufficient for another printing outfit, and a little working capital, with which he again began the printing business. About the close of the war he started a daily paper, the Evening Leader, at Covington, Ky., afterward removing to Nashville, and in company with Hon. John Ruhm published the Nashville Daily Republican. This office was destroyed in 1875 by fire, the work of incendiaries.

The Republican was Mr. Bailey's last newspaper venture previous to publishing the Liberal. After the burning of the office Mr. Bailey came North, and aided by letters of high praise from Governor Claflin, Elizur Wright, Edward Everett Hale, Photius Fisk, Hon. F. L. Ames, John M. Forbes, and other distinguished Massachusetts citizens, soon collected money for still another printing outfit. Returning to Nashville, he once more hung out his sign of job printer, on Cherry street, where he lived and worked until death came to him. The Liberal is now in its fifth volume.

Mr. Bailey renounced the creeds of the church in his early manhood. The "Age of Reason" was to him the embodiment of truth. He wrote for the Boston Investigator in the early days of that journal, and all through his eventful life he maintained his opinions with vigor and ability. The star ever before him was Freethought. He was generous, too, often beyond his means. No poor left his door with the impress of hunger upon their faces, and there are many in Nashville to-day who will suffer through his death.

Whatever else may be said of him, writes his funeral eulogist, this tribute cannot be denied him: he had courage, the courage of his convictions. In the face of public opinion, pro-slavery or religious, of bold self-interest or of educated prejudice, he never faltered. Whether suffering persecution for his Infidelity, or standing in front of infuriated mobs, he never quailed. He was a brave, an honest man. He believed heartily in what he said and wrote. And when lying upon the bed of death, no change of sentiment came to him. He died as he lived, an honest man.

So passes away another of the antislavery heroes. There are but few now left—they can be counted almost upon the fingers. A few more years and they will hav all passed from the earth. But we shall still hav the influence of their lives to spur us on to effort, and to remind us in every moment of their years of incessant toil, and their all but hopeless work, till suddenly, like a flash of light, their labor was crowned with victory. William Shreeve Bailey is gone, but he is still here in his influence upon those who met him or read his paper. His little journal will liv after him, we hope, and through that the work he began may be continued, and his name still be mentioned among those who hav made the world better.

Heretics of a Generation Ago.

The letters of Richard Carlile and Robert Taylor, furnished us by Thomas Shore, Jr., of London, take us back to old times. Freethinkers then were used about as they are to-day, but their persecutions by the Christians were conducted with more boldness. D. M. Bennett's imprisonment had to be brought about under another charge, and the indictment of G. W. Foote included the word "indecent" through fear of the prosecutor that "blasphemous" was not sufficient to procure conviction.

Robert Taylor was first imprisoned for blasphemy in 1827, in Oakham jail, one year. It was in this jail that he wrote the "Diegesis," and "Syntagma." In 1831 he was again imprisoned for blasphemy in Horsemonger jail, his sentence, beginning July 4th, being for two years. Having, in a fit of desperation, threatened the life of the jailer, this fact was made use of to prolong his imprisonment. Between his two imprisonments he formed the acquaintance of Richard Carlile, who had established a Sunday-school for free discussion in a theater called the Rotunda, near Blackfriar's bridge. Taylor and Carlile worked together for several years, but after Mr. Taylor's release from Horsemonger jail a difference in sentiment as to methods estranged them. It may be this estrangement antedated Mr. Taylor's release, and accounts for the reproving tone of Mr. Carlile's letter noted by Mr. Shore, Jr. Mr. Taylor's first trial for blasphemy was founded upon his series of sermons in "The Devil's Pulpit," a name given them from the circumstance of the author having been called the devil's chaplain by Mr. H. Hunt. After Mr. Taylor's release from his second imprisonment, he married an estimable lady and retired to France, spending the remainder of his days in tranquility.

Richard Carlile was first imprisoned for blasphemy in Dorchester jail. Six indictments were procured against him upon such publications as Paine's theological works, "Doubts of Infidels," and "Watson Refuted." In 1819 he was sentenced for three years and fined £1500. At his wish his wife continued his work, and after various attempts the Christians succeeded, in 1821, in getting her into the same jail that held her husband. Mr. Carlile's sister then undertook the work, but she was soon sent to keep her brother company. Then a Mrs. Wright and seventeen men raised some funds to continue the publication of Infidel books, but, one after another, they were arrested, tried, and imprisoned for periods varying from six months to three years. During the whole period of Carlile's incarceration he edited his paper, the Republican, and to make his perscutors more angry he dated it in the "Era of the Carpenter's Wife's Son."

Carlile's second term lapped over that of Robert Taylor and it was then that he wrote the letter which we print this week. In 1830 he was conducting the Sunday-school for free discussion in the Rotunda. Shortly afterward the Whigs came into power, and though the Tories had abstained from meddling with Carlile's and Taylor's meetings in the Rotunda, the Whigs were less forbearing, and Mr. Carlile was sent to Horsemonger jail for two years. His crime consisted in delivering Freethought lectures. In 1834 and 1835 Mr. Carlile passed ten more weeks in prison for refusing to pay church rates assessed upon his house in Fleet street.

James Watson, to whom the second letter is addressed, was a colleague of Carlile, and was in his employ. He was arrested for selling a copy of Palmers' "Principles of Nature," and sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment in Coldbath Fields Prison. Mr. Taylor seems to hav had a deeper affection for him than for Mr. Carlile. Reformers in those days, as in these, were self-willed, and apt to think that only their way could be the right one. Against the enemy they preserved an unbroken front, but among themselvs they had their factions. This must inevitably be the case in all reforms. It requires a strong will, a great deal of individuality, and a large development of what phrenologists denominate the organ of self-esteem, to stand up against popular prejudice, and go bravely to prison rather than yield to the clamor of the mob. Such qualities are the very ones that lead to divergence from others. In this country, in antislavery times, the Abolitionists differed furiously as to methods. Not infrequently the leaders let fall sentences scathing their colleagues scarcely less bitterly than they denounced the "sum of all villainies." But these small specks on their characters are to-day lost sight of, and the world unites in honoring them as its benefactors. It is well, however, to bear these things in mind as a lesson to the reformers of to-day, and the enemy may lay this to heart: No matter how much individuals may differ, no matter how divergent may be their ways and methods, they are all working for the common cause—the cause that, like evolution, will steadily progress in spite of all obstacles.

Mr. Joseph W. Corfield, referred to by Mr. Shore, is one of the noble men of the present day who delight to honor reformers. In Kensal Green Cemetery, near the monument to Robert Owen, he has erected "The Reformers' Memorial," a granit pillar seventeen feet high, upon which he has placed the names of over forty of the prominent heretics of the present century, together with a brief statement of the work performed which entitles them to this distinction and grateful remembrance. The memorial was unveiled August 22, 1885.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find check for $5—$3 for paper in advance, and $2 to assist you in illustrating the journal.

Yours, HORACE L. FAIRCHILD, M.D.

ELDORADO, IA., Feb. 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. I want your paper as long as I can read it. I had a severe spell of sickness, and did not expect to read it again; but I will risk it once more. I am seventy-nine years and seven months old. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was printed in Paris, Ill.

JOSEPH HUNTZUGER.

KIRKSVILLE, Mo., Feb. 22, 1886.

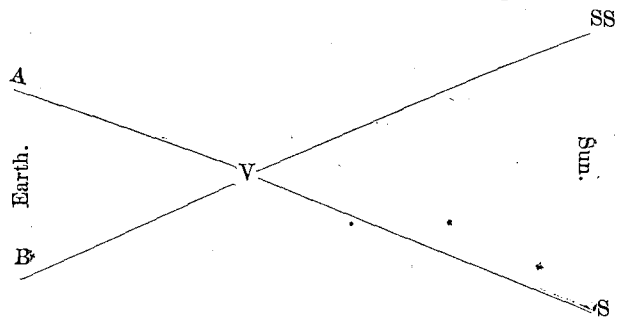
MR. EDITOR: As there has been of late some discussion through your paper concerning hair-snakes, allow me to state a fact which is absolutely a fact. I hav seen a horse, of course dead, lying covered, or nearly so, in perfectly still and clear water, in summer time, and the tail or hairs all alive, squirming, and struggling apparently to break loose, and at the same time many that had evidently broken loose were swimming around in various directions. I offer no explanation, for such a law of nature is beyond my comprehension.

I hope you will preserve your illustrations or cuts and put them together in pamphlet form, squaring the pages with items of interest. WM. HART.

BURR OAK, MICH., Feb. 17, 286.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 13th, E. F. Curtis tells a wonderful tale of a little girl who wrote short sentences "signed by some deceased person," and the writing "would claim to come from the dead."

See how easily people can deceive themselvs and unwittingly use deceptiv language. Neither that writing nor any other ever claimed anything. The claim has in every case been made by some substantial flesh-and-blood person. E. F. Curtis is shocked at the inconsistency of Truesdell, Miss Gibson, Elmina, etc., in saying that Spiritualism is a fraud. The above-named persons may or may not notice the Curtis letter; but as one of the etceteras (I hav never said that Spiritualism was a fraud, however), I want to say a few words. Curtis says: "Let them meet our facts." Here the self-delusion is shown agatn. If Truesdell, Miss Gibson, or Elmina has ever denied or evaded a fact, that denial or evasion has not been printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER nor any other paper that I hav seen. They hav seen the so-called Spiritual phenomena, but still they do not know that any such thing as a spirit exists or ever existed. That is all the evasion of facts amounts to. If anyone else knows that spirits exist, that person is to blame for not proving such existence. It has never been done. Curtis accepts nothing that is not logical, for he says that "the disregard for facts and logic," etc., is some palliation for severe language. Here is a specimen of the Curtis logic, reduced a syllogism: "Many people are able to write. Elmina had a slate with writing on it, but don't know how the writing was done; ergo, spirits wrote on the slate." But here is the kernel: "We say spirits did it, using for the purpose an element they find in Truesdell that they do not find in all—in fact, in few—and utilizing a law which we, as yet, do not understand." Oh, how convincing that is; how soothing to the troubled breast of the anxious inquirer! And so plain! Why hav we not all thought about that element Truesdell has concealed about his person so long, and about that law that nobody knows anything about? Come to Curtis j-u-u-u-st now for logic.



Curtis has a slate with writing on it, carefully covered with glass. Probably this is a fact. It is not likely that any Materialist in the world would deny this fact. Let Curtis make the existence of a spirit as clear as he can the existence of a slate with writing on it, and if the Materialists then refuse to believe, they will deserve all the contempt Mr. Curtis can shower on them. He says "It has even claimed to be a spirit." Bring out it, and let us see what this it that makes claims looks like. I hav never received an answer to the question asked long ago, viz.: Can any one giv a sound, logical reason why any of this childish, hocus-pocus slate-scribbling, folded paper, etc., is necessary when a spirit communicates with the living? Again: Can anyone giv a logical or scientific reason why a spirit cannot or will not take a pencil and write just as readily in broad daylight on the upper side of a single slate, in anybody's presence, as it can on a double slate or under a table, and with some persons necessarily excluded? When these questions are answered satisfactorily, I shall be ready to investigate the dark circle business. As spirits are invisible, no blame could attach to them if they should wear garments somewhat out of style, or even come en deshabille. The investigators would be none the wiser. As Mr. Curtis admits an unknown element and an unknown law, why did it not occur to him that these might be sufficient to produce writing without any spirits at all? To declare this impossible is to say that the unknown is known.

In the same issue (February 13th) Jos. H. Lydiard says that you violated the usages of civilized journalism "to the extent of offending all of your Spiritualist readers," etc., by publishing in the issue of January 2d a letter from Charles F. Blackburn. Something should be done for Joseph right away. I will do something for him, in hopes that it may slightly calm the waves of his boiling indignation. I will direct his attention to certain facts: 1. It has been repeatedly stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER that the editor does not necessarily either indorse or oppose any contributed article. Any one who can read ought to be able to see this, even if it had never been mentioned, hence no one can justly complain unless they are denied a chance to present their side of any question. 2. Mr. Lydiard must hav noticed that Blackburn was picking a crow with one E. T. Slight, a Spiritualist, whom he charged with "slander and misrepresentation," so that the alleged "abuse" is not all on one side.

It seems that Slight slighted the views of Winter, and Blackburn burned to make the winter of his discontent most decided, if not glorious, summer; to make it hot for, or in other words to raise heol—beg pardon, sheol—among the Spiritualists generally. (The genders sometimes get confused owing to my unfamiliarity with the revised version.) It matters not whether Mr. Lydiard or I would hav indorsed Blackburn's views, he was only expressing his own sentiments. It is readily admitted, however, that Blackburn's letter was quite devoid of euphemism; it was wholly unadorned with the polished phrases of the accomplished writer; vigor was much more prominent than refinement. Blackburn's training in the art of elegant expression has been sadly neglected. He is a miner, a rough nugget; Mr. Lydiard should hav made allowance for this also. It was certainly in bad taste and quite indefensible for Blackburn to speak of "the lies that Spiritualists practice in that circle where the lights are turned down," unless he was prepared to make specific charges and able to substantiate them, but the only real "billingsgate" in his letter came in where he was railing at the churches, not at Spiritualism. 3. In the same issue, January 2d, immediately preceding Blackburn's letter, is one from one L. S. Burdick, a Spiritualist, and one of the I know kind. This person knows "that independent slate-writing is a fact," and he knows that Truesdell knows it, and that Ella E. Gibson knows it. He also knows that Miss Gibson's article, printed December 5th, was written expressly "to create a sale for Truesdell's book," and adds this cant, "Sorry to accuse a woman of prostituting her pen to such low mud-slinging," etc. Did Blackburn's letter contain anything more contemptible, more worthy of objection, than that base, unsupported charge against a lady of irreproachable character, so far as Burdick knows? I think not. There is quite a difference between Burdick and his brother in the faith, E. F. Curtis. The latter modestly admits that there is an unknown law, but there is nothing unknown to the former. All kinds and conditions of knowledge, from Socrates to Spencer, are spread out like an open book before the massiv-minded ——k. The secret motivs of all THE TRUTH SEEKER's readers are known to him. Beware! Of course Mr. Lydiard is not responsible for what other people say, but why did he wax indignant over the publication of Blackburn's letter, but pass over Burdick's without a word of censure? This letter is growing long, and I leave the subject with this question. N. G. W.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Feb. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not read D. Priestly's answer to John Hindman, but I hav John Hindman's communication in your paper of the 13th inst., which appears to cover the ground of dispute; and will say at the outset that Mr. Hindman does well in making his propositions "simply for information," and that they do not call for "an avalanche of personal irony." The distance of the sun was ascertained thus: The relativ distances of Venus and the earth from the sun are known, if Mr. Hindman demands, I can explain how, though it is evident that to explain the whole of astronomy requires some space. I assume it for the present, and they are to one another as 72 to 100. This being known, the transit of Venus over the sun's disk furnishes a parallax by means of which the absolute distances can be calculated. In the diagram, V represents Venus, and the two observers, A and B, looking at her by concert from different parts of the earth's surface at the same time, see her respectivly at S and SS. The length of the base-line on the earth is known, of course, and Mr. Hindman, being a surveyor, can certainly finish the calculation for himself. Transits of Venus were observed for the purpose of calculation in 1764, 1769, 1874, and in 1882, on the day of D. M. Bennett's death. The enormous distance of the Pole Star and other fixed stars, which Mr. Hindman incorrectly calls planets, is inferred from this: That even so vast a base-line as the diameter of the earth's orbit givs no parallax upon them, but they remain relativly to the other fixed stars in just the same position all round the year. This is why they are called fixed. Planets (i.e. wanderers) continually change their relativ position to other stars. The rising of the Pole Star toward the zenith, as you go north, has nothing to do with its distance, but depends on the rotundity of the earth; the tangent to whose circumference always defines the plane of the horizon. If the position of the Pole Star relativly to others was different in different parts of the earth, this would afford a parallax from which a short distance could be inferred. But, as stated above, the position of the Pole Star relativly to any other fixed star is the same, not only from every part of the earth's surface, but from every part of the earth's orbit. As to the velocity of the earth's orbital motion, it is, indeed, marvelous; but not more so than all nature. It is legitimately inferred from the distance the earth is known to travel in a year. That the air cannot be believed to stick to the earth in such a gallop is an objection of the same order as that the earth cannot be round, because, if it were, the people on the under side would fall off. C. L. JAMES.

BOSTON, Feb. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER are truth-telling, presenting truth with more lasting effect than descriptiv words can ever tell. The imprint on the mind will last when words are forgotten. "Theology and Common Sense in the Balance" is as volumes to the reader, as also the infliction of the Jericho band on Uncle Sam. This ram's-horn band are infesting the whole country. Wherever they can reach the ears of any executiv official who can be bewildered with their tooting, they besiege him, hold up his doubting hands, and tickle his vanity that he is on the road to the presidency, vide Cleveland, when he is only on the little spur with a heavy down grade. These trumpeters' first round was war on obscene literature (except that found in the holy Bible protected by letters patent of the church). Their second round heralds the sentence on Sabbath-breakers, "Whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death"—in the church or tomb (the sentence modified). Will these guardians of virtue and religion stand by their own accepted authority? The son (the second partner) says, "My father worketh hitherto and I work. The Sabbath is made for man, his servant." Even Paul would hav each man true to his own convictions—"Let no man judge you in respect to holy days, or of the Sabbath." Now, in this ripe age of the world a man is intrusted with the affairs of a people, of a state or city, their secular affairs only, a right honorable man of more than ordinary ability, a man of strong convictions and the courage to liv them out. He, listening to the buzzing of the clergy, forgets the constitutional rights of every man and woman; for the Constitution forbids even Congress, and hence all subordinates, trenching on the religious rights of any. Where are we drifting, or are we anchored to three thousand years ago?

Forbid the sale of Sunday papers or the sale of Secular papers on Sunday; order livery stables closed and forbid riding on Sunday (except to church), because it detracts from going to church and interest in the preaching of those whose interest in the salvation of souls is in exact proportion to their moneyed interest; prohibit reading (selling all the same) and riding on Sunday; struggle as you will, it is too late to roll the world into the past, the dead past, again, and as a political stepping-stone it won't bear your weight.

How interesting, how instructiv, to the enlightened mind to feed the intellect on the feats and exploits of the ancients—how the prophet went up in a chariot of fire and so lost his way that he did not return for some hundreds of years, and then with an alias instead of his true name—how fire burnt not only sacrifices but also green wood and water! One story might interest ragged, bare-footed children and tramps—the commissary department of the march in the wilderness—how the shoes and clothing lasted forty years, and how they were provided with food, free and abundant, and above all their pilotage. And then leave them to wonder why some of this easy way of living was not reserved for them. And how the same authority which commanded them not to kill ordered them to go and kill everybody and steal everything from unoffending people.

The papers forbidden by the bigotry of our time giv us facts which interest us now, something that we can understand, and this is what people want, need, and will hav, too. Coercion in religion, either direct or indirect, positiv or negativ, serves to set the masses against church dicta.

It is curious to observe the change, the degeneracy. Once the smoke of burnt offerings "went up as a sweet smelling savor to the Lord of Hosts." Now the chime of merry sleigh-bells grates harshly on the ear, one-seventh of the time. Age may hav something to do with the impairing of the senses.

Let melancholy and sickly veneration for old puritanic austerity go with the old flint-lock guns that fought the battles of the Revolution. Hang them up, superstition and musket, side by side, with their muzzles down, honored but harmless now.

Every attempt to enforce religion creates hatred. Tell man that he was made for the Sabbath, and he will war against it as against a tyrant.

When the way to happiness and improvement leads through the church, men will go there. But the religion of the churches has come down to us freighted with superstitions which rob it of half its value.

It is safe to adhere to the injunction, Let everyone be persuaded in his or her own mind. JAMES C. EARLY.

ALBANY, N. Y., Feb. 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received and read a copy of Mr. S. P. Putnam's latest literary achievement, a poem in blank verse, entitled, "Adami and Heva." It is a poetic version of that old Asiatic fiction which inspired the founders of the Sanscrit nations to deeds of patience, valor, exploration, horror, virtue, and marital love and fidelity.

This aspirational fiction, the outcome and evidence of sage and varied experience, refined and virtuous manhood, was in after ages plagiarized, corrupted, and adopted by a nation of polygamists who were rooted by inheritance to a land of sterility, where imperial priesthood pressed the yoke of ignominious servitude on the shoulders of an ignorant and superstitious people. The land of Utah in our country is an example and copy of that so-called holy land. The poem is written in the English classic style of blank verse. There is a graceful and easy flow of florid expression from the opening to the close of the poem. It ought to become a companion book to Mr. Arnold's "Light of Asia." That Mr. Putnam is a poet of no mean ability it would be useless to gainsay. There is a poetic vein running through nearly everything he writes. To say that he has an aptitude for word painting would be a thoughtless expression, betraying an undiscriminating reader. Every person who has read Mr. Putnam's various writings, and heard his lectures, will indorse what I say when I declare that he has a natural proclivity for word painting and poetic phrase.

Another consideration is that there is no appearance of a laborious expense of time in the construction of the poem. Mr. Putnam has not made the plain and simple story of Adami and Heva suffer any obscuration by clothing it in poetic garments. It is a little gem that every Frecthinker should hav a copy of in his house, as the price advertised by the Truth Seeker Company is only ten cents.

J. J. MoCABE.

FLINT CITY, MIOH., Feb. 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In this city, on the 31st of January last, the admirers of Thomas Paine and many others met to celebrate his memory. Ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham delivered an eloquent address. The following is a very imperfect brief of his splendid endeavor to do justice to the memory of one of America's best friends in the hours of adversity. He commenced by saying: "If I were to ask a chemist to take that jet of gas and turn it back to the coal from whence it came, and then still backward, until he found the primeval forest in which the special parts grew out of which this special jet of gas came, separated out of and from all others, what a difficult task I would impose upon him! Were I to ask a biologist to go down time's records until he could converse with the first form of life on this globe, and trace that through all of the varying changes in the genesis of evolution, until he arrived at Thomas Paine, what a burden I would impose upon him! And even though this could be done, what startling difficulties would stand in the way of isolating him from ever-changing environments so that his value could be taken for just what he is in himself! You will see, ladies and gentlemen, in this discussion of the merits of Thomas Paine how troublesome it is to rescue him from his surroundings, so that we might see him squarely in the face. We are forced to study him under many disadvantages.

"Yet we are fully persuaded that, even in their presence, we will find in him one of the grandest noblemen of all history. A defense of Thomas Paine in detail has been made a thousand times. I will not repeat this to-night. I am sure that he is not any longer in need of this kind of defense. It is true that he has been in his grave for nearly a hundred years. The heart of hate was happy when he was consigned to the dust. The religious world breathed free again, and its duty rendered clear by prayer, which immediately pointed to the use of measures on the part of ecclesiastics to prevent a resurrection of this man so much hated by the clergy. They remembered, with deep and prayerful satisfaction, that St. Paul had said: 'If through my lie glory redounds to God, why am I judged a sinner?' This scripture reminded them of the kind of work they, through prayer, would need to do for Thomas Paine in the full assurance of their faith that thereby they would render it impossible for him to arise. 'If through my lie glory redounds to God let us lie.' In this prayerful mood, it did not take them long to find out that Thomas Paine was both immoral and a drunkard. Hence, we will cover his memory with the drooling slime of religious hate and bigotry. Such solid tons of slander rolled at the mouth of his tomb will prevent any possible resurrection of this man who wrote the 'Age of Reason,' which we hav never been able to answer. Millions of prayers hav been offered for the repose of his soul in hell, not so much for repose as for his continued staying there. They were anxious that Thomas Paine should never arise to torment them and repulse their foul slanders. This 'Age of Reason' has been the dragon in the pathway of the clergy. Had he not written this, the world would not hav heard of the immorality and drunkenness of Thomas Paine. Herein is the secret of his vileness. Had that book never been written, he would hav been in the calendar of saints; he would now rest side by side with other great names stolen by the saints. Was it not an act of grand larceny when they placed the names of George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and many others of like fame in saintly company? And there are others whom they are now endeavoring to steal—Emerson, Mill, and Mr. Darwin. The aid that Mr. Paine rendered Washington during the Revolutionary struggle counts for nothing, seeing he wrote that unanswered 'Age of Reason.' But in the presence of clerical slime and hate for nearly a hundred years, which hav followed him, justice comes. The Goddess of Liberty has spoken in defense of Thomas Paine, and the priestly slander, which had resisted justice so long, was compelled to giv way, and down came the huge walls of superstition which had stood sentinel over his tomb for nearly a century, and in spite of all he has arisen. He is vindicated in this resurrection, and he stands to-day before this republic one of the brightest stars in the constellation of noblemen over whom the stars and stripes are waving. Millions of American citizens speak his name with reverence, knowing that in him they hav one of the best friends of freedom this or any other country ever had. His resurrection vindicates him from the foul slanders with which whelps of sin hav sought to cover his name, knowing that it never has been the lot of bad men to come forth vindicated. After the rot of a hundred years, Thomas Paine, like a star, shines in the sky of this republic; his name, honored by every true American citizen, will pass down through centuries to come, when the North Star of to-night will no longer be a guide to the people of this republic."

READER.

PIPPIN LAKE FARM, KENT, O., Feb. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your subscribers here, whom I one year ago persuaded to pay a trial year's subscription, are more than delighted with THE TRUTH SEEKER in its new dress. The illustrations are immense, and will do more to open the people's eyes, and expose the so-called holy church frauds and their impositions and burdens on a suffering people, than all the rest of the paper combined. Caricature will reach and influence the many when labored arguments go unread and unnoticed.

We thank you again for your generous sacrifice of profit that we may more easily double your circulation here and bring the blessings of enlightened Freethought within the reach of the many weighed down by debt and out of employment, for you must know that it is uphill work canvassing and collecting money in these times of commercial depression. A few workers, singly or collectivly, must giv weeks of untiring effort, even at the reduced price, to raise your subscription list to 50 names, or even 40, and that for no pay or profit save boycotting by the Christians. Yours, for free and right thinking,

MARIUS HEIGHTON.

HASTINGS, MIOH., Feb. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethinkers of this place hav just had the pleasure of listening to the eloquent Liberal orator of the West, John E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kan., who delivered his lectures, "Sabbath-Breaking," "Bible Morals," and "False Claims;" to large audiences in Union Hall, Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon and evening, Feb. 20th and 21st inst. The lectures were well advertised and Liberals are delighted and more than satisfied. If these lectures do not produce good results I shall be surprised. Mr. Remsburg is learned, logical, and eloquent, and the lectures are framed with remarkable tact and judgment. They also fit in so nicely that when the last is delivered the whole ground is covered. I wish to assure Liberals who hav not had the pleasure of listening to this able champion of Freethought and free speech, through your valuable paper, that he is all that he is represented to be, and that they need hav no hesitation in recommending him as one of the most pleasing and eloquent orators in the lecture field. They will hav nothing to take back or apologize for. If I hav recommended Mr. Remsburg too highly, I want some Liberal, who has heard him, to call me to order.

CHAS. H. BAUER.

OXFORD, NOVA SCOTIA, Jan. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, half of which is to renew my own subscription for six months, and the rest for six months' subscription from date for another subscriber. I do not know how I should get along now without your paper, and wish I could persuade more of my friends to become subscribers and thus advance the cause of Freethought in this place.

There has been a series of protracted meetings here during the past fortnight, in which a Mr. Vance has been taking the leading part, and the Christians hav been praying earnestly to their God to turn the hearts of what they term the few Infidels of the place, but their prayers hav at present been of no avail. A few of us attended the first evening, and one of our members commenced taking notes, when Mr. Vance, instead of attending to his discourse on "Jonah and the Whale," remarked that he saw some had come only to take notes, and that they took the chaff and left the kernel. From what we hear of his proceedings in other places, he wants the kernel for himself, and his followers are welcome to the chaff. A subscription is being raised among those he has been frightening by holding up everlasting torment to pay him for his labor, although he professes to preach for Christ's sake, and not for filthy lucre—thus showing that he does not wholly trust in God for his daily needs.

I would like to see a good Freethought lecturer through the Maritime Provinces, and endeavor to show the people that part of the Bible which is omitted by the clergy, and also the unreasonable meaning they put on the part they do preach. Yours truly,

E. H. SOHURMAN.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Feb. 8, 286.

MR. EDITOR: After passing through the political campaign of 284, and witnessing and reading of the misrepresentations and intrigue practiced by politicians to elect their candidates, and elevate their party into power, on mature reflection I became discouraged and hopeless of ever rescuing the administration of our government from the iron grasp of the monopolies, money gamblers, and national bankers, who are gradually enthroning gold as king, and calling on the laboring classes to pay homage to their deity,

Money, the god of civilized life,
The cause of wars and civil strife;
Worshiped by preacher, king, and slave,
Adored by sinner, saint, and knave.

Judging by the late annual message of the president he emphatically declares in favor of the national bankers and the gold men. And let us reason from cause to effect. The curse of African slavery was agitated and debated in anger and spite in the halls of Congress and out, and persecutions and murders were perpetrated in different parts of the country. And in this wrangling it took thirty years to educate the people to declare in favor of the non-extension of slavery into free territory by the election of Abraham Lincoln, president. And many of us remember with sorrow the suffering and anxiety of mind that followed in passing through a four years' war, and while our brave boys were contending on the field of battle with the enemy, the gold gamblers and money sharks were forging the chains to enslave the laboring classes (not sectional as African slavery was) in every part of the country. And to-day they are reaping a rich harvest from the class legislation by Congress in their favor, and their Shylock conduct in gambling on the life and blood of the soldiers who were contending amid blood and carnage for a united country, in gathering in their dishonest wealth from the interest of a national debt which they want perpetuated to make of our wealth-producing laborers a nation of serfs. Never in the history of the world hav there been such princely fortunes amassed by the few as there hav been during and since the war. In 1870 there were seventeen families on one street in New York who had amassed two hundred and fifty million of wealth. And not taking into account Jay Gould, Vanderbilt, the money kings, we could furnish a long list of names whose fortunes are counted by the millions. And it is a proverbial saying that our United States Senate is a house of millionaires, for eighteen senators represent fifty-eight millions. If those who caused to be inscribed on our silver coin "In God We Trust," had caused it to read, "In this we trust," they would hav come nearer the truth.

The question of questions that is at the present agitating the minds of all those who are laboring to save our country from a church and state despotism, and evolve the people to a higher plain of development, is, What remedy shall we apply that will hav the desired effect? The following would be my specific:

The first would be for Congress to repeal all laws granting to the national banks the issuing and controling of our money, and to supply the people with a safe currency. Issue legal tenders to the amount of fifty dollars per capita, and call in all bonds and cancel the national debt with them. And all bondholders who refuse legal tenders in payment, repudiate their claims.

And to supply our people with a metallic currency, who prefer it for a medium of exchange, keep the mills running and coin until they are educated that paper with the fiat of the government is as good and more convenient than gold or silver.

Tax all church property. Congress should pass a law establishing a graduated income tax, and when their income counts millions tax them a larger per cent than smaller incomes.

Pass laws to purchase all railroad, express, and telegraph property, and if the corporations will not sell for a fair compensation, build and equip railroad and telegraph and express lines competing with their through lines.

Abolish the office of president of the United States, and state senates, and all chaplaincies. All public lands should be reserved for actual settlers in quantities that they could cultivate, not to exceed 160 acres. And all those large tracts owned by railroad corporations and foreign and nativ capitalists should be transferred back to government and reserved for actual settlers. And all industrious people that want to come West and settle on the public domain and hav not the money to move and open their farms with, government should assist in their undertaking.

All prohibitory and Sunday laws should be repealed. We hav too many laws, and we should learn that we cannot force virtue into people nor vice out. The church has been trying it for ages and has falled.

And laws for the collection of interest and rent should be repealed.

To accomplish the reforms necessary for the elevation of our people to a higher plane of morals—education is the only remedy that can accomplish it. Everyone should understand that the ballot is the palladium of our liberties, and is as sacred as our lives, and that money is not a commodity nor wealth, but is a medium of trade and a representativ of wealth.

CHRIS. BROWN.

CARLISLE, IOWA, Feb. 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We hav four churches here in this village. All denominations say they are right, and all agree that it does not make so much difference what a person does so he believes as they do. THE TRUTH SEEKER acts like a bombshell here. I may be crucified for taking THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I am opposed to the idea of a person being hired to do what is right or his duty, or being scared into doing right. I understand it to be my duty to do right from a basis of principle, and not by reason of the promises of heaven's favor or the threatenings of hell's torments. The preachers find many faults in those who think for themselvs, but there is one thing certain I hav observed, in a life of sixty-nine years, which is that if you stop the preacher's pay, the preach is certain to stop also. If there is anything to be seen outside of organic law as God's special favor, I hav never noticed it. The Christians are praying just now for more knowledge, favor, and opportunity to do right, when the fact is they hav never been known to use any of the old stock they hav had on hand for years.

R. R. RANDLEMAN.

SOUTH DAYTON, N. Y., Jan. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav herewith inclosed a few more names to swell the petition to the legislature. I obtained all the names in the school district in which I liv but two, and they were Free Methodists. I think if C. B. Reynolds could be here with his tent for a week it would wake up the people so that we could hav a League, as the names I hav sent were obtained within three or four miles, and might be nearly doubled if the territory had been thoroughly canvassed. I see a good many of your subscribers are in favor of pictures. I hav no objection, only the cost. I cannot get any subscribers, because the price is so high. If it could be had for $1.50 the circulation would soon be doubled, and would be more beneficial to the cause which it advocates. I should be glad to see it in every house in this vicinity. The books I sent for came to hand all right.

D. W. LIBBY.

UPLANDS, ONT., Jan. 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am doing all I can to get people to read and think for themselvs, and to subscribe for your paper. I got some to hav trial subscriptions. Some hav subscribed, I see, and others find it so hard to get the necessary funds that they hav not done so.

We hav quite a few Freethinkers in this part of the world now. I can count about twenty-five, old and young, and when I came in here eight years ago I was alone in my views. Even my wife belonged to the English church. All those who hav seen the light feel that they hav made a great change for the better, but they hav to stand the attacks of their friends for a while, and then the said friends giv it up, and get used to it, and I suppose think there is another soul lost.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Bobo'link.

[PRIZE POEM.—A few weeks since Mr. G. E. Macdonald kindly offered Edwin Arnold's "Light of Asia" as a prize for the best poem written for the Children's Corner. From a number of excellent productions, all of which will be printed in the Corner, we hav selected the poem below as best entitled to the prize, though where all hav so much merit, we must confess it is difficult to make a selection.—ED. C. C.]

Robert of Lincoln sat high on a tree,
I spoke to him, and he answered me,
And ever thus our argument ran:
Which must be greater, the gods or man?
Robert's song seemed a voice divine,
With melodious argument smothering mine.
And it kindled my anger the more to see
That he was only a bird on a tree;
So I thought with scorn to crush the bird,
Since ever he spake the wiser word.
"Sir Robert of Lincoln," I cried in rage,
"I wish that I had you shut up in a cage;
But since you are free to come and go,
I'll call you a nickname to all below.
Bob-o'-link, Bob-o'-link, oh, what a word!
It sounds worse than buzzard or goose for a bird."
Now Bobbie sat up on the highest limb,
And he sang it to me as I spoke it to him:
"Bob-o'-link, Bob-o-link," in his song he said,
And at every note he bobbed his head;
And the melody rose, and the forest stirred,
And the blue sky bent to hear the bird.
"Bob-o-link, Bob-o'-link," and the Orphic hymn
Drew all the earth beneath that limb.
And the sun arose, and came, and stood
Over that tree in the shady wood,
And dropped a crown of radiance rare,
A halo, down through the trembling air.
And that song, with its sweet and melting tones,
Did more than to soften the hardest of stones,
For at last it subdued the rock in my breast,
Till I too did homage along with the rest.
And now I confess that the cause is lame
That must rest its issue but on a name;
And, again, any name on merit bestowed
Fits into a poem or musical ode.

Influence of Kind Words.

This is a subject on which all should giv a thought, for it concerns everyone from infancy to old age. And by reflecting over it we can see there are few, if any, in whom kind words are not sometimes wanting. The most righteous, benevolent, and moral persons will occasionally giv way to angry passions, and let unkind words escape from their lips, making those unhappy who chance to be within their hearing. And how little do we think of the influence that words exert on the minds of those around us, of how they might be made weapons for the production of evil or instruments for good; and thus it is that words often innocently spoken bear the fruits of evil. Words are like water, which, stored away in the clouds above, can fall in the form of hail, destroying fields of grain, or descend as mist upon the vegetable world, making it bud forth with new life, and under the morning sun glisten with beauty. For unkind words, even when lightly spoken, often fall with a force upon the heart that tends to discourage an honest effort by wounding a sensitiv nature, while trying through bitter suffering to remedy the ill condemned. But kind words, like mist upon the plants, nourish and sustain the brilliancy of the most noble qualities of man's nature, and are welcome guests to the ears of all that hear them; thus in response often bring life and action to faculties of the mind which before lay dormant. And words, like music, telling the nature of the instrument from which it comes, also reveal to us what lies hidden within the heart of the person by whom they are spoken. If they proceed from an ill-nature they will be harsh, while if they are the offspring of affection they will be gentle and kind; and great is the influence of kind words on the pleasures of those around us. They soothe the troubles ebbing to and fro in the human heart, like calmness on the disturbed waters of the ocean, and as they quiet the troubled waves of man's thought, they increase human happiness, which is the highest aim of man.

Words produce the most good when, in a kind manner, they express wise thoughts. Persons often speak unkindly even to their dearest friends, using words soon unpleasant to recall. In this way many homes are made unhappy which, with kind words and actions in place of the harsh, would sparkle with the sunshine of peace and happiness. And many homes there are in our land in which there is a secret longing for kindness, yet they do not realize their wants, not knowing that affection gratified is the highest emblem of human happiness. And if kindness was the wealth for which all would strive, unhappiness would soon float away, leaving joy and kindness to flow on like a calm and peaceful stream. The kind conquer the unkind. Should we, when harshly speaking, always receive mild and gentle words in reply, we soon would find the unevenness of thoughts and expressions melting away before them. Kind words are within reach of all, and, when rightly used, are productiv of good. Hence we should all cherish that trait of character of which they are the result. But many who do not realize their influence, think they are of small importance, and thus neglect them. But we must remember that our lives are made up of small things, and the more there are the stronger will be the foundation, so each kind word that we suppress takes a pebble from the foundation of our happiness. All kind words spoken, whether in praise or censure, at home or abroad, tend to strengthen those social ties which unite individuals into a common brotherhood of love. Everything that "treads the earth" leaves its footprints imprinted upon the soil. And every word expressed leaves an impression on the mind of some one that hears it; hence kindness we should cultivate, and always endeavor to use kind words, so that when we sever our associations with our friends, and some shall hav passed beyond the realm of this life, we will hav in our memories only the pleasant conversations and innocent pleasures we enjoyed with them. WILL. R. KING.

Jordan Valley, Or.

"Lost, Strayed, or Stolen."

A sweet little maiden not quite three years old,
With a sun-bonnet tied over ringlets of gold;
Merry brown eyes that the sunshines lurks in,
Two rosy cheeks and a white dimpled chin;
Dear chubby hands kissed quite brown by the sun,
And a voice like the brook's, full of laughter and fun!

She left me this morn with a kiss and a smile,
And now has been gone such a weary long while,
Oh, tell me, good folks, hav you seen her pass by Chasing a bird or a gay butterfly?
She carried a doll and a little blue basket,
And "My name is wee Elsie," she'd say, if you'd ask it.

She may hav gone down where the chatterlng brook
Runs 'round on itself with a queer little crook,
And watching the fish in the shadows at play,
Perhaps she forgot she was running away;
Or it may be the fairies, by some mystic spell,
Hav lured her away to their haunts in the dell.
If once they find out what a darling she is,
I fear they will keep her to love and to kiss.

Perhaps she lay down somewhere under a tree,
Where the leaves with the sunbeams are dancing in glee,
And gazing 'way up at the blue summer sky,
To watch the white clouds as they sail slowly by,
She too may hav sailed into dreamland away—
I wonder, I wonder, how long will she stay?

Oh, if you should see her, pray tell her from me
That mamma's as lonesome as lonesome can be;
And if she has gone with the fairies to stay,
Or off into dreamland has drifted away,
I'll hav to adopt some poor wandering elf—
Why, who was it that kissed me? 'Tis Elsie herself. —M. K. Buck in Chicago Advance.

A Great Singer's Kind Deed.

Stories about Annie Louise Cary hav the refreshing novelty of not being advertisments, like those told of most women with voices, and this from the Pittsburgh Dispatch is rather pretty: One summer, as was her custom, she spent some little time in her father's old home, a short distance from Portland, which she made her own during her vacation. It was after she had been feted at home and abroad, had sung before crowned heads and nobility, and diamonds had been but one of a profusion of gifts showered upon her. One morning she ran into a neighbor's kitchen as if "she were not Miss Cary," as the girl said, where a girl of eighteen or twenty stood, ironing. Like many bright New England girls she longed to get away from her small surrounding and try a larger sphere. "Why, I hav my trials," said Miss Cary, "and you could not understand them."

"Oh," answered the girl, "what are troubles to you? You can do as you please with the world, instead of waiting to see what the world is going to do with you."

"You are tired, let me iron awhile," said the famous songstress.

The girl protested. Miss Cary insisted, and carried her point. As her iron moved to and fro, she entertained the weary girl with stories of her own life, showing with what labor she had achieved her present success, and the trials incident to a public life. When she, too, became weary, she changed places with the girl, who had become rested and contented, and saying, "Now, I'll sing for you," the voice which had held hundreds entranced, now filled the little kitchen. For a long time she held the girl entranced by the spell of that charming voice, and when she went home left her happy, where she had found her restless and discouraged.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—CHARADE.

A spot or blemish first you take,
Or, if you choose, a little lake.
Now, next you for the author look
Of those five books called Pentateuch,
Wherein he tells how, when he died,
God buried him, his grave to hide,
And how that "even till this day"
Where he was buried none can say.
I own it seems a little odd
To be thus buried by the God.
His own obituary, too,
How he could write I never knew.
Well, having found him in your hunt,
Affix that blemish to his front,
When lo! the Bible text comes true,
This author vanishes from view.
Some small marsupials stand alone,
And leave his grave in all unknown.

2.—A PARADOX.

From a scientific point of view
This paradox is strictly true.
In New York city once did dwell
A brewer who, as I've heard tell,
A tub did hav for holding beer
That held a thousand gallons clear.
No more, no less, would go therein
When filled exactly to the brim.
Trade got so poor, he thought it best
To "pull up stakes" and "go out west."
In Denver he did settle down
In Colorado's noted town,
Where, plumb and level, up he sat
His famous thousand gallon vat;
But strange! here in this land of gold
His tub could not be made to hold
A thousand gallons, as of late
It held when in the Empire state.

Grand Rapids, Mich. O. H. RICHMOND.

3.—AMETHYST PRIZE CHARADE.

One givs an added zest to milk,
In two the ladies show their silk;
Both make a wholesome, toothsome dish,
"Strange meat, that's neither flesh nor fish."
Three, like a tiger, slays and kills;
At four we drown our woes and ills.
These two the welcome bottle holds,
And all the four as well enfolds.

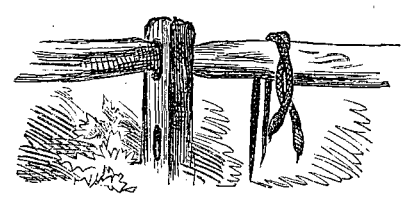
For the first solution of the Amethyst sent direct to me at Escanaba, Mich., P. O. box 75, I will giv as a prize a plant of my new seedling dahlia, named "Edelweiss," a splendid double, snow-white, and worth a dollar each for young plants, free by mail.



Escanaba, Mich. ISAAC A. POOL.

4.—DIAMOND.

1st. A letter. 2d. A bud. 3d. Pierced. 4th. A fabulous sea animal. 5th. A general in the late war. 6th. To paint. 7th. A letter.

Bramwell, W. Va. R. BERNHEIM.

5.—CONUNDRUM.

A boy has killed two copperheads,
And hung them on the fence;
In what respect are they just like
Old-fashioned copper cents?

[Correspondents will please remember that we do not want sermons for children. We hav received an essay of seventeen pages of foolscap for the Corner! Its doom is the waste-basket. Correspondence.

HOOPESTON, ILL., Dec. 31, 1885,

DEAR AUNT SUSIE: Seeing all the little girls writing to you I thought I would write and ask you if I could call you Aunt Susie. Papa and mamma got me the "Story Hour" for a birthday present. I am ten years old, and I go to school and am in the fourth grade, class C. I am very much pleased with the Children's Corner; I like to read the correspondence. I can't work many puzzles. Papa and mamma say THE TRUTH SEEKER is their Bible, although we hav a regular Bible—old filthy thing—here. Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER nine years altogether. I like the "Story Hour" so well I cannot decide which story is the best, and I think little Susie's picture is beautiful; I know she was a nice little girl and I hope to be better acquainted with her Aunt Susie. I will close, so good-bye.

I remain yours truly, IDA M. JOHNSON.

[Yes, Ida may call the editor of the Corner auntie if she wishes, and she will be pleased to hav her do so.]

SCOTTS, MICH., Feb. 10, 286.

MISS WIXON: I read the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER and like it very much. I think you publish some very nice stories. I go to school this cold winter. I hav to go one and a quarter miles. My father is a Free-thinker and has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly five years. He belongs to the Grange and the Knights of Labor. I am nine years old, and this is the first letter that I hav ever written. I will hav to close for this time.

Yours fraternally, JOSEPH B. MILLIMAN.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I crayoned these in school; they are not very nice. I got whipped in school yesterday, for leaning against the side of the house. She tore my pictures and made me mad. She is an ugly, wicked teacher. I wish I never had to go to school to her again, but mamma says I must; so I shall hav to. Oh, dear, I wish you were my teacher. I never would be naughty. I hav a new dollie. I hav named her Susie Wixon. She behaves the best of all my dollies. I love you, oh, so dearly, and so does mamma. So good-bye. From your little friend CORA.

[We are sorry that Cora had to take a whipping for such a slight offense. She should tell her teacher that the tender flesh of a little child was never made to be beaten. Fighting characters should choose one of their own size and build when they wish to fight. Cora must try to be good and kind to her teacher and thus make her feel ashamed of her naughtiness to so good a girl.—ED. C. C.]

MANCHESTER, IA., Jan. 31, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a letter for the Children's Corner. I am eight years old. I liv on a farm. We hav a good many cattle and horses. We hav a pet dog. Her name is Gyp. She is a rat terrier. It is fun to see her shake a rat and kill it. She plays ball with me.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

ADAMI AND HEVA. A New Version. By S. P. Putnam. New York. The Truth Seeker Co. Price 10 cents.

Almost every one is familiar with the old version of Adam and Eve as related in Genesis. And every person of sense and understanding must feel indignant at the way the story reads, beginning with insults to womanhood that follow her like some evil spirit through the Bible, and down to the present time.

But few, comparativly speaking, are aware of the legend, infinitly superior, and older by thousands of years, from which this myth in Genesis was taken.

S. P. Putnam has rendered a new and correct version of the old, old story, and given it in such perfect lines of poetic beauty that the reader is at once charmed and delighted with its perusal. He has revealed it as a sweet and tender story, throbbing with life and love. It is matchless poetry, too—the poetry that sweeps and sways the being like the music of the pines, or the low sighing surge of the sea. Every page is brilliant and glowing with flashing gems of poetic fire. The love and constancy of man and woman are eloquently portrayed. Bulwer Lytton, in the "Lady of Lyons," where Pauline says,

"Tell him even now that I would rather share
His lowliest lot, walk by his side an outcast,
Work for him, beg with him, liv upon the light
Of one kind smile from him, than wear the crown
The Bourbon lost!"

Does not more beautifully and powerfully express the devotion of woman than does Mr. Putnam in these lines:

"Take thy fair Eden, I will walk the earth
To death's dark door with him I love alway.
. . . . . .
Better with him all suffering and all woe;
Better with him the labor and the pain;
Better with him the wildest path forlorn;
Better with him the thunder's blasting force,
Than all that thou canst giv with him away.
Justice is thine, O Brahma, love is mine for aye."

This poem which is offered for almost nothing, ten cents only, should be sold by the million copies. I think it is chief among the author's poetical jewels, and I hope, sometime, to see it issued in more substantial form and illustrated. It would make a most elegant and charming gift book.

SUSAN WIXON.

The church has given to the world many versions of its old story of creation, claiming for each an originality that it has been quite unable to substantiate. Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, in his last book, "Adami and Heva," leaves no need for further research in regard to the old myth. Its Eastern origin is apparent, and yet the imitation in Genesis lacks all the beauty and dignity of the story as unfolded in this Oriental poem.

In Genesis we hav a bungling, imperfect account of creation—the green grass growing, flowers blooming, and fruit ripening three days before the sun and moon were created. In the Hindoo account the great Brahma saw the sun, and the sun existed. He saw the moon and the stars, the green earth and the high heavens, the purling streams and the mighty oceans, and they all existed. Man was outlined in his thought, and man existed. Woman arose in his mind, and woman existed. He beheld every living and creeping thing, his work was complete, and it was all good.

In the Hebrew copy we hav man made from dust, followed by an unsatisfactory, repugnant surgical operation, supplemented by a temptation from a serpent, and the curse of a God that it should crawl all the days of its life. As the serpent had always crawled, to the Hebrew or Christian mind this curse bears no meaning. Trace it to its Eastern origin, where a belief in transmigration was a part of religion, and it is left in no obscurity. Heretofore he had been capable of assuming higher forms of life, and, through long ages of progression, of final absorption into the divine being. The curse of Brahma was that he should forever retain his serpent form; and that the Mosaic account was stolen from the more ancient story we need no further proof than that throughout the Old Testament Adam's creation is nowhere referred to, from the fifth chapter of Genesis to the last chapter of Malachi. The myth was no doubt supplemented as a prefix to the Pentateuch long after the latter was written.

In the Genesis of India we hav a shoreless ocean upon which a golden egg floated. It divided into heaven above and earth beneath. Two substances were formed, mortal and immortal; and again two more—man and woman on the earth, the sun and moon and the stars in the heavens. Woman, in one story, it is said, had birth in an expanding lotus on the Ganges, and was received by the first man, Adami, in his paradise. This is the version that Mr. Putnam has given in his poem. How coarse, how cruel, the old story reads, "And the man shall rule over thee!" No wonder that there should be an old rabbinical legend to the effect that the first woman, Lilith, rebelled against this mandate, demanding equality, and, failing to secure it, flew away out of paradise, and a second edition of spare rib was necessary—thus accounting for the two distinct stories of creation as recorded in the first and second chapters of Genesis.

This alleged inferiority of woman has led to her subjection in all ages, and in no other myth is the story so brutally told as in the Christian legend.

In "Paradise Lost," a book regarded by Christians nearly as sacred as the inspired volume itself, John Milton writes, "He was formed for God only, she for the God in him," putting her, it must be admitted, on pretty short rations for a God; and he questions impotently of Omniptence, doubting the wisdom of the act, why he created woman:

"Oh, why did God,
Creator wise, that peopled highest heaven
With spirits masculin, create at last
This novelty on earth, this fair defect
Of nature, and not fill the world at once
With men as angels—without feminin?"

In the new version given in Mr. Putnam's poem, Heva asks:

"'Ah, wilt thou love me, love me evermore?'
'Will love thee ever, evermore,' he said.
'The stars may perish and the sun grow dark,
But I will love thee, life and death, alway.'"

The old question, the old answer—the woman's fear of change, the man's assurance of constancy. The question asked and answered when the world was new, asked and answered thus when a million hearts had broken, and so to be answered while human hearts beat for each other tenderly.

"The woman whom thou gavest me, she did tempt me," says the old version, cowardly.

"'On me the punishment alone should fall.
Be righteous, Brahma, curse not her with me."

Heva, refusing to return to paradise, to desert Adami, says:

"'Justice is thine, O Brahma; love is mine for aye."

And great Brahma affirms:

"'I, God, can giv no greater joy to thee
Than each to each can giv in love's delight."

And here our poet's verse becomes daring, from an orthodox standpoint, when he asks:

"And was there passion in the God's strong breast
When he beheld the bloom of human love?"

And Brahma, sole sovereign of a universe, admits, "There is no curse when man and woman love," and enviously, despairingly, exclaims:

"I would abandon all my wealth of stars,
The majesty, the sovereignty, the grace,
That changes not amid the changing spheres;
I would surrender heaven's eternal throne,
And all the worship of uncounted hosts;
I would dissolve my crown in fleeting dews,
Could I be less than what I am, supreme.
I would a toiler be on earth's bare breast,
And earn the food for hunger day by day;
I would meet anything that fate might giv,
Most cruel blows upon the mortal flesh;
All that the finit suffers and endures,
Or imperfection reaps on error's path;
Disdain my Godhead and be made of dust,
Could I be loved by woman as man is."

I do not recall any words, in any poem, in any book, braver or grander than these lines by Samuel P. Putnam.

What would value the isolated power of Omnipotence debarred from human love? What were golden crowns, golden harps, and golden thrones, as reward for well-doing here if the loved ones were forever banished to lower, darker scenes? As a woman-poet has said:

"If I by the throne should behold you,
Smiling up, with those eyes loved so well,
Close, close in my arms I would fold you,
And drop with you down to sweet hell."

Love itself is a reward for all suffering, and even in unrequited love it is better "to hav loved and lost than never to hav loved at all."

In his "Light of Asia," Mr. Edwin Arnold has given the life of Buddha, so similar to that of Jesus of Nazareth, which it antedates by at least six hundred years. The beauty of the language in this poem of "Adami and Heva" is not inferior to that of Mr. Arnold's, and for warmth of expression and gorgeousness of imagery equals "Lallah Rookh."

This for instance, in regard to creation:

"Flowing and dancing, breaking into stars,
Long trains of light and comet's golden hair,
And rythmic sweep of cloud with breast of fire,
Whence constellations burst and traveled space."

And yet, O poet, one word,

"Could I be loved by woman as man is."

He, Brahma, was a man, masculin, a god! He would lose all for woman's love. How many shining stars, how much of omnipotent power would he surrender that he might be loved as man loves woman? We doubt the answer, remembering, among a thousand more, the pathetic story of the devoted Heloise and the priest Abelard.

O great Brahma, is it to be ever thus? When the gods weigh out love for human souls, as the old legend has it, is the woman's measure always, from its greater weight, to tip the balance—to send man's up lightly till it touch the beam? MRS. A. M. FREEMAN.

THE INFIDEL SCHOOL TEACHER.

The above is the title of a pamphlet fresh from the gifted pen of Elmina D. Slenker, of Snowville, Va., and is for sale by her at the low price of twenty cents.

Among all the good things written by Mrs. Slenker, this little work, in my humble judgment, is the most fitting to the times, and deserves the widest circulation. It is a true story in the main, representing certain phases of human character as clearly as anything ever written by Dickens; illustrating and exemplifying thousands of cases all over the land, where Infidels as a class are either ignorantly or purposely misunderstood by the orthodox branch of society.

Mary Jones, the heroin of the story, is a well educated, respectable, and sensible young lady who has reasoned herself out of all belief in ghosts and hobgoblins of every name and nature. She is a fair representativ of the true Infidel, neither dogmatic in asserting her opinions nor hypocritical enough to quietly drift along through life and at all times allow herself to be mistaken for a Christian.

Such is the character of "The Infidel School Teacher," and it is not surprising, but very natural that some one of the opposit sex should deeply admire her. Sissons Holmes, a good, honest, innocent, and "God-fearing Christian," loved Miss Jones for her good sense and her many virtues, but was pained and shocked at her Infidelity. As every honest Christian ought to do, Mr. Holmes took upon himself the difficult task of enlightening the heathen. For this purpose he addressed his lady friend a long letter, couched in the most tender and persuasiv language, urging her to renounce Infidelity, and with him "come to Jesus." Miss Jones replied in excellent terms, thanking him for his tender solicitude, while at the same time she gave him his first lesson in Infidelity, which thoroughly convinced Mr. Holmes that he had "caught a Tartar," and that he had never before understood the true meaning of the term Infidel. Eight long letters, covering over forty pages, pass between these people, which no one can justly review in a newspaper article. Every page of this book is as full of merit as an egg is of meat, and every letter from both parties as an educator is worth double the price of the book. I sincerely wish it might be read by every person in the land. JOHN W. TRUESDELL.

Syracuse, Feb. 20, 1886.

SABBATH-BREAKING.

Remsburg's "Sabbath-breaking" is pronounced by Parker Pillsbury "a valuable, or rather an invaluable, work on the Sabbath problem." Referring to the institution of the Jewish Sabbath, Mr. Pillsbury says: "Even the super-orthodox Andover begins to develop some common sense on the great Jewish enigma of a weary God resting after a hard week's work, and hallowing it as holy time eternally afterward throughout the universe! Strange Gods, strange men, strange women, and strange works were had in the distant past. And ditto to day."

Mr. Remsburg in his pamphlet on the Sabbath has compiled sufficient evidence to prove that the Sabbatarian laws, mostly enacted to satisfy the narrow views of fanatical preachers, are a gross usurpation of the rights and privileges of the community. It is to be desired that such preachers would giv, if possible, this pamphlet a calm perusal.—W. McDonnell.

Mr. William Algie, president of the Freethought Association of Canada, in the Independent Pulpit, referring to the Cleveland Congress, says: "Prominent among the many kindred spirits with whom I came in contact, I may mention J. E. Remsburg, who in his popular lecture on Sabbath observance justly earned the title of 'Sabbath-Breaker.' In fact, he broke the Sabbath up into fragments as small as the souls of the Puritan bigots who instituted that 'holy day' in order to rob poor humanity of one-seventh of the sunshine that is part of our inheritance from Mother Nature."

The Independent Pulpit thus refers to J. E. Remsburg's book on "Sabbath-breaking:" "This little work contains about all that can be said on the subject, and it will never be refuted. No well-informed minister will ever hav the hardihood to try to answer it. If every man and woman in this country could be induced to giv this book one fair and impartial perusal, it would produce an effect equal to that produced upon our colonial ancestors by Thomas Paine's 'Common Sense.'"

AND

THE FUTURE REPUBLIC OF NORTH AMERICA.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A Book Advocating Associate Life as a Remedy for Poverty, Vice, and Crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

CONTENTS: The titles of some of the chapters are: Present External Appearance of Our Republic; Government and Laws; Finance; Public Improvements; Production and Distribution; Education; Morality and Religion; Marriage and Divorce; Life in the New Republic; Life in the Existing Republic; Examination of the Objections to Communism; Methods Proposed for the Transition from the System of Individual Property to a System of Collectiv Property; Danger. TRAVELS IN FAITH

News of the Week.

THE Grant monument fund has made no perceptible progress in the past week.

ABOUT $35,000 has been contributed to the fund for the widow of the late General Hancock.

THE eighty-fourth anniversary of the birth of Victor Hugo was celebrated at Paris on the 26th ult.

THE trial of the Rev. George R. Bristor, of Spring Valley, N. Y., indicted for rape on his servant, has been postponed.

A TOAST proposed to Queen Victoria was hissed at a meeting in London of the workingmen members of Parliament on the 25th ult.

THE legislature of Maryland has voted down a proposition to compel the state printer to employ only men belonging to the printers' union.

THE Rev. Father Smith, pastor of St. Stephen's Roman Catholic church, Syracuse, N. Y., attempted suicide last Saturday by shooting himself.

THE horse-car drivers of Troy, following the example of their brothers in this city, hav had their hours reduced from seventeen to twelve without reduction of wages.

MRS. GRANT has just received a check for $200,000, being the first instalment from the publishers of the general's book. Her profits on the two volumes will probably be half a million dollars.

THE affection of Deacon Lathrop, of Willimantic, Conn., for the widow Wilbur, of the same place, has got him into trouble. After having spent a good deal of money on the widow, she now sues him for $7,000, which she alleges she has loaned him.

ARTICLES of incorporation of the Golden Gate Religious and Philosophical Society hav been filed in San Francisco. Some of the objects of the society look toward the "elevation and progress of humanity" and "the more general diffusion of the science, philosophy, and religion of Spiritualism."

At a regular meeting of the Shakspere Society in Columbia College this city, last week, the copy of the second folio of Shakspere, discovered in Utah some months ago, was exhibited. The book, which is yellow with age, bears upon the fly leaf the signatures of William Shakspere and John Ward, the actor.

THE Rev. Alfred Powell and the Rev. John A. Williams, both hardshell Baptists preaching near Goldsboro, S. C, had a misunderstanding one day last week, and the Rev. Mr. Powell filled the legs of the Rev. Mr. Williams with squirrel shot from a long gun. The affair causes some excitement in the neighborhood.

THE Rev. Mr. Downs, the distinguished Boston divine, has sucd the Rev. Franklin Johnson, D.D., of Cambridge for $10,000 for slander, and also attached the latter's property. Last Monday Mr. Downs added to his laurels by attempting to thrash a reporter. Botanically classified, Pastor Downs is a daisy.

A NEW prophet named Smith has arisen in Missouri, and is working up religious insanity to the best of his ability. He announces himself as an embassador of Jesus Christ. One of the conditions of salvation is the giving up of all property to the prophet. Smith already has the deeds of dozens of farms which his dupes hav placed in his hands.

MANY persons were killed and injured during the gale of the 27th and 28th ult. in various parts of the country. The water was swept off the bar of New York harbor, thus imprisoning all the outgoing vessels in port, Travel was delayed at all the ferries, roofs were blown off houses, and many personal injuries were reported, though none of a fatal character. At sea the casualties were many and the suffering and death caused by the storm were almost unprecedented.

THE Rev. Edward Palmer, who died in this city on Wednesday of last week at the age of eighty-four years, was formerly a Unitarian clergyman in Massachusetts, but having been too aggressiv an Abolitionist, he lost his charge. Forty years ago he was known as No-money Palmer in Boston on account of his belief that no currency should be used by Christians. He was afterward a member of the North American Phalanx and the Raritan Bay Socialistic Societies. The Rev. Robert Collyer conducted the funeral services.

Odds and Ends.

LITTLE PAUL is having a good deal of difficulty in committing to memory the Lord's prayer. The other night after repeating it with the assistance of his mamma, he looked up and said: "Mamma, won't the Lord be glad when I can say this through without a break?"

A LITTLE boy who had heard a good deal about the work of the Home Missionary Society in the territories, was seen putting away carefully a cent which had been given him to spend. "What are you saving your money for?" he was asked. "Oh," was the reply, "I'm going to save all my pennies till I get a lot, and then I'm going to send 'em all out West to Jesus!"

WHAT THE FLOWERS SAY.

The red rose says "Be sweet,"
And the lily bids, "Be pure,"
The hardy, brave chrysanthemum,
"Be patient and endure."
The violet whispers, "Giv,
Nor grudge, nor count the cost;"
The woodbine, "Keep on blossoming,"
In spite of chill or frost."
—Philadelphia Call.

The crocus says, "Beware,"
The daisy adds, "Don't scoff,"
And the chaste and fair anemone,
With a patient sigh, "Come off!"
The pansy moans, "Look out
For the Shanghai's clumsy feet."
"My heart, he's coming, he's coming
To pull me up!" cried the beet.
The turnip yelled, "Keep still.
Don't giv the racket away!"
When the cabbage flapped his leaves and flew Far into the dying day.—Puck.

THE railroad companies want to lay their tracks with hardened sleepers. One of the New Haven ministers says that his congregation has material enough to set up a whole parallel road.

"WHAT is the proper use of Sunday?" asks a religious weekly. The answer is so numerous that we havn't space to print it. The woman with a new bonnet has one answer; the man who loves fishing has another, while the owner of a pair of fast horses may differ from both. The base-ballist seems to think that the proper use of Sunday in the West is to play a match game for the championship, but in the East he devotes the day to explaining how the last four games lost by his nine might hav been won. There is nothing so diverse as the diversity of opinion in regard to the proper use of Sunday.—Norristown Herald.

Gems of Thought.

CHANGE in the education and religion of a people must be necessarily slow, but if it is never begun it will never be consummated.—D. M. Bennett.

FAREWELL, happy fields,
Where joy forever dwells! Hail, horrors! Hail,
Infernal world! And thou, profoundest hell,
Receive thy new possessor—one who brings
A mind not to be changed by place or time.
The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.
—Milton.

WE are all short-sighted, and very often see but one side of the matter; our views are not extended to all that has a connection with it. From this defect I think no man is free. We see but in part, and we know but in part, and therefore it is no wonder that we conclude not right from our partial views. This might instruct the proudest esteemer of his own parts how useful it is to talk and consult with others, even such as come short of him in capacity, quickness, and penetration; for since no man sees all, and we generally hav different prospects of the same thing, according to our different, as I may say, positions to it, it is not incongruous to think, nor beneath any man to try, whether another may not hav notions of things which hav escaped him, and which his reason would make use of if they came into his mind.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

WHY need I name thy Boyle, whose pious search
Amid the dark recesses of his works
The great creator sought? And why thy Locke,
Who made the whole internal world his own?
Let Newton, pure intelligence, whom God
To mortals lent, to trace his boundless works
From laws sublimely simple, speak thy fame
In all philosophy. —Thomson's Seasons.

POLYTHEISM is the next stage to fetichism in the religious development of mankind. Here, reflection begins to predominate over sensation. As the laws of nature, the habits and organization of animals, begin to be understood, they cease to represent the true objects of worship. No man ever deified weight and solidity. But as men change slowly from form to form and, more slowly still, from the form to the substance, coarse and material fetichism must be idealized before it could pass away. No doubt men, for the sake of example, bowed to the old stock and stone when they knew an idol was nothing. It might offend the weak to giv up the lie all at once.—Theodore Parker.

To the age which believes in Jack-and-the-Beanstalk and the adventures of Cinderella, all things are possible; whether it be Jonah in the whale's belly, or Tom Thumb in the stomach of the red cow, all is gladly swallowed with implicit faith; the children grow out of Tom Thumb in the course of nature, but they are not allowed to grow out of Jonah.—Mrs. A. Besant.

A MAN of benevolence, whose mind is enlarged by philosophy, will always indulge agreeable anticipations with respect to society; he will view all the different improvements in arts, in commerce, and in the sciences, as co-operating to promote the union, the happiness, and the virtue of mankind; and, amidst the political disorders resulting from the prejudices and follies of his own times, he will look forward with transport to the blessings that are reserved for posterity in a more enlightened age.—Dugald Stewart.

IT is true that we sometimes say with a sigh that life passes by like a dream; but it is a bad sign to make such complaints as this, for if a man sleeps away through a do-nothing life, it seems short when he looks back upon it; but if we work hard and think hard, then our life becomes full and rich; nay, it even seems long as we look back upon it, because so much has happened in it. Whole years of a dawdling or selfish or licentious life are worth less than a single day lived by an earnest, thoughtful man.—Bible for Learners.

WHO that would ask a heart to dulness wed,
The waveless calm, the slumber of the dead?
No! the wild bliss of nature needs alloy,
And say, without our hopes, without our fears,
Without the home that plighted love endears,
Without the smile that partial beauty won,
Oh, what were man? A world without a sun.
—Campbell.

THAT education only can be considered as complete and generous which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and of war. —Milton.

ARE not two sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are numbered. Fear ye not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows.—Matt. x, 29-31. See also Luke xii, 6, 7. We belong to the minutiæ of nature; we are in her sight as the rain-drop in the sky; whether a man livs, or whether he dies, is as much a matter of indifference to nature as whether a raindrop falls upon the field and feeds a blade of grass or falls upon a stone and is dried to death. She does not supervise these small details. This discovery is by no means flattering, but it enlarges our idea of the scheme of creation. That universe must indeed be great in which human beings are so small.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

SELF-TRUST is the essence of heroism. It is the state of the soul at war; and its ultimate objects are the last defiance of falsehood and wrong and the power to bear all that can be inflicted by evil agents. It speaks the truth; and it is just; generous, hospitable, temperate, scornful of petty calculations and scornful of being scorned. A WAVE FROM THE WEST.

Notes and Clippings.

MRS. LANGTRY, the actress, is saving of her wealth. She has $150,000 invested in real state in this city.

THE husband of Tennie C. Claflin, sister of Victoria Woodhull, has just been made a night, so that Miss Claflin that was is now Lady Cook.

M. PASTEUR, the French chemist, hopes to e able to treat diphtheria and other diseases uccessfully by a method of inoculation sim- ar to that of his treatment of rabies.

THE orthodox Christians of Akron, Ind., do ot favor higher religion. A lot of them, masked, stoned a church the other night in which a number of persons claiming to be anctified were worshiping. The meeting was broken up, as well as the windows, and several persons were badly hurt.

OLD Science Hall, where the Liberal Club used to meet, has been losing prestige ever ince the club moved away. Beer saloons moved into the building, then a dance house made the neigborhood disreputable until pulled by the police, and now the Salvation Army has made the hall its barracks.

THE Young Churchman is responsible for he statement that a religious paper in this country printed two editions of the issue in which a notice of General Grant's death appeared, one for the North and the other for he South. In the edition for the North it said: "Grant defeated Lee with ease by reason of his superior generalship," and in t he edition for the South it said: "Grant deeated Lee only with great difficulty and by reason of his greatly superior numbers." Piety and lying are not incompatible.

THE American Society for Psychical Research has appointed Josiah Royce, Dr. Morton Prince, Col. T. W. Higginson, J. C. Rogers, T. E. Abbott, Roland Thaxter, and Woodward Hudson, a committee to consider the subject of apparitions and haunted houses.

A MRS. POTTER, of New York, has thrown Washington society into shivers by reciting, before a company gathered at Secretary Whitney's house, the poem "'Ostler Joe," written by G. R. Sims. The poem deals with a woman who forsook her husband and led a gay life until her beauty had vanished and her health was gone, when she was received back by her husband and buried presumably at his expense. The poem may be immoral in spirit, but there is nothing indecent about it, and the society prudes who were shocked by it are the objects of much sympathy.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Pittsburgh Dispatch writes to his paper: "Ingersoll is the kindest-hearted man I ever saw. Riding all day with him between Omaha and Chicago I saw a little incident that will illustrate this. On the train was a pale, sickly-looking woman, with a fretful baby. The woman was in shabby mourning, and was almost worn out with the crying and worrying of her little one. The passengers were very much annoyed, and kept looking around and frowning at the woman, who was evidently doing her best to quiet the child. Finally Mr. Ingersoll, who had been reading, noticed it. Getting up, he stepped across to the woman and took the babe, telling her to take a little rest, and he would take care of the child. The little one stopped crying at once, played with his watch and chain awhile, and finally nestled its little head down on his arm and went to sleep. The tired mother also dropped to sleep, and the colonel cared for the baby for upward of a hundred miles before the mother awakened and relieved him."

THE Methodist Orphan Asylum at Decatur, Ga., is scarcely the beneficent institution it ought to be. A dispatch dated February 4th, to the Herald of this city, says: The asylum furnishes to-day another chapter of brutal whipping of its inmates. Arthur Harrison, a small boy, it seems has run away several times from the institution, as he says, on account of bad treatment. Friday he ran away and was captured at Atlanta yesterday and carried back to the asylum. This morning he was confined in a room in one of the buildings, his clothes taken off, and severely whipped. After being whipped he again ran away and came to the city, where he made known his treatment. Dr. Goldsmith, who examined the child's back, expressed the opinion that the boy had been brutally whipped. The Orphan's Asylum was founded by Sam Jones and has a board of trustees living in Atlanta.

NORA PERRY has written some reminiscences of Wendell Phillips, in which she thus illustrates his power as a "fascinator:" "In the old anti-slavery days a Southerner, who was visiting Boston, said to a friend that he wanted to hear Wendell Phillips, that he had heard so much about him and his eloquence that he was curious to judge for himself. The friend, with some misgivings, took the Southerner to Fanueil Hall one night when Phillips was to hold forth upon his favorit topic. The Southerner sat stolidly through it all, not an angry gleam apparent in his face, but looking at the orator with a fixed, concentrated attention that never wavered. At the end, Boston leaned forward and asked: "Well, what do you think of him? Of course he must hav offended your prejudices; you couldn't agree with what he said.' 'I don't care a —— what he says. I could listen to him all night,' was the unlooked-for response."

A VERY bitter religious fight is being waged on Staten Island. Alice Cronin, a domestic employed by William Hunter, of Tottenville, is the cause of the commotion. Miss Cronin's parents are Catholics, while her employer is a Methodist. Last week Alice attended a revival meeting in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church, in Tottenville, and, under religious excitement and the persuasion of a companion, was induced to go forward to the altar. While there she testified to her conversion. When Mrs. Cronin heard of her daughter's act she became furious. She went to Captain Hunter's house and demanded that Alice should go back with her at once to Perth Amboy and renounce her new found faith. Alice firmly refused, and this so enraged Mrs. Cronin that she became violent. A policeman was called to take her from the house. Mrs. Cronin says she will hav her daughter at all hazards. On the other side of the question, Tottenville being a strong Methodist community, some of the people are determined to protect the young girl's right of conscience if she desires to remain a Protestant. The Roman Catholic residents are the more incensed, as several other Catholics hav recently been converted to Protestantism in Tottenville. The case will probably come before the civil courts during the week.

The Museums in the Park.

WHY THEY SHOULD BE OPENED ON SUNDAY.

To the Conference Committee of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Museum of Natural History:

In presenting this petition, signed by more than nine thousand citizens of New York, I offer the following reasons why it should be granted:

I.—THE PUBLIC DESIRE FOR SUNDAY OPENING.

The petition itself is evidence that the people of this city desire the opening of the museums on Sunday. This is clearly evident from the following facts: The petition bears the signatures of the representative men of this city—those who, from their eminent position, come in contact daily with hundreds of their fellow-citizens. Among the signers, I call your attention to such men as Roscoe Conkling, the eminent jurist and ex-Senator of this state. Also:

David McAdam, Chief Justice City Court of New York; Recorder Frederick Smyth (Court of General Sessions); Charles P. Daly, Chief Justice Court of Common Pleas; Nathaniel Jarvis, Chief Clerk Court of Common Pleas; Maurice J. Power, Judge 1st Police Court; Michael Norton, Judge 1st Judicial District Court; Charles M. Clancy, Justice 2d District Civil Court; Alfred Steckler, Judge 4th Judicial District Court; John Henry McCarthy, Judge 5th District Court; G. W. Cregier, Secretary 6th District Police Court; F. G. Gedney, Judge 8th District Court; Henry P. McGown, Justice 9th Judicial District Court; J. Henry Ford, Judge Court of Special Sessions; J. T. Kilbreth, Judge Court of Special Sessions; Thoms Boese, Chief Clerk Superior Court; Randolph B. Martine, District Attorney; William N. Penney, Assistant District Attorney; Delancey Nicol, Assistant District Attorney; Gunning S. Bedford, Assistant District Attorney; Ambrose H. Purdy, Assistant District Attorney; Julius Catlin, Jr., Assistant District Attorney; Edward L. Parris, Assistant District Attorney; John M. Coman, Chief Clerk District Attorney's Office; John Sparks, Clerk General Sessions; S. B. French (President), Police Commissioner; J. J. Porter, Police Commissioner; John R. Voorhis, Police Commissioner; E. Duyfous; Thomas W. Byrnes, Police Inspector; William H. Kipp, Chief Clerk Police Commissioners; Carl Jussen, Secretary Fire Department; G. F. Britton, Secretary Department of Charities and Corrections; Rollin M. Squire, Commissioner Public Works; D. Lowber Smith, Deputy Commissioner Public Works; John H. Chambers, Registrar (Water) Dept. P. W; Joseph Blumenthal, Supt. Bureau of Incumbrances; Martin J. Reese, Keeper of Buildings in City Hall Park; Adolph L. Sanger, President of the Board of Alderman; Jacob Seabold, Deputy Commissioner Department Street Cleaning; M. J. Morrison, Chief Clerk Department Street Cleaning; Michael Coleman, President Department Taxes and Assessments; Alston Culver, Water Purveyor Department Public Works; Charles H. Woodman, Secretary and Executiv Officer Civil Service Supervisory and Examining Board; Ferdinand Levy, Coroner; Ambrose Monell, Judge 7th Judicial District Court; William Dorsheimer, United States District Attorney; H. A. Gildersleeve, Judge General Sessions; Congressman Joseph Pulitzer; and others who signed with them.

In returning the petition sent to him, Judge Norton says:

I herewith return your paper with a few names, together with my own, as fully approving the good work that your Union is doing in behalf of the great body of workers of our city that have been deprived of so many of their rights.

And I would particularly call your attention to this sentiment of Justice Gedney of the 8th District Court:

I am a strong believer in the law of substitution—one thing for another; and while men are educating themselves by studying works of art and good books, they certainly are not occupied in matters which destroy them; but in museums and libraries they learn that which elevates them and makes them better citizens. We must not blame men who lead wicked lives if they know of no other.

The press is almost unanimous. The Herald has printed many columns in favor of the movement, as have the Times, the World, the News, the Evening Post, and scores of the smaller journals have been outspoken in favor of the Sunday opening. This in itself is the strongest kind of evidence that the public desire the Sunday opening. The business men are in favor of the same. This is evidenced by the expression in the public press of their opinions by the best business men of the city, and by their signatures to this petition. Upon the petition with Roscoe Conkling's name you will find some eight hundred of the best men doing business in the city—men who have families, who are identified with the city's interest, and may be supposed to know what is good for the municipality. This Sunday opening has been asked for officially by the Board of Aldermen, by the Park Commissioners, and by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment. In addition to these, as I have shown you, are nearly all the judges of the city, the District Attorney, and all his assistants—gentlemen of the highest standing in the legal community—the Police Commissioners, and a large portion of the most prominent of the city officials. Surely, the opinion and prayer of all these must have great weight with you. You may safely conclude they would not ask for Sunday opening did they not regard it as of importance to the city's welfare.

The workingmen desire it, and have expressed the desire by numerous resolutions and signatures. I have received from the Central Labor Union an official resolution of which the following is a copy:

WHEREAS, It being a standing complaint that the working population do not show sufficient interest in matters of refinement and culture; and

WHEREAS, It being impossible for workingmen and women to visit the public places established for the purpose of furnishing all with the means by which their knowledge and appreciation of such things may be increased, largely because on the only days when the working people have the opportunity for such diversion and improvement the libraries, museums, and art gallleres are closed; and

WHEREAS, The working people have to contribute the large share toward the maintenance of these public institutions; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, as representatives of many thousands of these unpriviledged men and women, hereby demand that all public libraries, museums, and art galleries be kept open on Sundays and holidays.

The Central Labor Union is the official representativ of 121 workingmen's organizations, numbering some 50,000 workmen. In addition to this are the resolutions of similar purport passed by the Labor Lyceum, the Furriers' Union, the Furniture Makers' Union, the Engineer Hoisters, the Cabinet Makers' Union, Father Mathews Society, and others.

Upon one petition, which I present to-day for your consideration, you will find the names of about one thousand piano makers, employers as well as employees, among them Chas. H. Steinway, Felip Kramer, N. Stetson, Hazelton Brothers, Horace Waters, Otto Koch, Messrs. Sohmer & Co., Henry C. Becker, Henry Betz, A. Weber & Co., J. & C. Fisher, Haines Brothers, Kranich & Bach, and others. Indeed, the whole piano trade is fully represented, and they ask as a unit for Sunday opening. But I will not weary you with pointing out in detail the quality of this petition. Taken as a whole, it is indisputable evidence that the people of this city desire Sunday opening. There is, however, one thing I would impress upon you—that no elaborate effort has been made to secure signers; no money has been spent except for printing and distribution; no canvassers have been employed. A much larger number of names might have been secured by this means, if thought desirable. The object of those who circulated the petition has, however, been accomplished—namely, the obtaining of undeniable proof that the inhabitants of this city desire the opening of the museums on Sunday.

Perhaps, however, I may be allowed to state that many clergymen, like Heber Newton, Robert Collyer, Theodore Williams, George Rainsford, and others, have signed this petition, and spoken from their pulpits in favor of Sunday opening of the museums. And I would remind you also of the petition you have on file, presented some two years ago, signed by 12,000 of our German citizens. This should not be lost sight of. The evidence, I think you will admit, is overwhelming of a very great desire on the part of the people of this city that the institutions under your care shall be opened to the public on Sunday.

II.—THE JUSTICE OF THE PETITION.

The next point for your consideration is the simple justice of what these petitioners desire. If the museums were private institutions sustained by private donations, we should have no right to present this petition. But these are semi-public institutions, sustained principally from the public treasury. Those who have signed the petition have contributed toward the support of these institutions, therefore, they are part owners of these institutions, and they have a right to ask for themselves the largest benefit from these institutions.

The city has contracted on account of these museums a debt of nearly one million dollars ($958,000). You have received the buildings and the land. The city also contributes $30,000 per year for running expenses, and to this must be added the $54,530 for interest on museum stock, making a total of $84,530 which the museums cost the taxpayers of the city every year. I would like to call your attention to this a little more in detail, for the benefit of some of you, who perhaps have not thought upon the matter very closely. A statement has been made recently by the honorable president of the American Museum of Natural History that that institution had received up to January 1, 1885, only $110,722.99 from the city as against $320,115.19 from other sources. Now, if you will bear with me a moment, I will show how that in this statement justice is scarcely done to the city. As no doubt you are aware, the issue of stock on account of these museums is in three issues (due in 1903):

	Principal.	Interest.
At 4 per cent.....	$2,000.00	$80.00
At 5 "	291,000.00	14,550.00
At 6 "	665,000.00	39,900.00
Total.....	$958,000.00	$54,530.00

Saying nothing of the value of the land, this shows you that, as I have said, New York is now paying interest on $958,000 worth of bonds, representing money given to the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History. I do not know precisely how this has been divided between the two, but as the Metropolitan Museum received one year $162,500 for enlarging the building, I have presumed, for the sake of the argument, that the Natural History Museum has received that much less than the Metropolitan Museum. Taking the $162,500 from the $958,000 given to both leaves $795,500 divided equally. This would give the Museum of Natural History $397,750. Add to this the $110,722.99 which is acknowledged having been received from the city up to January 1, 1885, and we have $508,472.99, against $320,115.19 received from all other sources. It will be seen, therefore, that instead of the city having paid but a little more than one-quarter of the expense of the Museum of Natural History, it has paid nearly two-thirds of the total expense of building and running the museum.

Of course, if the Metropolitan Museum of Art has received more than $162,500 in excess of what the Museum of Natural History has received, my figures must be changed by that excess. But I trust it is sufficiently plain that the honorable president of the Museum of Natural History misled—unintentionally, of course—the public upon this point. Again, as to the support of the Museum of Natural History, the honorable president divides that as follows:

The city.....	$15,000
Subscription of members.....	4,000
Paid by trustees.....	6,000
Total.....	$25,000

This showing is, of course, accurate. By it we see, however, at once that the city pays three-fifths of the running expenses of the Museum of Natural History. Surely, that entitles the citizens to the benefit of the institution. And on the total cost of maintaining both museums, the city pays $84,530.00, as against some $20,000 paid by members and the trustees.

Further, the Legislature of 1884 and 1885 authorized the city to issue bonds for nearly a quarter of a million of dollars more. These bonds have not yet been sold, owing to the low rate of interest guaranteed, and it is probable that the rate may be increased. If so, and these bonds are marketed, the city will have to pay annually several thousands of dollars more for the support of the museums.

I submit it to you if this does not entitle the tax-payers, as a matter of simple justice, to the opportunity to visit these institutions on the one only day when a very large proportion of them can find the time. The annual public outlay upon these institutions is very large, and the people should hav adequate return. Every citizen has certain rights which cannot be ignored. Those who sign this petition are asking for a right, not for privilege. They have paid their money, they have an ownership in the museums. To refuse to grant their petition is an injustice; it is a denial to the tax-payers of the utmost return for what they are compelled to pay into the public treasury. In many cases there is no return at all, for there are thousands out of whose hard earnings the treasury is supplied who can visit the museums only on Sunday. Unless there is a mighty reason found in public policy for the closing of the museums on Sunday, then they should be open. There is no other course to pursue.

III.—PUBLIC GOOD.

I would also give as further reason for the opening of the museums on Sunday, that it is a public good. It is for the benefit of the whole community, and not for the injury of any. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one is disturbed. Those who wish to enjoy the museums can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and therefore, the only standard by which we can decide in that of public virtue.

That which enlarges the mind, that which cultivates the sense of beauty, that which ennobles human history, that which relieves from weariness and drudgery, that which gives innocent pleasure, that which entertains and instructs, that which brings people together, that which emphasizes and illuminates the highest part of our being—that is for the good of humanity on all days. No day can be set apart for anything higher than that. The museums do this on Wednesdays, Thursdays, Fridays, and Saturdays; they will do this on Sunday also, and with greater effect, for there will be greater numbers upon whom these fine influences can work.

Those who go to the museums on Sunday will not go to immoral places of amusement, as perhaps they now do; but whether the visitors to the museums on Sunday come from the church or from the indifferent class who go to neither, or from the crowded tenement house, or the luxurious home, they will receive only that which is for mental and moral improvement. Every argument for the existence of a museum at all, for its opening on any day, is an argument for Sunday opening.

That which is benign, beautiful, instructive, and ennobling on Saturday is equally so on Sunday. The laws of Nature do not change on Sunday, neither do the laws of human welfare and progress. If it is not public policy to open these museums on Sunday, then it certainly is not public policy to open them at all.

IV.—IT WILL BENEFIT THE MUSEUMS.

Let me further say, what I think you will all acknowledge, that Sunday opening will be of incalculable benefit to the museums themselves. It is our earnest wish that you have more multiplied instrumentalities, so that these museums in every respect may be equal to the best in the world. In order, however, to accomplish this you must create a vast popular interest. The people must know what you are doing. In order to be interested in the works of art, the people must see them as often as possible. The taste is cultivated by the vision, as Rousseau says. There must be the amplest opportunity for observation. There are multitudes in our city who know scarcely anything about the museums, because they have never visited them. They can only visit them on Sunday. Many of them come to the park on Sunday, but the doors of the museums are closed against them; they do not know what is within their walls. Under these circumstances how can you expect a lively interest in the welfare of these institutions? I speak not only of the working people of this city, but of the prosperous business men also. You know the enormous demands of trade; the business man has no leisure, however cultivated his taste, to visit the museum on week days. Not seeing them, only reading about them, his interest, which is simply that of his judgment, will flag. Let him visit the museums, let him become personally interested in its treasures because he looks upon them with his own eyes, and his interest will become enthusiasm, and his benefactions will flow to your support. With this thorough acquaintanceship among all the people of this city with your admirable undertaking, do you not see immensely improved capabilities for excellence? The city will cheerfully give of its funds when millions are the appreciative recipients of your labors, and the benefactions of the wealthy will largely increase. Then will there be a demand which cannot be refused for larger and better means for your enterprise. You must build these museums, I say, in the life, the affection, and the taste of the whole people.

The population of this city needs education in art. There is nothing so stimulating as art, there is nothing which so relieves the drudgery of toil. The people need the museums, and the museums need the people; they need the interest of the people, they need the knowledge of the people. How can this knowledge be acquired? Art cannot be told; in order to appreciate Art one must come and see.

Sunday is the supreme day for thus receiving this personal knowledge. It is the rest-day, the joy-day of the week. No other day is like it, no other day can be like it. It has been consecrated by human history to the ennoblement of man—of man as a worker. The fundamental use of the day from the very beginning is physical recreation. It is for the cessation of labor in order that labor may be a dignity and a joy.

No other day can have such wealth of leisure, be so free from anxiety. It is the day above all days for art, and music, and poetry. It is the day above all days when the museums can be brought into most fruitful contact with the people, when they can exert their greatest influence. If you have the interest of the museums at heart, how can you refuse the golden opportunity of the Sunday for the making of those conditions whereby you benefit millions of people, and whereby these millions return to you almost unbounded means of growth.

The public treasury and the private purse will not be stinted in their supplies, if you thus completely fulfil the demands of justice and public policy, for Sunday opening.

The reasons I have thus given—namely, the desire of the people—the justice and the wise public policy of it, and the incalculable benefit which must result to the museums by so doing—these reasons, I think, are simply overwhelming unless some valid objections exist. Allow me to state the objections which have been made, and which, it seems to me, have no weight when fairly considered.

V.—NO BREACH OF CONTRACT.

It is said that it would be a breach of contract to open the museums on Sunday. To this I say that if there were such a contract it should be changed, for it is a limitation of the rights of the tax-payers of the city. A new contract should be made on the basis of the equal claims of all. There is, however, no such contract. Sundays are excepted by the contract, but an exception is not a prohibition. You are not compelled to open the museums on Sundays as you are on some other days, neither are you compelled to shut the doors. Plainly the matter is left to your own discretion. If the city had the power to open on Sunday we should not bring this petition to you; there would be no need of it. By the terms of the contract we are obliged to appeal to your good sense in the matter, and this we have done. If we can give reasons sufficient to convince your minds that Sunday opening is wise, you can do as you think wise to do; the contract does not say nay. It prevents compulsion, and leaves you to a voluntary act. The evenings are excepted as well as Sunday, and evening opening is suggested by your president to take the place of Sunday opening; but if the contract does not forbid evening opening, how can it forbid Sunday opening? Is not one as well as the other entirely within your choice? For good and sufficient reason you can open on evenings, for good and sufficient reason you can also open on Sunday. This, it seems to me, is the only interpretation that can be made of the contract.

It is said that many donations have been made to the museums with the implied, though not expressed, understanding that they should be closed on Sunday.

The museums, I affirm, should not accept gifts with such conditions attached. The people of New York have contributed the land and the buildings, and large appropriations from year to year, and they have rights in this matter which should be strictly regarded along with the rights of donors. The donors cannot claim that because they have given something to the museums, therefore, the museum buildings should be shut. They have not given the building, and have no control over that. If they still have some sort of control over their gifts, they can either take them away, or refuse to have them exhibited at the Sunday opening. If they ought not to be exposed on Sunday, they ought not to be exposed on any other day. If it hurts the feelings of the donors to have them exhibited on Sunday, they can be covered up, or placed in a room by themselves, which can be kept locked and guarded on the forbidden day. This is the only just way to settle the matter, if the gifts are not full and free gifts to the people, and are not to be used for the greatest good of the greatest number.

VI.—THE EXPENSE.

Again, it is objected that the additional expense is a very great difficulty in the way of Sunday opening. The additional expense of Sunday opening would not, however, be any greater than that of evening opening. I think that to open one or two evenings in the week, with the cost of electric lights, etc., would be far more expensive than Sunday opening, without giving by any means the same satisfaction.

Sunday opening, as I have shown, will create far more interest among the people—not only among the working people, but business and wealthy people—and you will receive a far larger amount of private donations, besides a more cheerful giving from the city itself. I am satisfied that if you will simply declare by resolution that the additional expense is the only difficulty in the way of Sunday opening, that difficulty will be very easily overcome.

VII.—THE HALF-HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

Again, it is objected that Sunday opening would weaken the movement in favor of the Saturday half-holiday. I do not see how it could do so. But even if it did, that fact would not make less imperative the reasons for Sunday opening already stated.

These reasons stand of themselves. The reasons also for the Saturday half-holiday are just as strong, whether the museums are open or shut on Sunday. The right use of Sunday is one question, and the right use of Saturday is another. The movement in favor of the Saturday half-holiday is based upon its relation to other working days, and not upon its relation to Sunday.

It might as well be urged that Fourth of July, or Decoration Day, would be less observed on account of Sunday opening as that the Saturday half-holiday would be less desirable, or that the interest in it would be less strong for the same reason. We may safely assume that what makes the Sunday more beneficial to labor will have the same influence for Saturday. There is no antagonism between a cheerful Sunday and a cheerful Saturday.

In this connection, let me refer to the proposition made that on week-day evenings and Saturday half-holidays the working people can visit the museums, and that this obviates the necessity for Sunday opening. It strikes me that the working people cannot visit the museums with any great satisfaction or profit on week-day evenings. They have to labor until six o'clock, then travel, many of them, two or three miles to their homes, eat their suppers, and dress, and they cannot reach the museums until eight or nine o'clock. and they reach them with jaded bodies and minds. The same objection lies against any large benefit to be derived from visiting the museums on the Saturday half-holiday. The working people are at their task until twelve or one o'clock. They cannot go home, dress, and reach the museums until two or three o'clock. The museums close half an hour before sunset. At the utmost, they have only an hour or two on Saturday for visiting the museums, while on Sunday they can have several hours, and with them the strength and freshness of the day. The very heart and core of the day can be given to Sunday visiting, while on other days it is only "the ragged edges" that they can use.

The wealth of art, the treasures of science, the wonderful lessons of human history, cannot be received in any such hurried manner. Art, as the poet says, is long; it requires leisure, study, and contemplation and meditation. There must be a thorough assimilation into the mental system of all that one looks upon.

This requires time and attention, the choicest moments of the mind and body.

Even, however, if the week-day evenings and Saturday half-holiday could be made thoroughly beneficial for museum visiting, the Sunday problem is not solved. The day still remains a day of leisure to be filled up with something. Thousands of people will not go to church, and you cannot compel them to go. Will you have these working people stay in their homes?

In winter they cannot go forth and enjoy nature—will you forbid them the pleasures of art?

The working people must do something on Sunday. They will not stay at home, they will not go to church. They must go somewhere. They ask for bread; will you give them a stone—the closed and barred doors of this building which they themselves have helped to build, in which you imprison the angels of human good, which might do incalculable service to the toiling millions of this city? You push men from these doors. Where do they go? Frequently to immoral places. Are you ready to assume this responsibility?

It is affirmed that the working people do not desire Sunday opening. This petition is absolute proof to the contrary, and the assertion needs no further answer.

VIII.—ENGLISH OPINION.

The opinions of English working people and English newspapers and politicians have been quoted for our instruction. To this I reply that they can decide for themselves and we must decide for ourselves, according to the different circumstances in which we are placed—as we did in the days of the Revolution. If we had followed the no doubt honest convictions of English working people and English newspapers and politicians, the battle of Lexington would never have been fought, and the stars and stripes would never have floated. Then, as now, the fact that a thing is "so English, you know," is not a conclusive argument in its favor. However, the English working people are not a unit on this question, and there are facts to show that many of them do favor Sunday opening. I quote the following from the London Truth:

> The Manchester Art Gallery was last Sunday thrown open to the public free of charge, and over twelve thousand artisans availed themselves of the opportunity of visiting it. These numbers speak for themselves, and prove strongly that the working people are only too glad to improve their minds when the chance is given them on a day on which they have a few hours to call their own.

I am perfectly willing to follow our English cousins in such an experiment as this. Throw open the doors, and see if the working-people will not enter. There is no surer way of discovering their wishes.

IX.—THE "REST-DAY" ARGUMENT.

Again, it is objected that Sunday opening will destroy the Sunday as a "rest-day," and make it a working day. I affirm that the tendency would be exactly opposite and would make it more impossible for the Sunday ever to become a day of labor. The more beautiful you make the Sunday, the more attractive, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that greedy employers will ever have the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. I do not object to calling the Sunday a "rest-day." I prefer to call it a joy-day; but rest in the true sense of the term is joy. It is not lassitude, it is not doing nothing at all, it is not mere sleep, it is change of activity. In this sense the Sunday is a "rest-day," and in this sense the people will always preserve it as a rest-day.

It is affirmed in President Jesup's pamphlet that "going to museums, poring over books, amusements of every sort, improving the mind, are equally pernicious as hard work." If this is so, then in the same breath we must affirm that going to church and listening to sermons and prayers is equally as pernicious as hard work.

If you shut up the museums for the sake of rest, then shut up the churches also; lock the doors, stay at home, sleep all day long. Is this the rest that is needed? Of course not. Man is so constituted that he must be active. Inaction is not rest, and no one argues in favor of a completely inactive Sunday. It is action to go to church, to Sunday-school, to the Bible-class, to the prayer-meeting; to those who like it, it is rest; to those who do not, it is the hardest kind of labor, and Monday's toil is a relief from its weariness. If you insist upon absolute rest, then shut up the churches with the museums. It requires as much intellectual labor to attend religious services as to read in a library, or go through a museum. I do not think that any of you would argue in favor of those who go to church to sleep; you believe in listening to the sermon, no matter how knotty the point with which it deals, and exercising the mind by following its thought.

The church, therefore, by its very nature opposes itself to absolute rest. If you make an exception to absolute rest in favor of church-going, by what authority do you there draw the line? If you say that some kinds of activity are restful, I assert that others are equally so, and that a rest-day, therefore, is a day of action, and it is for each man to decide what kind of action contains for him the most rest.

You cannot object to the opening of museums on the ground that to do so would break the perfect rest of Sunday, for the same argument would bolt and bar every church-door in the land.

There are secular rest-days as well as religious rest-days. A secular rest-day is not necessarily a working day. The Fourth of July is a secular day, but it is not a working day, and never will be. So far as the state is concerned, the Sunday is a secular rest-day, that is, a rest-day for the benefit of the people here and now. There should be as much rest on Sunday as is compatible with civilization; but men must still think; they must go from place to place; there cannot be a complete cessation of work, but there must be an opportunity for change of mental and physical activity, and that culture afforded by which one can realize that he belongs to humanity, however humble his toil, and that the greatest achievements of humanity in art, and science, and history are for his benefit and ennoble him with every other.

X.—SUNDAY OPENING WILL DIMINISH VICE.

Again, it is said that the demand for Sunday opening of the museums will be followed by a demand for opening of theaters, saloons, etc. To this I reply that the museums are entirely different from the theaters and saloons in their relations to society, in the reason of their being, and in the desires which they gratify. The theaters and saloons are private affairs, and we can make no demand upon them; we have no claims upon them; the proprietors can run them for their own benefit provided they obey the regulations of the muncipality. If the theaters and saloons were supported by public funds, we should certainly demand that they be used for the public good; but as they are not, we have not the slightest demand to make upon them; in the very nature of their relations to society no demand can be made upon them.

The museums are public institutions, supported by public funds, and for that reason we make this demand, and for the reason that they are one of the greatest instrumentalities that can be brought into play to lessen the number of those who go to unlawful places. We ask for opening of the institutions under your care for the very purpose of diminishing the custom of those places which are open every Sunday, thousands of them throughout the city, in spite of the law, and it is to aid law and public virtue that we ask for your assistance. Are you not convinced in your own minds, if these museums are open on Sunday, and twelve or fifteen thousand visit them, or twenty-five thousand, or one hundred thousand, as we hope will some day come, that thereby you have taken a vast number from the city slums? The influences here are altogether elevating, and the museums will be the most potent enemy of immoral resorts. Will you refuse with such a noble power in your hands to be the ally of this community in its struggle with gigantic vices?

It is admitted that Sunday opening is harmless in itself—so says Archbishop Corrigan, so says Bishop Doane, so says the New York Sabbath Committee. It is objected, however, that it produces evil. This objection cannot be maintained; the very moment one admits the essential harmlessness of Sunday opening he surrenders everything; there can no longer be a particle of valid opposition. What is harmless in itself must be harmless in its results; it can be nothing else. If evil comes, it must come from other sources. What underlies this objection? It is the assumption that the people of New York cannot govern themselves; that they are unfit to have an innocent pleasure. Such an objection is an arraignment of the virtue and intelligence of the people of this city; it is saying to them, You are so desperately wicked that art and science cannot open to you their treasure-houses on Sunday.

It is impossible to decide as to the right or wrong of anything if we allow ourselves to go beyond the essential character and regard the thousand possible consequences which might arise because of the evil in the world. Of course, we must study consequences, but only natural consequences, those which result from the thing itself. You have a right to consider the natural consequences of the Sunday opening of the museums, but not what might be done in regard to other things for different reasons. One thing might follow another without any possible relation of effect to cause.

XI.—THE DESIGN OF THIS PETITION..

It has been stated by some that there is an ulterior design in the presentation of this petition, that there is a subtle conspiracy to use this petition as a means to an end. This I deny. The petition stands for itself and nothing more. The thousands who sign it have differing opinions and purposes upon many other subjects, but this makes no argument for or against the petition; that stands upon its own merits and appeals to you with its own reasons. In considering it you have no right to surmise other purposes and opinions on other things that have no connection with this. I have argued this question on grounds common to all. I believe that you will have the wisdom to take up and decide simply the question before you, the question of opening the museums on Sunday. Neither my opinions nor the opinions of the petitioners on other subjects are before you for approval or condemnation. Citizens of every variety of belief, of the widest divergence of thought, have united in this prayer to you, which is for the universal good.

XII.—THE EXPERIMENT SHOULD BE MADE.

I think I have answered all the objections fairly, and none of them when analyzed seems to have the slightest weight; and the reasons I have presented, appealing to your judgment and to your desire for the welfare of the community, and the increased excellence of the institutions under your care, are too powerful to be refused. I do not ask you to commit yourself to a permanent policy, but simply to make an experiment; there is no other way to reach the real truth of the matter. The experiment has been tried in other cities with eminent success; certainly there is no danger where others have shown the way with such hopeful results. I ask you to try the experiment for a year. You hold in your hands a great instrumentality for the benefit of this people; you can bring light where now there is darkness; you can give knowledge where now there is ignorance; you can make noble impulse to put into the place of degrading influence; you can give joy to labor. What you choose to do will be widely and deeply felt.

In view of what is possible to be accomplished by revealing these treasures of art to those thousands who have not seen them—who cannot see them, except on Sunday—are you not willing to make the experiment?

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Liberal Club.

Last Friday was a great day for labor. The car-drivers won a strike, and in the evening when the man with the badge-pin strolled over toward the German Masonic Temple he observed that they were in a jubilant frame of mind. The horses had had a good long rest, and went up and down the street a-kiting, their harnesses ornamented with little sample American flags, stuck through the rings on the hames; and up over the drivers' heads a broom, displayed, suggested a clean sweep. The 402d regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was held at the usual place, and whenever any of the speakers desired to get a round of applause an allusion to the car-drivers' strike and the power of organized labor was all that was necessary to that end.

After the secretary had discoursed the minutes of the previous meeting according to the rules of the Delsarte school of expression, Mr. Wakeman directed the notice of his hearers to the new book on the table, namely, "The Order of Creation," published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. The chairman also spoke of the deep interest which attaches to the remarkable journey of the prophet Jonah, as illustrated in this paper. Then the speaker of the evening, Mr. C. A. Washburn, of Morristown, N. J., was introduced. Mr. Washburn is patriarchal in appearance and somewhat infirm of step. He is a brother to the Washburn who was United States minister to France. "Graduated Taxation—the Land to Pay All the Costs of Government," was the speaker's theme. He said there was tillable land enough to giv every family in the country a farm of one hundred acres; and workingmen ought to own farms instead of paying rent. It was natural for the young man and woman to mate and set up housekeeping, but the precariousness of life under the rent system discouraged them. The system of taxation which Mr. Washburn proposed would tax only land, and land would be taxed the same whether it had buildings on it or not. This would incite people to either build or get rid of their land, and then large owners must unload. The graduation he suggested would increase the rate of taxation one-tenth of one per cent for each additional ten acres acquired by land owners. This was the central idea of the lecturer, and his discourse was devoted to its elaboration and to argument in its support. Mr. Washburn is not a good reader and showed unfamiliarity with his manuscript. The sentences that he got through successfully, without a mistake or repetition, were the exceptions, and these exceptions were heartily applauded by those who were watching the struggle. It was uphill business all through. One listener would drop asleep, another would read, and another still would take out his watch and wind it up in a dreamy and absent-minded way. The lecture was replete with Biblical illustrations, involving Cain and Abel and Ahab and Naboth; and the last part was very much like the first. It was entertaining to those who took that view of it.

The president said he had heard a good deal more brilliant addresses from the Liberal Club platform than this had been; but in real, practical worth it was unexcelled. Mr. Wakeman divulged that he was himself something of an agriculturist. He owned a farm up in Connecticut, some forty miles from New York, where in summer time he communed with Mother Nature through the instrumentality of a garden rake. He pictured the life of a farmer in eloquent words. In the spring he turned up the soil and introduced the fecund seed; later on he hoed his oats with the glittering tedder; and then, when fall came, with his good right hand he dug the golden pumpkin from its earthy bed, cut it up with a shovel, and fed it to the lowing kine. With what pride does the New England farmer drive to the barn with his load of rustling corn! With what precision does he knock down a post going through the bars, and with what unchanging regularity does he get stuck trying to drive into the barn floor! Then, again, there are the evenings spent in reading the patent insides of the county Prevaricator, or discussing the question whether corn should be hilled up or not at the first hoeing. Every one having an income sufficient to afford it should be a farmer.

Robert Blizzard took a less roseate view of the granger's life. He had lived on a farm himself when he was young, and he would be damned if he wanted any more of it. He had to get up before it was early in the morning, and work until after it was late, to make four acres and a half support a family of eleven. Reforms were not to be brought about by putting men on farms, but by the Knights of Labor and boycotting.

Lawyer Searing reproved Mr. Blissert for some of his expressions. Mr. Washburn, the speaker thought, belonged to a previous generation, and was not abreast of the rushing present. As for farming, Mr. Searing had been a farmer too himself. He had also been a mechanic, and he desired to testify that the farmer worked harder and more hours, and got less return for it, than any other workman.

Madame Delescluze gave a history of civilization, brief but as comprehensiv as could be expected under the circumstances, and told how in various instances liberty had been achieved by the "destructionists," as the Socialists and Communists were called. The popular conception of a Socialist was an idiot with a torch, bent on destruction. This was erroneous. Socialists were not all idiots. There were exceptions.

Dr. Weeks followed, but before he could get under way the heft of the audience went home, and probably will never know, until their eye falls on this with a dull thud, that they missed the best speech of the evening, as the writer learns from the secretary.

Mr. Langerfeld, it is further recorded by the secretary, followed Dr. Weeks, and then, by request, Mr. Wakeman, in behalf of the lecturer, replied to the criticism.

The man with the badge-pin, as he sailed serenely and leisurely home, pondered upon the things which he had heard, and made to himself a great speech. He has spoken to others on the subject, and finds it an almost universal fact that a person can make a better speech to himself than he can to an audience. It is unknown how many weighty problems hav been solved in this way. It is not given to us all, responsiv to the public call, to win forensic glory, but, with a badge-pin on our vest, we can assemble with the rest, and hear the oratory. 'Tis ours to catch the burning thought in words of wisdom to us brought, and quite the proper caper to hear what all the speakers say, then write it out another day, and put it in the paper.

At the next meeting, Mr. Remsburg, of Kansas, will address the club, and an interesting meeting is assured. As Mr. Wakeman says, Mr. Remsburg never speaks in vain, nor do his hearers listen in vain. On the 19th, Dr. J. N. Beegle speaks on "Hydrophobia: an Inquiry and Theory as to its Origin;" and on the 26th, "The Iniquities of Modern Journalism," will be discussed by Augustus A. Levey.

Socialism Alleged to be Atheistic.

From a sermon by the Rev. Edwin Brown, of Providence, R. I.

Socialism, as a political and industrial system, whether of the state or Anarchist type, is avowedly antichristian and largely Atheistic. This is affirmed, not now to condemn Socialism, but only to characterize it. This is not said as characterizing all who call themselvs Socialists. But in the sense in which we hav heretofore defined Socialism this statement is true of Socialism in its philosophic basis, in its predominate tone, and as judged by the utterances and the practices of its recognized leaders. Socialism regards the church as the French Revolutionists regarded it—an instrument for the oppression of the masses, for the soothing of conscience, for the lulling into quietude of all manly discontent; a thing so entangled with these institutions which democracy assails that it is compelled "to reject the equality which it professes to love, and to curse, as a foe, that cause of liberty which it might hallow by its alliance." "We want no church," cries the typical Socialist. Down with the church! Away with Christianity! The priests, the preachers, are worse than drones in society. They are deceivers. They are oppressors. They are the allies of the money tyrants who are growing fat upon the blood and toil of the poor. They are the hired defenders of the accursed system of wages slavery! At a large religious conference in Berlin, Dr. Rocholl, of Cologne, in a paper on "What Does the Social Democracy Preach to the Church?" said: "Social Democracy is irreligious; it wants to abolish God, and to retain Christ only as the first Social Democrat." No Socialist leader has contradicted this statement. In a discussion in Berlin between Christian Socialists and Social Democrats, one of the latter, now a noisy propagandist in America, said: "The Social Democracy will not recede; it will pursue its course and accomplish its design, even though all priestdom should rise against it, like a cloud of locusts thick enough to darken the sun. The Social Democracy knows that the days of Christianity are numbered, and that the time is not far distant when we shall say to its priests, 'Settle your account with heaven, for your hour is come.'" A woman speaker said: "My religion is Socialism, and it alone is truth, morality, justice, and brotherhood. Down with the priests of every robe and every hue. The first reform to be accomplished is to change all churches into good habitations for workingmen." There is no mistaking the meaning of this language. This is unmistakable hostility. This is the attitude toward the church of large numbers of workingmen in Europe, and of no insignificant number in America.

Anarchy and Pantarchy.

From Liberty.

The article of J. Wm. Lloyd in Liberty of December 26th is so strikingly clear in its discrimination, so strong in its conclusions, and so fairly open to counter-statement when wrong, that I am tempted to say a word from my own point of view. The expressions that I wish to criticise are these:

And this question of human right must be studied from the standpoint of the individual, Nature having made no collectiv reason to attend to the needs of humanity, but only individual reasons to the needs of individuals. And this is the true staudpoint from which to study the needs of humanity. Those reformers who hav endeavored to legislate for the individual from the standpoint of humanity hav usually only succeeded by their jack-o'-lanterns in leading him into deeper swamps, from which he must extricate himself as best he may. But no reformer ever secured justice for any single man without benefiting all men for all time. The simple truth is grander than the most glorious error. But there is no real conflict here. From a philosophical elevation the needs of the individual and of the race are seen to be identical. Why, then, is it not as well to take humanity for a starting-point as to take the individual? Because the only way to adequately understand the needs of the whole is to understand the needs of the parts.

That Nature has made no collectiv reason to attend to the needs of all humanity, but only individual reasons to attend to the needs of individuals, is a statement that may be permitted to stand, in its first branch as to the absence of a collectiv reason—although this may be and is questioned—but that the individual reasons hav no other functions than to attend to the needs of individuals is demurred to. Our individual reasons hav, on the contrary, two opposit things to attend to—one the needs of individuals, and, second, the needs of the collectiv whole; and hence to study the needs of humanity from the point of view of individuals is no more the true standpoint than the other; and finally, there is, third, the point of intermediation and reconciliation between the other two.

When Mr. Lloyd appeals to the failure of legislativ reforms in the past, from the standpoint of humanity, he ceases to be the philosophical thinker, and becomes only the commentator upon the bungling facts of an unscientific historical past. He returns to his character as a thinker when he says "no reformer ever secured justice for any single man without benefiting all men for all time." That is true, not literally, but ideally; but it is just as true that no reformer would ever attain to and promulgate a just system of the collectiv truths of humanity without ideally benefiting all the individuals of all time.

But he adds: "There is no real conflict here. From a philosophical elevation the needs of the individual and of the race are seen to be identical." This is a radical mistake. It is precisely at this point that Mr. Lloyd and nearly every other approximately radical thinker slide away from the demands of rigorous logical analysis, and fall into error. There is a very real conflict between the two things. From a still higher philosophical elevation the needs of the individual and the needs of the race are seen to be never identical, but always in opposition to each other. They are, however, reconcilable, and it belongs to social science to reconcile them. The first step in doing this is to recognize their separateness and oppositness, to draw, in a word, rigorously the line of difference between identity and reconcilableness. They concern the same subject-matter as viewed from the two opposit ends of the stick, and can never be made one, although we, in our consideration of them, may harmoniously oscillate between the two. If two points approximate each other until they occupy the same position, they are identified, or become one, obliterating their difference. This is identity. But if the two points remain distinct they are always antagonistic, each asserting its supremacy, or giving emphasis to itself, and endeavoring to subordinate the other. Anything to be at all must assert itself, as against the whole universe, and is therefore in essential antagonism with whatsoever it is contrasted. It is only, then, by inserting an intermediate point around which they shall oscillate, admitting the element of time, change of the point of view, or continuous alternation, which is the method of harmony—an immensely different thing from mere identity, and the comprehension of which makes the true or integral philosopher in the place of the partisan or mere social sectarian, although this last is the more effectiv man for the special occasion. Whosoever fails to do this and givs a supreme emphasis to one or the other end of the stick or beam cants it, and himself is dealing in cant, however philosophical and discriminating he may seem to be. It is not with the compulsion of legislation that we are now to compare the freedom of Anarchy, but with the supreme compulsion of philosophical analysis, definition, and demonstration, to all which Mr. Lloyd should himself, with his order of mind, be eminently amenable. It is this oscillation of harmony between the principle of freedom and the principle of order, which Pantarchism contrasts with Anarchism pure and simple.

It is not true that the only way to adequately understand the needs of the whole is to understand the needs of the parts. It is just as true that to adequately understand the needs of the parts it is indispensable to comprehend the needs of the whole, and to take always as one of our points of departure the Unities of the Race, in respect to Religion, Government, Social Constitution, Language, and the like; in a word, to be Pantarchical in our outlook no less than Anarchical.

The question may arise, Why is it necessary to make so much ado about an abstract discrimination like that between identification, which wipes out or slurs over differences, and harmony, which reconciles them? The reply is perhaps now obvious from the illustrations that hav been made. But it should be added that in matters of this kind the least things are the greatest things, and the minutest lines of discrimination the most important from their consequences. In this case the mere failure to comprehend this difference between sameness and difference with reconciliation leaves Individualists insusceptible to the claims of the Higher Integration; while, with it understood and adopted, they become at once amenable to the whole immense scope of Pantarchal philosophy. If, then, "Christianity says, Carry neither sword nor shield, and Anarchy says, Carry your sword for protection, and use it only when your shield will not avail," then Pantarchy says, Do one or both according to exigency and adaptation; and whenever the time has arrived, "beat your swords into plowshares, and your spears into pruning-hooks, and learn war no more;" that is to say, become peaceful social reconstructionists, instead of either victims or soldiers in revolt, and to that end study and avail yourselvs of Universological Sociology.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

Canadian Notes.

At a meeting of the Central Executiv of the Canadian Secular Union, held in Toronto, Friday evening, January 22, 1886, the following resolutions were carried unanimously:

Resolved, That the Canadian Secular Union should make some provision to carry out the last wishes of deceased Secularists and Freethinkers in the matter of their funeral rites and ceremonies. That suitable persons be selected who will be willing to officiate on such occasions—in any part of Canada where their services may be required—without fee, provided only that their traveling expenses be paid. That a fund should be raised from which such expenses may be paid in cases where the family of deceased is left in destitute circumstances.

Resolved, That a propagandist fund should be raised so that lecturers of ability may be sent into those sections of Canada where the Secularists and Freethinkers are so few in number that they cannot afford to pay all the lecturer's fee and expenses.

Resolved, That the president, Mr. William Algie, of Alton, Ontario, be a committee of one to solicit subscriptions throughout Canada, to be applied to the purposes named in the foregoing resolutions.

Applications made to Wm. Algie, Alton, or J. A. Risser, Toronto, for some suitable person to officiate at funerals on the foregoing terms will be promptly attended to.

The different religious bodies of Toronto seem determined to make it the holy city, the Mecca, as it were, of Canada.

Montreal has long laid claim to that proud distinction, but alas! "how are the mighty fallen." On last Monday the people of that city elected for a second term the first Freethought mayor ever elected to that office in any Canadian town.

Just think of it, Montreal, the city of Jesuit cathedrals, colleges, and churches, of nunneries, convents, grottoes, and shrines, of holy water and sacred wells, priestly fraud and magic spells, where it used to be said "that one couldn't throw a stick out of the window without hitting a priest!" We hav heard of Atheistical popes and skeptical monks and bishops, but a Freethought mayor in the most Catholic town in America, O tempora, O mores!

How did he get there? Well, I'm told it was thuswise: It has been the custom there for some years (by mutual consent) for the English and French speaking, or, in other words, the Protestant and Catholic sections of the population to take turn and turn about in their choice of a chief magistrate.

At the time of the election a year ago, one of the parties went back on the usual arrangement, and the other party, finding there was very little chance of electing their man, went solid for the Freethought candidate, and the result was that Mr. Beaugrand was elected by a small majority. Which proves the truth of the old adage, "When rogues fall out, honest men get their due."

Mayor Beaugrand is a member of the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Association, who feel justly proud of their member.

During the past year he has proved himself the right man in the right place. His action in the matter of enforcing the sanitary laws during the late small-pox scourge, when, it may be said, nearly the whole Roman Catholic population of the city were in arms against him, shows him to be well fitted for the office, and so won the respect and esteem of the people generally that out of about 8,000 votes cast at last Monday's election he received 5,098, or a majority of nearly 2,000.

It might be well for Toronto if, by some combination of circumstances, she might be forced to try a similar experiment. A little common-sense management in the city affairs, a little less fanaticism, and a little less attention to artificial crime might make real crime less prevalent. Till-tapping, house-breaking, and all kinds of real crime go on apparently unchecked, while the whole attention of the city fathers and the religious associations is occupied in trying to enforce the Sunday laws.

In the same paper in which I read that the school board hav decided to reintroduce the Bible into the public schools, I find an account of a woman brutally murdered by a brother-in-law, who committed the act while in a fit of insanity brought on by an overstudy of the same infernal book. One more Freeman, and one more inmate of the asylums already crowded from the same cause. This sort of thing makes heart and brain grow weary, and makes one feel that a change of any kind would be a relief. "Come reason, or come chaos."

There is an old saying to the effect, "Put a beggar on horseback and he will ride to the devil." I presume it will also apply to parsons; at any rate the Toronto presbytery, having for the time being got the upper hand in municipal affairs, are riding in that or some other direction at a devil of a pace. At their last meeting the committee which had been appointed two weeks before to investigate and consider the best means for stopping Sunday railway traffic reported that they had called upon the managers of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railways, who had informed them that "they could not compete with East bound freight on the American lines without Sunday work." And now they hav requested the committee on Sabbath observance to correspond with the Presbyterian church in the United States with a view to international action and by legislation in both countries to minimize and ultimately do away altogether with the Sunday railway work.

A more gorgeous example of asinin stupidity and adamantine "gall" it would be difficult to find. Wonder they didn't include canals and ocean steamers! But no doubt this will come in good time. Giv them room.

An Examination of Church History.

BEING LETTERS TO A CATHOLIC.—VIII.

Since we are dealing with Marys, let us take a look at the Virgin. You will pardon the term, but I consider this one of the greatest frauds in your scheme. Of course, if a savior were to be born, it had to be of woman; so a betrothed one was selected, and you know, as a lawer, that according to our laws it was a rape; a bad beginning for the advent of a God. Why a betrothed and not a married woman was selected troubled all your early fathers, and Origen claimed it was "to baffle the cunning of the devil, and keep him in ignorance of the Lord's advent." Your theologians agree with this opinion, and I hope it is in accord with yours.

Then Mary dreams; Joseph dreams; they all dream; and although your catechism particularly cautions your believing dreams, tells you it is sinful, yet you are asked to believe these dreams.

The angel "probably bore the form of an ordinary man," and the salutation is borrowed from Dan. x, 18–19, "The Lord is with thee;" Judges vi, 12, "Blessed art thou among women;" Judith xiii, 18; the rest following naturally. Of course, the Virgin could not be satisfied with her heavenly visitant, and needed earthly testimony. So she visited Elizabeth, who saluted her as "Mother of my Lord." In return Mary composed the "Magnificat," which is founded on Hannah's song of thanksgiving, 1 Sam. ii, 1–10, and "exhibits an intimate knowledge of the Psalms, prophetical writings, and books of Moses, from which sources almost every expression of it is drawn," and the words, "From henceforth all generations shall call me blessed," are borrowed from Leah's remarks on the birth of Asher (Gen. xxx, 13). Pretty good evidence to me that some priest had his finger in the pie.

Her son never called her "mother," and always spoke to her reprovingly. He had a kind word even for the dying thief, and was particularly fond of the reformed Mary Magdalen. Although it is claimed he appeared ten times, yet he never came once to her, never sent her even a message. She sinks into the obscurity whence she came, and even your sinking fund, the catacombs, are silent about her. Your church, in referring to this, says: "The darkness in which we are left is in itself very instructiv;" and, allow me to add, very destructiv to the whole scheme.

Her present position in your church has been attained by gradual growth, as no early writer even intimates her exaltation. The Collyridians, a sect of the fourth century, attempted to elevate her, but were persecuted by your church, and St. Epiphanius, whom you honor every May 12th, wrote: "Let Mary be in honor. Let the Lord be worshiped. Let no one worship Mary."

About 600, during the pontificate of Gregory the Great, a pestilence devastated Rome. As the ordinary prayers and masses, and all the relics, etc., were unable to check it, a lucky idea presented itself to the holy father, and he ordered a procession, carrying a picture of the Virgin, painted by St. Luke the Evangelist, to proceed to the church of St. Mary Major. In every street through which they passed, the pestilence ceased at once, an angel was seen on the Towers of Adrian, sheathing a blooding sword, and a chorus of angels were heard singing the anthem, "Regina Cœli." This was her first well-authenticated act since her assumption into heaven, and of course she grew in demand. Honors were showered on her particularly by the Spaniards, and in return, on many occasions, she assisted them in their battles by throwing dust in the eyes of their opponents.

The theory of her immaculate conception was first started in 1130, and St. Bernard wrote against the theory, calling it "a presumptuous novelty, mother of temerity, sister of superstition, and daughter of fickleness." He brought the whole family to bear against her. Nearly one hundred years afterward Duns Scotus and his Franciscans advocated, and St. Thomas Aquinas (one of your doctors whom you are not allowed to dispute) and his Dominicans took strong grounds against it. Pope John XXII. almost anathematized, and Sixtus IV. openly advocated it, and authorized the first festival in 1476. Some of the doctors at Trent openly favored it, and, my friend, if you were only allowed to read the doings of this council, your heart would swell with joy and pride when you read the burning words of Cardinal Pecheco, imploring the Ecumenical Council, of sixty, to save the Virgin from this taint; and I know the tears would well up in your eyes at the pathetic appeal of the Archbishop of Sassari, who in vain tried to save the mother of God and refuge of sinners. As the Holy Ghost did not enlighten the council, it was referred to the pope, who decided to allow matters to rest in statu quo, and Mary remained in original sin until 1854, when Pio Nono took compassion on her, and freed her from the taint without the aid of a council, declaring that it had been "revealed by God." The Council of Ephesus, 431, announced her as "the mother of God," and it took God over 1400 years to determin that she was immaculate.

The most of the trouble was caused by the opposition of St. Bernard, whose writings were held in high repute by the doctors at Trent, and yet he was the author of that prayer, "Remember, O most pious Virgin," etc., to the saying of which there is attached an indulgence.

One of the greatest factors in the elevation of Mary was St. Liguori. He was declared a doctor of your church March 23, 1871, and it was announced that "the fact of an opinion being found in his works is ample warrant for its adoption, without any need to weigh its reasons." Now take his "Theologia Moralis," turn to his treatises on the Confessional, and see if you would permit them to fall into the hands of any decent female. Yet he is one of your most revered saints, performed numerous miracles, and the Jesuits will tell you when Pope Clement XIV. was on his dying bed he found that God would forgiv all his sins except that bull in which he suppressed their order. In some mysterious manner the pope found that Liguori was the only one through whom he could obtain absolution, and although the saint was in Naples, celebrating mass, he contrived at the same time to be in Rome and shrive the holy father. This story, being well authenticated, was considered one of his chief miracles, the Jesuits taking the credit of saving the pope's soul. But here they grow silent, and I never could find one to explain why the pope did not revoke the bull, as he had ample time to do so.

In his "Glories of Mary" Liguori places the Virgin above the Godhead. He says: "Our salvation is in the hands of Mary." "Whereas it is said of other saints that they are with God, of Mary alone can it be affirmed that not only is she not subject to the will of God, but that God is subject to her will." "All things, even God himself, are subservient to the empire of the Virgin." "By thy governance, most holy Virgin, endureth the world which thou, with God, didst found from the beginning." He grows enthusiastic in her names, calls her, "Queen of Heaven and Hell;" declares that "no one can enter heaven except through her;" assures his readers that "the salvation of all depends on her favor and protection," and that "she and her son redeemed the world." He bestows several hundreds of terms on her, ransacks the heavens and the earth to find her endearing titles. The catalog of the church Santa Maria del Popolo, in which is preserved the prepuce of her son, has her entered as the "True and Sacred Lamprey of the Sea," and I searched Liguori to find if he had called her a seraphic porpoise, or sacred lobster, or angelic fried oyster, or happy clam, but he had unfortunately missed all these endearing and suggestiv names.

Heroic Headlines.

The Chicage Times is not generally looked upon as a great religious daily, nor is the professional "headliner" usually admired or employed because of his resemblance to a theological student or a petrified saint. But, notwithstanding these facts, those two lively agents compined sometimes send out a sermon which goes deeper and reaches farther than any issued from pulpit or prayer-meeting the world over.

One headline which appeared in the Times several years ago has been the cause of more talk, and more real moral sentiment, than any sermon I ever heard. I hav heard that headline abused in almost every language, and in almost every city from Boston to San Francisco. Everybody agreed that it was a shocking headline, and everybody says it hit hard, and it brought down its game. "I never was so shocked in my life, but it set me to thinking," one heard on all sides. I hav no doubt that every reader of the Times would know, without my telling him, just what headline I refer to. "Jerked to Jesus" would attract attention because it is alliterativ, but when it is found at the head of an account of a hanging, there are several other reasons why we cannot forget it. It is a satire, a sermon, a rebuke, and a stinging sarcasm in three words.

We hav become so accustomed to read that "he made his peace with God in the few minutes the lynchers allowed him;" or, "The officiating priest held the holy crucifix before the condemned man's eyes and assured him of Christ's willingness and power to forgiv and receive his soul into everlasting peace and rest prepared for the penitent;" or, "He was prepared to meet his God by Rev. Smith, who prayed with and consoled him, and to whom he expressed his willingness to die and his belief in a glorious resurrection;" "He was baptized by Rev. Tompkins, and partook of the holy sacrament for the last time yesterday, and feels that his sins are forgiven, and that he will, like the thief on the cross, be with Christ to-day in paradise." These are exact copies of a few recent orthodox reports of these outrageous and dangerous travesties of justice and incentivs to crime, which were read without protest or shock by the clergy and the people. Being couched in "hereditary forms of speech," being solemn and stupid, they appear all right; but when the Times struck out a short cut, an original expression which fitly pictured the abominable idea and practice, these same people are shocked. Shocked at what? Simply at the statement of their own theory in plain words, without mummery and deceit. It is the theory, not the statement of it, which is shocking, demoralizing, disgusting; and so long as the theory obtains and this religious encouragement of and incentiv to crime continue, I hope that this one newspaper at least will continue to hav the courage and the sense to treat it with the contempt it so richly deserves. Nothing else will hav so wholesome an effect, nothing else will so soon call attention to the bald immorality and danger of the practice and the belief; nothing else will so soon compel its discontinuance, because nothing else will so surely startle the people into a realizing sense of the true meaning of the solemn and accustomed formulas which disguise the meaning of exactly the same thing under stupid forms of theological inanities, which, stripped of their solemn pretense and useless verbiage, mean literally "jerked to Jesus." It is well to sicken these gentlemen upon their own horrible and immoral nostrums, given in allopathic doses, with the sugar left out. It ought to be a punishable crime to teach criminals that they can commit murder with safety to their own souls if not to their own necks. We cannot afford to support that sort of schools for the promotion of crime. They always hav been and they always will be productiv of evil to sound morality and an actual danger to society.

HELEN H. GARDENER.

A Letter from Dr. York.

I know that THE TRUTH SEEKER will be glad to hear a word from the South Seas. I am still on the warpath, pounding away at the tough hide of superstition, and hav put in six months' steady fire in Sydney to large and appreciativ audiences, besides one month in the great city of Melbourne, where I hav promised, if possible, to return for another course of lectures before my departure for home.

Our thanks are due in Melbourne to your correspondent, William Andrade, a most excellent young man, whose interesting letters I hav read from time to time in THE TRUTH SEEKER. His head and heart are both right, and his kindness to us we will not forget as strangers in a strange land.

We gave our last and thirtieth lecture at the Theater Royal last night, and on next Friday evening we hold a Paine memorial celebration, and, as I am informed, the first in Sydney which promises to be largely attended, and with this meeting we close our labors in Sydney. We go from here to Brisbane, and from thence to the principal city of New Zealand, and then hope to turn our faces toward the land of the stars and stripes—not that I would depreciate this country—but I love our country more. The climate here is hot and trying on me, and I begin to long for home. Our thanks are due in Sydney to Mr. Gale, Messrs. Keep, Walker, and others, for a helping hand in our work. I am to be followed in Sydney by Mr. Collins, just arrived from England, who comes well recommended by Charles Bradlaugh and the Secular Association. I hav had the pleasure of meeting him and inviting him to pay us a visit in America on his way back to England. Our cause is a world-wide cause, and we need to cultivate a friendly spirit between the workers and speakers of all lands, and I am glad to learn of the great success attending Charles Watts's labors in America.

But, Eugene, somehow I can't feel reconciled to the change of title or name for our National Liberal League, and I do not think England has anything to spare which we need in that direction. English Secularism is far from being Liberal as we understand it. At least, judging from what I see of it in the colonies. Here Secularism is as sectarian as any Christian sect, and the term is so narrowly defined as to depress as idiotic all who entertain the idea of a future state. To my mind this is far from being Liberal.

I cannot forget the attitude and teachings of our noble old friend Bennett, whose life-work was to bring into friendly relations the whole Freethought family for work against the common enemy. The American Freethought Union would hav been a thousand times better as a watchword and battle-cry than the name Secularism—when the effect of it seems to be to widen the gap between different phases of Freethought. Freethought implies mental liberty to hold an honest opinion as to the import of the spiritual phenomena, and such an honest difference should not drive Freethinkers into an unfriendly attitude to each other, especially when they agree so fully upon nearly every other subject in the field of Freethought reform.

The so-called spirit phenomenon is a natural manifestation of force in this world—not another world—and as such is quite as much entitled to consideration as any other natural phenomena, and any honest person will not evade or hinder a sincere conviction and expression upon that or any other subject.

The Secularism of these colonies is of such a peculiar type, and involves so much of antagonism against a large class of the Freethinking element, whose good will and influence would add greatly to the efficiency of Freethought in righting the wrongs of church and state, that I fear the narrow definition given by many of the word Secularism.

But I shall hope that, notwithstanding the change in the title of our national organization, true Liberalism, characterized by a spirit of toleration and kindness, will always prevail amongst our workers in America.

By the way, Eugene, there is a crank residing in San Francisco, by the name of Emmette Coleman. This wise man, to whom D. M. Bennett once paid his respects in no flattering terms, has seen fit to misrepresent me in the columns of the Religio-Philosophical Journal. I hav not seen it, therefore I cannot defend myself. Should it fall under your eye, and you deem it worthy of remark, say a word in my behalf, as you know by my work during all the past years whether I deserve the lashing of a slanderous tongue. DR. J. L. YORK.

Sydney, N. S. W., Jan. 25, 1886.

[We are as ignorant as is Dr. York as to the matter referred to in the last paragraph. We do not exchange with the paper named, and never shall. Our advice to our old friend in Australia is not to notice anything that writer writes or that paper prints. Those who know him will not believe what the R.-P. Journal says about him; and those who know that paper will not believe what it says about anybody?—ED. T. S.]

"In the Beginning."

For years I hav been trying to catch on to that fragmentary polyglot; that remarkable collection of ghost, fish, and snake stories; that mess of contradictions got up on the instalment plan, and yclept in the parlance of Christians the holy Bible.

What I mean by catching on is, to get on terms of understanding with this unique conglomeration of literature from the pens of divers individuals, some of questionable character, and all more or less bizarre, yet which is styled the word of God by those who profess to take stock in it.

Some parsons and laymen will tell you that a child can understand this Mosaic; other pulpiteers—Beecher for one—say it is very difficult to understand, and too much for them; and when I consider the thousands and tens of thousands of priests and parsons that hav been trying for ages to expound these scriptures, each according to his own understanding, I am satisfied that the book is beyond mortal comprehension, so do not blush to own it is too much for me, and that I giv it up.

Yes, I am still on the "ground floor" of non-understanding in regard to the polyglot mentioned, if not indeed in the sub-cellar thereof, and despair of ever raising myself out of the slough by my own efforts, or getting out with the aid of others of no more horse-power in the matter of lifting than myself. I hav seen those who declared they understood the polyglot clear through from A to Izzard. They do understand it according to their lights—each according to his own light, which is different from every other light—but these lights are not my lights, and do not light me on the way to understanding.

As we all know, this remarkable aggregation of writings opens and starts off as follows:

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

Here I am at the very outset brought right up against a stone wall, as it were, too high to jump or even climb over. The average Christian, I know, takes this wall as a thoroughbred jumper a five-barred gate. Throwing away the curb and snaffle of thought and reason, he vaults it without touching, and in this manner goes through the book from index to finis as the steeple-chaser from start to finish in the day's run. But I am brought up all a-standing by this stone wall of obscurity, and there I would stand only for the flank or oblique movement which enables me to pass this obstacle, to stumble on others later on.

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

In the beginning of what? Time or eternity, or both? My theistical friend, Wynkoop, says, "In the beginning of all things." So will they all say, I suppose. This arrangement would appear to include God and eternity, in which case God must hav created himself, eh? But according to the polyglot, God has forever existed. If so, there must hav been an incalculable period of time—or eternity, if time did not commence until the creation of the heaven and earth—that God had no abiding-place. Where did he abide before building heaven? There is only one answer, nowhere. But if he existed there must hav been a somewhere. Where was it? The answer takes us back to nowhere. But let us call it space, an illimitable empty void, full of utter nothingness save God. And what a cheerful abode it must hav been without sun, moon, stars, and things, which did not exist!

What a happy thought the building of heaven was, to be sure! It seems very, very strange to me that, with all the attributes accorded him by Theists, God did not think of this before. Millions of trillions of years, multiplied by the same number millions of trillions of times, will not begin to measure a millionth part of the time that God must hav been without an abiding-place before he established heaven, which would seem to argue a great want of forethought on his part, to say the least. This seems remarkable to me, as even the Esquimaux, moved by about the lowest form of human life, would never go through a single polar winter without building an ice hut for his accommodation and comfort.

However, God at length established heaven as an abiding-place for himself and favored ones of his creation, and if Brother Talmage's account of it is correct, it must lay away over the Vanderbilt palace for gorgeousness and splendor, and rival the domain of fairydom.

Yes, he created heaven and the earth, we are assured; but why the earth? What call was there for the earth? Human life was not, animal life was not, and what call was there for earth? Man was not about, hammering on the doors of heaven, and demanding a suitable abiding-place; nor were the lower animals in their way appealing for requisit quarters.

It must hav been that the building of the earth was an afterthought, a venture, a speculation. That it turned out badly we hav only to read from his alleged word to satisfy ourselvs, and since the time when he first became dissatisfied with it it seems to hav grown no better very fast.

Why the earth was ever created, I never could understand. There was no call for it in any quarter by anything. The Lord would hav saved himself an immense amount of trouble had he not builded the world, and the trouble that mortals would hav escaped—oh, my!

The trouble the Lord had with the world for many years after finishing it is recounted in the polyglot writing that deals with the events of that period. According to these reports, he supervised in person the affairs of mankind, various members of which led him a life of trial and tribulation.

Like man in form—for he made man after his own image, his own words, as alleged, attesting this—he seems to hav been very much like him mentally and morally, and actuated by the same passions and impulses; which state of affairs, he being boss of all, made it hot for all concerned, he being vexed and wrathy most of the time.

Those were the days that tried men's souls, if any ever did, when in person the Lord supervised the affairs of man, even to the smallest particulars. The days of Valley Forge were nothing to the days when the Lord was around in person, and I for one, having had life thrust upon me, rejoice that said life was postponed until after the Lord had resigned as overseer in person of men's affairs.

The Lord vouchsafed no reasons to man for the making of the world, and man, of course, cannot tell why it was made. From the theistical belief in a life hereafter—a life of bliss for the righteous, and a life of torment for the ungodly, harping the hottest on the latter—it would seem that the world was made as a propagating ground for the production of angels in the rough, so to speak, who were to do duty as polished angels after death and resurrection.

But for a God who could create thoroughbred angels, all ripe for heaven, as easily as he could man, this would seem a roundabout and most uncertain way of supplying heaven with angelic representativs. But this must be the underlying idea with the Theist, else must he be fuller of egotism than ever a goat of theater posters, to think that the Lord, having made him without any ulterior purpose, concluded on second thought to make an angel of him in the end! But the Theist is nothing if not egotistical, and I leave him in order to flank the stone wall against which I run—"In the beginning." SI SLOCUM.

Notes from Illinois.

I am still swinging round the circle. It has been my privilege and pleasure to meet most of the good Liberals of Illinois, and, nothwithstanding the cold weather, hard times, and my temporary illness, I hav had a grand time. I hav not yet canvassed the entire state, but shall try to do so hereafter as opportunity may offer. In most places where I stopped the revival business was in full blast. I hav noticed in times past that when the people suffer from hard times, when they hav no work and no money, they are willing to take anything, even religion. But when they hav plenty of business, and enough to eat, they are disposed to postpone religion until a more convenient season—and generally hard times is that convenient season. It has become my duty, at times, to attend revivals, and to take the ministers to task for talking about things of which they know positivly nothing.

In the little town of Auburn, in this state, where I was advertised to speak on "The Whims of the Boy Preacher" (Harrison), who is probably not older than forty or forty-five years, a minister asked his congregation to join with him in praying that God might make the Infidel so sick that he would not be able to come to town. This was carrying the thing too far; this was stretching his prerogativs, and consequently a number of sensible people asked him to explain what he meant. His prayer became the town talk. It was a huge joke, and passed all along the streets. The minister was compelled to explain, and he did it somewhat after this fashion. He said to his own congregation, "I did not express myself fully the other night when speaking about Professor Bell. I asked you to join with me in praying that he might be made sick. But I intended to add sick of sin, but somehow I failed to do so." What an explanation! A few nights after, when referring to this explanation, I said it reminded me of a gambler's explanation. Once upon a time a gambler was converted, and joined the Methodist church. One Sunday morning during the solemnities of divine service this convert fell asleep, and, while dreaming of old times, he shouted, "Hearts are trumps, by God." Opening his eyes and taking in the situation, he piously added, "Let your hearts triumph in God." Preacher, thy name is impudence.

I am going to Chicago for a few weeks to arrange for more lectures. W. S. BELL.

Why Capital Favors Piety.

The Antimonopolist hits hard in the following: "During the days of African slavery the slaveholders took great pains to hav their slaves get religion and become pious, as it made them more docil and more valuable servants, and the slaves, having no other source of enjoyment, took to camp-meeting religion as a duck takes to water. Nevertheless, the morals of the slaves were very bad, honesty, chastity, and truthfulness being scarcely known among them, which has been true of all slaves, everywhere and in all times. We see a repetition of this to-day in the establishment by railroad managers of Young Men's Christian Association rooms, the support of special missionaries among their underpaid employees, and in the general efforts of wealthy men and corporations to advance sanctimony among the poor. A corporation, having no soul, cannot be religious, but having business sagacity it knows that it is a good investment to put some of its big dividends on watered stocks into religion for the dupes it is daily robbing of their earnings. It makes them more contented with their hard lot here, as a drink of whisky does, while not injuring their capacity to work as much as liquor. But more than this: it absorbs all their leisure time and little surplus money, and all their mental energy, which effectually prevents them from studying practical questions and so far mastering the science of social and political economy as to know they hav natural rights to life, liberty, and happiness, which are abridged or taken away by their employers. Slaves, whether chattel or wage, must be kept ignorant, as it is impossible to enslave any but the ignorant, and to this end nothing is more effectual than to provide a channel into which all surplus time and energy left from labor can be safely directed and easily controled. Vanderbilt gave a portion of the eighty millions he has already derived from dividends on the water he put into railroad stocks to found a theological seminary at Nashville, and McCormicks, of Chicago, gave $150,000 to a similar institution at the same time they reduced wages of six hundred employees to the starvation point. The Santa Fé, Gould, and other railroad managers are very solicitous for the spiritual welfare of their employees, while continuing to charge all the traffic will bear and exacting rates that pay high dividends on five or ten times their actual investments and getting title to millions of acres of public lands to which they hav neither a legal nor equitable claim."

Father Hardouin's Extraordinary Book.

The "Man of Sin" has loaned to several persons a copy of his series of articles lately published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, entitled "An Extraordinary Book: Are Most of the Latin and Greek Classics, together with All the Writings of the Christian Fathers, Forgeries of the Fourteenth, Fifteenth, and Sixteenth Centuries?" One learned gentleman, who is the successful author of some remarkable books, and is soon to publish another of a still more startling character, which will challenge refutation, writes:

> I return the article as requested. I read it with great interest. The theory it enunciates is very possible.

Father Hardouin's theory leaves nothing for Christianity to stand upon but the scriptures and tradition. All church history up to the revival of learning, he stoutly affirms, is a Benedectine forgery. This is the assertion of a most learned Jesuit who died in 1729 at the age of eighty-three years, leaving a manuscript containing his proofs, which manuscript was not published until 1766, in London; and being in Latin, the book seems to hav had no readers, nor to hav attracted the notice of anybody until now partially translated by ANTICHRIST.

A Profitless Discussion.

The confusion existing in the minds of certain "philosophers" was well illustrated by Prof. John Fiske's essay before the Nineteenth Century Club last week. He is, he maintains, a Christian, yet he rejects the fundamental article of faith of Christians—a personal God. According to his view, God is "an infinit and eternal power which is manifested in every pulsation of the universe." This is pantheism, and not Christianity, and the church once burnt a very notable man for expressing the same sentiments. Professor Fiske can split theosophical hairs from now till the monument to Bruno shall hav been erected, and crumbled into dust, but he will be able to make nothing else than pantheism of his fine-spun theories. He is, therefore, very far from being a Christian. Belief by "a supreme act of faith" is Christian phraseology, but it might mean a belief in the existence of the anthropophagi as easily as in the existence of God.

When a man believes, and will not hear of argument against his belief, all attempts to reason with him are, as Paine said, like giving medicin to the dead. Such a man is Chauncey M. Depew. He swallows the Bible as easily as the whale swallowed Jonah. His mother believed, therefore he believes. He has faith, and that ends the matter for him. Such a man, by operations in railroad stocks, may become a prominent member of society, but he can scarcely attain eminence as an expounder of philosophical subjects. His appearance on platforms supposed to be consecrated to reason can be accounted for only on the supposition that there is no one in the ministerial ranks with the courage to defend his faith on rational grounds.

Against pantheism itself, or an endeavor to place Christianity upon reasonable grounds, Mr. Wakeman might hav made some headway with a scientific philosophy. But in considering the fantastic theories of Professor Fiske, and the dogmatic faith of Mr. Depew, from a scientific man's elevation there is no pivotal point for a leverage. The only method of reaching such colossal assumption is one which the swallow-tailed dignity of the occasion prevented Mr. Wakeman from using. He was therefore compelled to content himself with setting forth the superiority of Positivism, as he understands it, over Professor Fiske's Neopantheism and Mr. Depew's fossilized Christianity. If these two gentlemen could be got before a popular audience, and their vain conceits mercilessly exposed, it might conduce to the advancement of truth. As it was, the wisdom of Mr. Wakeman was wasted.

Baptist	67	Other denominations	20

As usual, the Catholics lead in this matter, but they are closely pushed by the church most similar to theirs in rites and creeds. The Presbyterians and Methodists are about equal, though the comparison would be more edifying if we knew the proportion each sect bears to the total population of the province. It might also be interesting to compare the ratio of Catholic criminals in Ontario to the Catholic population with the ratio of Protestant criminals to the Protestant population. We recollect reading in several Protestant church papers lamentations over the scarcity of people of their faith in Ontario, and it may be that it would turn out that the most of them are in jail, for certainly the Presbyterians and the Methodists make a goodly showing in the foregoing tables. During 1885 a sort of religious revival has been gradually percolating among the citizens of Toronto, until it has culminated, as our Toronto correspondent related last week, in a municipal coming to Jesus. We fear, however, there is a difference between the official opinion of the people of Toronto and their private conduct similar to that traced by Mr. Lum between Mr. Cleveland's official opinion of Mormonism and certain events in his life which it would be unkind to allude to. In short, we fear our Canadian neighbors are given to hypocrisy, for we read in the report of the Canadian prison officials that in Toronto alone in 1885, some 3,397 persons of both sexes were cared for in the jails. This was an increase of 146 over 1884, when no particular religious wave was washing the people's sins away. It occurs to us that it would hav been better for the city to hav gone along in the same old way, than to hav obtained religion at the expense of additional criminals. Just what proportion of this increase was from the Salvation Army ranks we hav no means of knowing.

Editorial Notes.

THE Winsted, Conn., Press says the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is worth four times its cost. It is pleasant to be able to agree with our contemporaries.

THE only ones in New York who oppose an open Sunday, writes Brick Pomeroy, referring to the opening of the museums, "are the mental wasp-waists and one-idea fanatics whose religion is based only on a fear that there is a hell, and that they will be ordered to spend eternity therein."

THE New Thought, Moses Hull's paper, published at Maquoketa, Ia., is to be enlarged with its third volume, which begins April 10th. The price will remain the same. The New Thought is a Spiritualist journal, and when enlarged will undoubtedly be the best paper of that faith west of Boston.

THE bill introduced in the Senate by Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, doubling the postage on fourth-class mail matter should be defeated. A cent an ounce is enough to pay on packages of samples of merchandise. The bill is in the interests of express companies. Write to your senator and Congressman to this effect.

THREE weeks ago E. A. Stevens called attention to the work in Chicago of the "American Literary Union and Pure Literature Bureau." Since then the society has presented to the Illinois legislature several yards of petition, signed wholly by church people, against pernicious literature. What steps the society wishes the legislature to take we are not informed. The Union's definition of pernicious literature is "whatever is against general Christianity."

THE North American Review for March presents twelve articles, most of which are of more than ordinary interest. One of the contributors is Jefferson Davis. Another is Cyrus W. Field, who thinks the government should purchase the telegraph lines—at the figures of the directors, of course. Mr. Field's patriotism is of the kind that honors Revolutionary spies, and supports his own government for the sake of an appropriation. The Review can be had at 30 Lafayette Place, price 50 cents.

Two instances of the beneficent effects of a large admixture of Christianity were last week before Judge Van Wyck, of Brooklyn. James Moran insisted that a committee of saints and angels had waited upon him and begged him to offer himself as a sacrifice for the sins of his fellow-men. Judge Van Wyck thought they could find an altar for him at the insane asylum. Mary Morrissey confidentially informed the judge that her soul had preceded her to heaven, her body alone remaining on the earth. The judge committed her to keep Mr. Moran company.

J. E. REMSBURG'S "Sabbath-Breaking" has been reprinted in England. A portion of the work has also been republished in India. Mr. J. R. Upshon, secretary of the Madras Secular Society, givs it the following indorsement: "I consider it the best book on the subject that I hav read. The author has dealt with the subject in an able and most exhaustiv manner, and has completely proved that there is no such divine institution as a Sabbath for Christian believers, or Infidel unbelievers, to break. The book deserves a place in every Freethinker's library as the text book on this subject."

L. S. METCALF, formerly connected with the North American Review, has inaugurated a new periodical venture, and named it The Forum. It is similar in character to the Review, and the first number is the equal in all respects of that representativ monthly. The articles of most interest to Freethinkers are one by James Parton on newspapers, and another, relating his religious experience, by M. J. Savage, of Boston. Heber Newton shows Romanism to be but a baptized paganism, but his conclusions are disfigured by a sad exhibition of illogic and a causeless and witless attack upon Colonel Ingersoll. The Forum is published at 97 Fifth ave., at 50 cents per number and $5 per year.

To pray or not to pray is the question at Harvard College. At present the students are compelled to attend prayers, and this they do not like. The O. K. Society has petitioned the president and overseers to abolish this custom. The petitioners say, among other things: "However large a part laziness may hav in ordinary opposition to prayers, it would be a mistake to suppose that there is not a genuin conscientious disapproval of them. This disapproval is founded on the widespread feeling that religious practices should be made matters for individual taste and feeling to direct; that everyone has a right to follow his own bent in such matters. So widespread is this feeling that it underlies the arguments of those who defend compulsory prayers as well of those who oppose them."

THE University says that in Chicago there are between thirty-five and forty thousand nativs of Bohemia. The majority of them hav come to America since 1870. Few of the adults can speak English, but they publish several journals in their own language, one a daily, called the Svornost. The majority of the Bohemians are said to be Roman Catholics, but most of the men treat the claims of the church and its doctrins with open contempt. The publications of the Bohemians teem with articles and pictures ridiculing not only the doctrins of the Romish and Protestant churches, but also the fundamental ideas of religion—the existence of God and the immortality of the soul—the statement being repeatedly made that if there were a God, "he would keep things straighter than they are." The Bible is regarded with particular contempt. The Svornost has recently published Paine's "Age of Reason" in instalments in its Sunday edition, and is now publishing a series of Bible scenes in caricature, accompanied by what a correspondent of the Interior describes as "most scornful and blasphemous comments in vile doggerel." The title of the series is given as "The Holy Bible for Sport. Written under the Inspiration of the Holy Ghost, by Fr. B. Zdrubek." But the same correspondent bears witness that while vice and crime are shockingly prevalent among some of the inhabitants of this region, yet the people are as a rule industrious and law-abiding. Probably the vice and crime are committed by those who still hold to the Roman Catholic religion.

THE women engaged in sewing Bibles over in the Bible House are, according to John Swinton's Paper, the subjects of much ill treatment. It is alleged that the majority of them cannot make over $2.50 to $4 a week; that their wages hav been cut down at least twice within the past few years; that their work is irregular; and that they hav in large measure been supplanted by sewing-machines, under which old people of long service are turned out to the streets. In the mean time, while the poor toilers of the Bible House suffer in these ways, there are men drawing large salaries from the treasury of the American Bible Society. And we agree with Mr. Swinton that the matter should be investigated. But the investigation should not stop with the sewing women.

WM. W. ASTOR, late minister to Italy, has resurrected a letter written by Lucretia Borgia, just previous to her death, to Pope Leo X.: "And so great is the favor of my all-merciful creator, that it is accorded to me to know that the end of my life approaches—that in a few hours it will hav ceased, though not before I shall hav received the holy consolations of the church. Arrived at this solemn extremity, I bethink me a Christian—albeit a sinner—to ask your holiness the spiritual treasure of a benediction that may bring peace to my soul. And while entreating this favor for myself, I further commend my husband and my children, who are devout followers of your holiness, to the benefits of your spiritual grace." Whatever else she may hav been, Lucretia Borgia was a good Christian.

THE Vice Society's machine runs a little hard just at present, owing to the lack of financial lubrication, and one of Mr. Comstock's attempts to procure a trifle of oil has come to our notice. Arthur F. Ducret, whose name has appeared from time to time, signed to Comstock's decoy letters, and who has long been a stenographer in the employ of the Vice Society, has quit his employers. Mr. Ducret furnished his minutes of an examination to counsel for some one of Comstock's intended victims, transcribing his notes at home in the evening, and being under no obligation to account to Comstock for the fees received therefor; and the trouble arose from Comstock's efforts to bulldoze Mr. Ducret into turning over these fees to the treasury of the Vice Society. Mr. Ducret very properly resisted this effort to exploit the proceeds of his labor, and being unable to remain in the office with comfort on account of Comstock's overbearing obstreperousness, resigned his position. We are glad that such tricks are becoming necessary, as the society feels more and more pressure from lack of funds, owing to the gradual withdrawal of public confidence in its management, and we congratulate Mr. Ducret in getting away from bad company, and trust he may find more reputable and more satisfactory employment.

THE University and Unity of Chicago hav been consolidated under the name of the latter. Unity is a sixteen page weekly journal, devoted to Unitarianism. The paper is edited with much ability, and by more or less Liberal men, as evidenced by the following notice of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL: "This is the almanac of Protest; of protest against various forms of injustice still perpetrated in the name of dominant church religions, that by which the evidence of Freethinkers is denied in courts, by which museums are closed on Sundays, by which the churches and their belongings (estimated by the almanac compilers for the United States as worth nearly $750,000,000) go wholly untaxed, etc. It is the protest of which Ingersoll is the prophet, and which claims alliance with many noble men whose faces make a gallery here of thirty portraits. Not ours the band who make this almanac; but they are fighting part of the world's battle for liberty, and we are not ashamed to giv them gratitude, but would be, if we were. And that above their protest, and their, 'Let the church go!' they hav their affirmation and ideal, and that in it their best selvs and the best self of the churches are at one, these lines by Courtlandt Palmer, found on one of the pages, shall attest:

"'Self-hood lost
In self-surrender, joy in others' joys
Attained, love and its peace encompassed
In loving rather than in being loved;
In giving, not in getting, our redemption gained.'"

THE Methodist preachers belonging to the Baltimore conference hav been holding a meeting at Washington. One of the subjects considered was how to equalize the salaries. Under the itinerary plan preachers are sent hither and yon, sometimes to charges which pay very little. There are many "soft jobs" within the gift of the various conferences, but big preachers with "pulls" are assigned to them. Naturally there is dissatisfaction. A report read on the fourth day of this meeting shows that the aggregate salaries allowed by one hundred and forty-six charges to one hundred and eighty pastors in the Baltimore conference were, including house-rent, $165,066, but that on these claims there was a total deficiency of $8,089, leaving the average of actual receipts at $982. Deducting from this the rental value of parsonages, the actual average salary was reduced to $785. There are sixty preachers who receive less than the average, and one of them only $100. The net income of more than one-third of the conference members is about $350, or less than a dollar a day. The highest salary received is $3,500. The report does not mention the amount of wedding and funeral fees nor donation parties. Various plans were discussed to equalize the pay of the preachers, but no definit action was taken. One minister denounced the scheme as Communistic, but he was probably a thirty-five-hundred-dollar man. We are glad that the Baltimore conference cannot disturb the breezy editor of the New York Advocate in the enjoyment of his three-thousand-dollar "sit" and about nine months a year leave of absence to run round the country and deliver lectures and perform marriage ceremonies and funeral rites at about the average rate of $50 a perform.

THE Christians of Kansas are making herculean efforts to keep the state university a Christian institution. A few months ago Miss Kate Stephens, the Greek professor, whose success as a teacher had become noted in other educational institutions, was removed because she is an Infidel, and now an effort is being made to supersede Prof. W. H. Carruth, one of the most scholarly men connected with the university, for the same reason. The Antimonopolist says that "an imported zealot connected with the Young Men's Christian Association, seconded by the chancellor, and at least one professor, and the local clerical influence, has inaugurated a vendetta against everything modern, progressiv, or Liberal, and everybody who does not bow the knee to their particular Baal, avowing their intention to bring the university, as a whole, into line with their fanatical and outgrown ideas."

THE paper of Mrs. Linton, entitled "A Protest and a Plea," on page 146 of last week's issue is from the Gentleman's Magazine, and forms the concluding chapter of the new book, elsewhere advertised, "The Order of Creation," which is now ready for delivery. Mrs. Linton's rebuke of Mr. Gladstone is pointed and eloquent, but Freethinkers will derive the solidest satisfation from Mr. Huxley's second reply to the English premier. He exposes Mr. Gladstone's scientific incapacity; reflects upon the unreliability of modern sermons upon science; and, in the quietly sarcastic manner of which he is so perfect a master, shows that the author of the Pentateuch, whoever he may be, was in no wise competent to handle the subject of the genesis of the universe. It is a chapter calculated to injure the feelings of the clerical reconcilers of Genesis and geology, but we feel sure Mr. Huxley wrote it in the kindest spirit, and for their special enlightenment. It is a great paper, and deserves a million readers.

BEFORE a church society of Milwaukee Mr. Silas Chapman recently read a paper upon churches in the olden time in Massachusetts. One paragraph of his recollections is interesting, as showing the change between the customs of the Puritans and the customs of their descendants: "At that time church and state were united. Every taxpayer was obliged to pay a yearly tax for the support of the gospel. This tax was assessed the same way and collected by the same officer as any other town tax, as school or highway. This money thus collected, if no objection was made by the taxpayers, was for the benefit of the first church established in the town, whatever its denomination. As most of the first churches were Congregational, that denomination was practically the state church. If there was any other church in the town the taxpayer could designate in prescribed legal way that he desired his tax to go to the benefit of that church, whatever denomination, and to that church his payment went. But he must pay the tax for the support of the gospel, whether he was Jew or Infidel, Chinese or saloon keeper. All this was abolished in 1833 by the Massachusetts legislature. There was only one church in our town, and consequently all the tax went to that church. All the business now given to the trustees of our churches was done in town meeting. The town was the trustee. It voted and paid the minister's salary. Our minister had $400 a year and some perquisits, among them thirty cords of wood. He usually picked out the richest girl in town and married her, and had the homestead, and when his father-in-law died he usually left him a cider mill and a distillery."

THE editor of the Melbourne, Australia, Harbinger of Light (Spiritualist) calls upon Liberals of every stamp to impede by every possible means the insidious work of the theologian. The danger which now threatens Australia is the introduction of the Bible in state schools. "Depend upon it," says Mr. Terry, "the organization for this object will use all their influence on candidates at the next election to extort promises of support for their nefarious project, and it is only by counter action on the part of broad-thinking people that they can be successfully met, and their scheme frustrated. As a rule liberal men do not allow a candidate's religious opinions to bias them in their judgment of his fitness for a legislator, and this is as it should be, but the present case is an exceptional one, which demands the sacrifice of all minor considerations, and the man who will not pledge himself to opposed this retrograde movement is unworthy the support of any true progressionist." Mr. Terry, it will be recollected, is the gentleman who imported a large lot of books from this office, and had them confiscated by the customs officers because the consignment included the "Trial of D. M. Bennett," "Sinful Saints," and "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ." Mr. Terry has, however, forced the collector to deliver to him all but these, and he now advertises the books in his paper. But the grip of Christian power upon his neck has evidently been a revelation to Mr. Terry. The Australian Christian papers hav defamed his character by publishing him as an importer of obscene books, and he instituted proceedings against one, the Argus. But upon application to the prominent lawyers of Melbourne, he was told that he did not hav a ghost of a chance to obtain justice. While the matter he complained of was undoubtedly within the statute, and he had a good legal case, the Argus people could demand a trial by a jury, and the lawyers were positiv that no jury could be drawn who would convict a Christian of libeling a Freethinker. One lawyer pointed out that as the majority of jurors were members of some Christian denomination, their prejudices would be against those who introduced literature antagonistic to their belief, and it was doubtful whether sufficient unanimity could be obtained among them to secure a verdict. Another lawyer indorsed this view. He said that the counsel for the defense would appeal to the prejudices of the jury by enlarging upon the contents of the two pamphlets seized, which from an orthodox point of view were blasphemous, and so work upon their feelings as to blind them to the true state of the case. Mr. Terry then abandoned his suit. But he does not rest quietly under the wrong, and proposes to do what he can to change the administration of *in*justice. He feels now like opening war upon the churches, with the view to help destroy the vicious "dogmas which cramp men's minds and engender hatred and persecution rather than love and freedom."

THE Rationalist of New Zealand has suspended publication.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. H. S. LAKE will speak for the Spiritual Society of Cleveland at the anniversary of modern Spiritualism, March 31st, after which she goes to Providence, R. I., for the Sundays of April.

J. E. REMSBURG spoke in Boston last Sunday and is expected to speak in Baltimore next Sunday. From Baltimore he goes to Ohio, lecturing at Kent on the 16th; Garrettsville, 17th, 18th; Perrysburg, 20th; Tontogany, 21st; Carey, 22d; Brandford, 23d, 24th.

FROM Sunday, March 28th, to Sunday, April 4th, inclusiv the Southern Association of Spiritualists and the Spiritual Society of Louisville, Ky., will celebrate the thirty-eighth anniversary of modern Spiritualism at Louisville. For particulars address H. C. Krell, 618 East Jefferson street, Louisville, Ky.

THE Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists will hold its next quarterly meeting (and anniversary of modern Spiritualism) in Musical Society Hall, No. 381 Milwaukee st., Milwaukee, Wis., March 26, 27, and 28, 1886. Attendants will pay full fare on all roads to the meeting, and will be returned for one-fifth fare. Board may be had at first-class boarding-houses at $1 per day. Wm. M. Lockwood, President.

W. F. JAMIESON writes: "In Wentworth Dakota, I hav closed my fourteenth lecture, being my third visit there; lectured this time every evening for a week to good houses, although the weather was unfavorable. There are enterprising Liberals in Wentworth, such as W. L. Horton, N. Wentworth, the Zimmermans, formerly of Milwaukee, Mr. Clauder, and forty or fifty others. Since I lectured in Wentworth. a little over a year ago, there has been a determined effort by the Christians to take the place. The Christianity there is of a rather bitter sectarian character. But the Liberals propose to build a Liberal hall, spacious and comfortable, and not too sacred for the everyday use of the people. I submit that the Liberals everywhere, instead of helping to build churches that are too holy to allow a Freethinker to tell the truth in, should build one good hall, at least, in every town, where the whole population can assemble, if need be. Ten days ago I came from a six months' tour through the Southwest. Memory is full of cordial greetings and pleasant episodes; but for climate, the dry, pure air, giv me the Northwest. The push, remarkable energy, and general prosperity of Northwestern people meet me on every side. At this writing, March 3d to 10th, I am expounding the gospel of Freethought in Madison, Dakota, a town which has the reputation of being very pious, but from the cordial manner in which our first lecture was received, I presage we will hav an excellent hearing. Mr. Horton and Mr. Clauder, of Wentworth, are to blame for it. They drove down here, hired a hall, and set me to work. My address is Lake City, Minn., where I soon expect to be to take a needed rest."

THE subject discussed at the last meeting of the Nineteenth Century Club was "The Idea of God: Is Pantheism the Outcome of Modern Science?" The essayist was John Fiske, of Harvard; the protagonist, Chauncey M. Depew, railroad lawyer and Calvinistic Christian; with T. B. Wakeman, Positivist, to conclude. Professor Fiske was described in the notices of the meeting as a "cosmic Theist," whatever that is, but he took exception to this summing-up of his creed, as he contended that the Christian church was broad enough to hold him. He defined the difference between the anthropomorphic and the cosmic conceptions of God, to show that as man progresses the anthropomorphic conception disappears, and man ceases to apply to God the feelings, sentiments, passions, and actions of men, and substitutes the idea that the natural order of the universe is the outcome of deity, that nowhere is quiescence to be found in nature, that evolution and natural selection are the methods of the deity so far as they hav yet been explained or understood by men, that they are consistent with human progress to the highest and best by the elimination of the worst as the fittest survive. Professor Fiske thought that there is "a dramatic tendency in the universe," and he was a Theist by "a supreme act of faith." Chauncey M. Depew repeated the stale falsehoods about the French Revolution, said that all the old philosophies are dead, while Christianity livs, and concluded by asking, Who made protoplasm and cosmic dust? He wisely stopped short of the final question, Who made God? He believed the Old and New Testaments precisely as they are presented by Christianity. He was in antagonism, he said, with Mr. Wakeman, who dismisses the Bible as entirely a mass of legend, and with Professor Fiske, who accepts it with an interpretation entirely his own. Mr. Wakeman closed the discussion with a defense of American Positivism. He claimed that the Religion of Humanity takes in all that there is good for anything in every other religion; that it does not make a fetich of one book, but absorbs the good of all books.

Letters from Friends.

MELBOURNE LETTER.

MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA, Jan. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The year 1885 has passed from sight, and the new year has come, not amid the cold and wintry storms of a northern climate, but in the heat of summer. Its birth was heralded with festival and holiday rejoicing—picnics and races, boat-riding and boat-upsetting, hurrying the hapless and reckless occupants into another state of existence without notice or warning. Holidays are not confined to a few, as with us in America, but they are often and long, and entered into with spirit, giving one the impression that merry-making is the chief object of life.

They were closely followed in Melbourne with labor strikes, the butcher, the baker, the candlestick-maker, all concluding that they were giving their valuable services at too low a figure, and that the hours of labor were too long to allow them to cultivate their literary tastes; and so the wharf-lumpers, the stone-masons and plasterers, the wardens in the prison, the pastry cooks, with others, hav refused to work or allow others if they can prevent. Hence labor is being imported from Adelaide and New Zealand to fill the places of the discontented ones, thereby giving them unlimited time for literary pursuits. Even the letter-carriers are objecting to a single mail delivery on holidays, reminding one of the man who said, "Bad luck to the man who invented working by the dirty light of a candle," and was replied to, "Bad luck to the man who invented working at all."

The trip from Sydney to Melbourne by water occupies about fifty-six hours, and many points of beauty meet the eye, more particularly in the neighborhood of Bass strait (named in honor of a young navigator, George Bass, who in a voyage of eleven weeks in an open whale-boat with six seamen made valuable discoveries, and his name immortal) and Wilson's promontory, where a dozen islands are in sight. But these are considered dangerous waters. Only a few weeks since a vessel loaded with wool struck on a rock and disappeared from sight, and not until a reward was offered by government was her whereabouts discovered and a buoy placed over the spot. The Heads of Port Philip, or Hobson's Bay, are a long, low stretch of land, and the harbor is an immense body of water, with its channel marked with buoys and lightships, possessing but little of the beauty of Port Jackson or Sydney harbor. About thirty miles from the Heads is Williamstown, an extensiv seaport on the western side of the bay, and as one of the suburbs of Melbourne it holds an important position. It is at the mouth of the Yarra river, and nine miles from the city. Here heavily-laden ships unload before proceeding up the river, a crooked, muddy stream. A canal is being constructed which will shorten the distance several miles and be of great advantage to the shipping interests. The great city of Melbourne was first founded in 1835, by a man named Faulkner. It made but little progress until the discovery of gold in 1851. From that time, like San Francisco, it has made rapid strides, showing what the energy of man can accomplish, and it is its boast that it never was a penal colony. Its streets are broad and at right angles, giving it the appearance of an American city. The buildings are modern in style, but largely built of blue stone, imparting a somber appearance to the city. It is comparativly flat, and its system of sewerage is all above ground in stone gutters outside of the sidewalks and crossing them at corners of streets and allies.

The Public Library here is said to be the finest in the southern hemisphere, containing 100,000 books and 15,000 pamphlets. The annual number of readers and visitors is 266,000. It has in connection with it a museum devoted to the sister arts of painting and sculpture.

The Royal Park and Zoological Gardens occupy a spacious reserve of several hundred acres, with a fine collection of animals and birds. The beautiful plumage of the tropical birds and the ease with which they acquire the use of language is truly wonderful to those who hav been acquainted only with birds of colder climates. The National Museum of Natural History and Geology is a place of absorbing interest to the student of nature. The city proper is surrounded with thirty-seven suburban towns or villages, most of them with their own city government. The town hall is a lofty, steepled building. In every suburb, Melbourne, like Sydney, is interspersed with various parks and gardens—breathing-places for the masses. The city has one line of cars, or trams, as they call them, about three and a half miles long, and others in construction, but all parts of city and suburb are connected with lines of cabs and omnibuses.

Victoria and New South Wales now stand at the head of the colonies, the former with over eight hundred thousand inhabitants, while the latter has six hundred thousand. The public revenue of each is about four million pounds per annum. The yearly imports of Victoria amount to fourteen million pounds, and New South Wales thirteen million. Victoria has about six hundred miles of railroad in use, but its rail accommodations are behind the age—cars divided into compartments where the traveler is locked in and at the mercy of the guard whether he is permitted to leave it at the stations or not, and with none of the arrangements for the comfort of passengers with which the American cars are provided. Some of the experiences of travelers are more amusing in recital than in reality. Another fact is that in changing cars every traveler must look after his own baggage or it will be left, no matter if it is checked.

Melbourne may well be called a city of churches, and if the money used in building their tall steeples and towers, and the useless chimes of bells, were used in building homes for the industrious poor, it would giv their God greater glory, and cause for more happiness on earth. Melbourne has many charitable institutions, but I do not mean charity, but help to help themselvs. Rents are enormously high for a common-sized family; a house with the poorest accommodations cannot be had less than from £2 10s. to £3 a week, and the lessee must keep it in repair, and pay the rates, or taxes.

Bigotry reigns supreme, and strenuous efforts are being made by the government to destroy the growing Liberal thought of the day. As your readers are aware, the government prosecuted Joseph Symes, editor of the Liberator and lecturer for the Australian Secular Association of Melbourne, for publishing his paper without a license, upon which charge he was convicted. He was also arrested, and had two trials, the jury failing to agree both times, for selling tickets of admission to Sunday night lectures, the law defining the crime as keeping a disorderly house, and he was ordered for a third trial, but the government, realizing that to continue the case was to court defeat, dismissed it, claiming, however, that it is still the law of the colony, and it is impossible to-day for a lecturer to hire a theater in Melbourne and sell tickets of admission Sunday, for the lessee is threatened with having his license taken from him, if he sublets for that purpose. As yet this fight has borne no fruit in that direction, but it is to be hoped it will in the future. In that respect Freethought is much crippled in Melbourne, but thought is growing, and the people are bursting the bands with which they hav been trammeled, and are using their liberty as did our pilgrim fathers use their new-found liberty to persecute all that did not think as they did. The Secularism of Australia has no adhesiv qualities, its aim being to tear down and destroy everything that bears the name of religion or Spiritualism, while they hav nothing better to offer. They furnish no material with which to erect a better structure.

Secularism is a word much used here, and the impression it leaves upon our minds is not pleasing, and we were sorry to learn that the National Liberal League of America had been changed to the Secular Union, because there is no union in English Secularism as evidenced in the colonies. The name in progressiv America perhaps will not imply what it does here, for here it is of the Thomas Winter school. No one has rights but the Materialists, and while they hav not succeeded in tearing the churches to pieces, they are at present engaged in tearing themselvs to pieces as organizations.

The same is true not only of Sydney but of Melbourne and Auckland as well. However, evolution is nature's law; change and the refining process is more hopeful than crystallization. They hav not yet caught the spirit of true Liberalism.

We spent the month of December in Melbourne, Mr. York speaking to large and increasing audiences; but, having a further engagement in Sydney, we left Melbourne with the intention of returning before leaving the colonies. Since our first arrival in Sydney, Mr. York has been suffering from ill-health. The sudden changes of climate of this southern world do not seem to agree with him, and the length of our stay here depends solely upon his health. We are now in the midst of summer, but our experiences of Melbourne climate were not agreeable—one day in danger of a sun-stroke, the next almost needing an overcoat. They are having very heavy rains in many parts of Australia and in some localities severe floods and hail-storms. There is much more rain in Victoria than in New South Wales, and the soil being more productiv, most of the vegetables that are used in the colonies are grown there, and New South Wales gets satisfaction by calling it the Cabbage Garden. A lively jealousy exists between the two colonies. Living is expensiv here; a pound is looked upon about the same as a dollar is in America; at any rate, the purchasing power of twenty shillings ($5) here is no greater than of twenty shillings ($2.50) in California, while of double the value. But for a home giv me America and our own dear California.

With the best of wishes for all TRUTH SEEKER readers, I bid them all a Happy New Year. MRS. J. L. YORK.

BROOKLYN, E. D., Feb. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Anything in relation to the history and doings of Thomas Paine with all Freethinkers must be interesting; hence the article of mine in your last issue was the result. Unfortunately for me, I loaned my last paper, containing its telling cartoon on Catholicity and priestcraft in general, to a friend, who in turn passed it round to convulsed Liberalists, and it has not found its way back yet. Well, let it sail around. No doubt it is doing its work. There must hav been something therein that touched my very sensitiv feelings, when the subject of Spiritualism is broached—perhaps a letter from our astute friend Brother Thomas Winter, or Aunt "Elmina."

The fact with me seems to be, I was fearful you were going to throw up your hand and go into Spiritualism, and this would never do! We must hav a strictly neutral sheet on this important subject, for if we don't, where are we? The venerable Thomas Winter, the Materialist, wants something he can grasp with a pair of tongs, and Aunt Elmina the autobiography of ourselvs before we are born! I am sorry for Aunty, as she seems to hav lost all confidence in human veracity. But who can blame her, for old King David was somewhat in the same fix, when he declared in his wrath "all men were liars." Perhaps the old saint had just come from a spiritual seance! For between you and me, Friend Macdonald, I hav little confidence in public mediums, and yet I hav seen wonderful things, both with public mediums and in my own house.

Now in relation to the world emancipator, Thomas Paine. I think I can put you in the way of getting a genuin likeness of the great man. It was painted by his friend and renowned artist Jarvis. It is in this city. An anecdote is told of the Episcopal bishop Provost, who was getting his portrait taken by the same Infidel artist. The bishop, while sitting, naturally asked Mr. Jarvis what his religious belief was. Mr. Jarvis only remarked, "Please, keep your mouth shut, and keep your eyes fixed on that portrait." The portrait was that of Thomas Paine. Please credit me with $3.

Yours, for Liberalism, DAVID BRUCE.

[Mr. Bruce should not hold THE TRUTH SEEKER responsible for any opinions advanced by our correspondents. He has no more right to accuse us of trying to "squelch man's hope of immortality," because we print a Materialistic communication, than the Materialists hav to accuse us of advocating Spiritualism because we print one of Mr. Bruce's able articles.—ED. T. S.]

BELLEVILLE, KAN., Feb, 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Those illustrations—well, they are simply grand, and add immensely to the convincing value of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The conscious brain is reached through the eye far quicker than the ear, and usually the impression is more lasting. This fact admitted, it will be difficult to rightly estimate the future value of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER as a teacher. Long may it liv, and that it may succeed in the permanent overthrow of all superstition, and in the final establishment of truth, science, and reason, with Universal Mental Liberty, is the earnest wish of Yours, &c., DR. H. PATRICK.

P.S.—Inclosed you will find P. O. draft for $12, which apply as per inclosed order and oblige the subscriber.

MONTPELIER, VT., Feb. 21, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I send you by this mail $4—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, 25 cents for the ANNUAL, 25 cents for Remsburg's "Sabbath-Breaking," and the balance to help the pictures—in my opinion the best thing that could be thought of. They speak volumes. Long may Watson Heston liv to giv his beautiful head-work to the world. Yours for truth, DAVID FLEMING.

EARLVILLE, ILL., Feb. 19, 286.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER (for you seem dearer than ever before to me): Having Mr. Remsburg in our midst to defend Thomas Paine, and giv us a treat on "Bible Morals," I hav felt just like saying to you, like Simeon of old, Mine eyes hav seen one of the saviors of the world—from superstitions and bigotry—the first Freethought lecture I hav ever had the pleasure of attending. It was a glorious success, and full house and good order. If it made anyone's ears tingle to hear the truth; it will probably make people think for themselvs, which is very necessary among so many churches. I was somewhat a curiosity myself as well as Mr. Remsburg, for I learned I was pointed out by some as the woman who got up the lectures, but I think they gave me too much credit, for others helped. However, I will accept the honor with thanks if they think I deserve it, for it was a glorious treat for me to listen to, and I hope Mr. Remsburg will liv long with good health to battle with superstition and priestcraft in this nineteenth century. SARAH C. HILTON.

POLO, Ill., Feb. 24, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had the pleasure of listening to two lectures by Mr. Charles Watts, Monday and Tuesday evenings, the 22d and 23d inst.; subjects, "Secularism: Destructiv, and Constructiv," and "Unbelief: its Nature and Service to Mankind." We had all we could comfortably seat in the largest hall in our place, and an attentiv and appreciativ audience. It has caused a "a great shaking among the dry bones."

Mr. Watts is considered the ablest man upon these subjects we hav ever listened to. We tried hard to get up a discussion between him and the ministers of this place, but so far hav not succeeded. C. D. REED.

CORUNNA, IND., Feb. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see that the grand old TRUTH SEEKER is gradually evoluting from a Bible pounding to an overdue scientific journal. Although we love the grand truths of scientific research, yet THE TRUTH SEEKER will fail to accomplish the objects so fondly hoped for if Bible fighting is neglected. THE TRUTH SEEKER is valuable as a missionary document only when it contains plain expositions of the Christian Bible. I feel assured that it is the desire of a large majority of your patrons that your invaluable journal should contain at least two pages of plain Bible expositions, so that in the hands of Christians it would accomplish grand results. Do not think that our destructiv campaign is ended, for it is scarcely begun. Faith in the Bible must be destroyed before science can reign in our benighted land. If the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER should spend a season in this vicinity, he might be made to believe that Thomas Paine has not yet been born. Yours, for more Bible pounding,

JOSEPH A. SHADE.

SOUTH LOWELL, ALA., Jan. 24, 1886.

Mr. EDITOR: Some think the Mormons and the Roman Catholics are the only sects who obey a supposed higher authority than the civil government. But they are mistaken. The missionary Baptists of this state (the North River Association) hav published the minutes of their annual session for 1884, and also their declaration of faith, and the fourteenth article says: "Of civil government—That civil government is of divine appointment, for the interest and good of human society, and that magistrates are to be prayed for, conscientiously honored and obeyed, except in things opposed to the will of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the only Lord of conscience and the prince of the kings of the earth."

Now, I hope others will examin the faith of other denominations, and let us see who and how many are making this government and its laws secondary to some other power.

All who respect some other government as superior to our form should stop voting, and depend on their higher for protection, and not on our despised civil government. They despise the rule of the people by the people, but want the pope or Jesus to rule us. Let us find who are the friends of the people.

The time is coming when we must know who is to rule this nation, whether it shall be science or faith; whether man's interests, or the pope's, or Jesus's, are to be protected; whether the people are to rule themselvs, and hav a republic, or one is to rule, and hav a despotism. And let us watch our law-makers, both in the state and in Congress, and learn who are the friends of the people and science; and when we vote, know who to vote for, to save what we now hav, viz.: The people shall rule themselvs. J. K. DEARTH.

THREE RIVERS, Feb. 25, 1885.

MR. EDITOR of the champion periodical of Liberalism and Freethought: You can scarcely imagin the great pleasure and real interest I find in reading the many glorious communications with which each number comes filled.

The illustrations speak volumes of themselvs longer to be retained in the mind of the beholder than prose or poetry however well composed.

The letters from A, B, and C are mostly real pearls, gems of thought and intrinsic worth. It really seems as though it were wrong for me to feast on the good things of my brother and sister Liberals, devotees of progress, unless I, too, cast in my mite of encouragement for the benefit of our noble and praiseworthy cause, true Liberalism, without blemish in thought, word, or deed.

It seems to me, if the blessed good old hero of modern independent Freethought, D. M. Bennett, can return from beyond the silent tomb to abide in spirit with his old friends, he is either with our present editor, E. M. Macdonald, inspiring him with wisdom, zeal, and perseverance in conducting the dear old (battle-ax) TRUTH SEEKER, or else the lessons of him who died a martyr to the cause hav been well learned, and, if anything, improved upon since the great preceptor passed away.

It was hard for me to become reconciled to Brother Bennett's death. And why not? let me ask, since it is a fact that in the days of our youth we were both school and classmates, play-fellows and messmates, living together several years, and, if not bedfellows, we were certainly room-mates and intimate cronies, well agreed in our channels of thought.

Of course we enjoyed ourselvs as only dear friends could. I do not recollect of ever detecting the least breach of a good, truthful, upright, moral character in any of his walks of life. He was always pleasant, cheerful, and good-natured. We used to write many a sheet of old-fashioned foolscap paper chuckful to each other, both in poetry and prose, none of which, however, has been preserved from the waste basket. He was much more of a student, or "book-worm," than myself, so, while I used to be out recreating or playing with others, Bennett would usually be in his closet poring over some scientific or literary work.

On his return voyage around the world he called and spent two days and nights with us at our present home, and we had a gala old time in recapitulating the scenes of our boyhood and youth.

I was sorely disappointed and grieved at his sudden demise, as I had previously learned that he had intended to make a tour through the western states, when I fondly anticipated another pleasant time with our dear old friend, the brave founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER paper, which I hav taken and faithfully read from its first commencement in Paris, Ill.

I think there should be an anniversary day kept by us Liberals in memory of the birth of so important an event when Bennett drove the first wedge of Liberalism into the old cross-grained log of Christian superstition and false-hearted egotism and bigotry.

What say you, Brother Macdonald, and what say you, brother and sister readers of the mighty TRUTH SEEKER?

CANYON CITY, COL., Feb. 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: When you see or know of men who, though convinced of the falseness of religious claims, yet do nothing toward correcting the error, but giv to the church to support it because of their business and relativ surroundings, and leave truth and good men to struggle for the redemption of the world from a host of parasites, your confidence in such men must be lost. I judge for myself—mine would be.

Now, is there no likeness between such men and those who know the absurdity of our unreasonable, unmanly, and greatly damaging orthography and yet dare not do anything to correct it when our country is suffering twenty-five million dollars every year, and as much more in education, besides the damage done to children's faculties of logic? The eyes of people are blinded by a false method of learning. They are taught in such a way as to suppose that letters indicate the meaning of words instead of simply the sounds of words.

I knew a man of considerable intelligence who was born blind, was a good musician, well versed in grammar, and could converse intelligently on all the common subjects of life, and yet had never seen a word. Now, how did he know the meaning of words? Certainly not by letters. It should be known and truly understood that the only and proper office of a letter is to spell a sound—that is, represent a sound to the eye. In arithmetic we hav only nine simple numbers and as many figures to represent them, with a nought to keep place. These figures always signify the same numbers, so that a child knowing how to count readily learns the figures that spell these numbers, and need not be mistaken.

Now, if there be thirty-four or thirty-five simple elements of speech or sounds in the English language, and each should be spelled by a specific letter, how long would it require a child to know how to spell thirty-four or thirty-five sounds as certainly as it can the numbers? A. B. PIKARD.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY: I inclose money for two renewals and one new subscriber. Let me say that the new one is a stanch Freethinker who will stay with us.

I do not like your pictures. It seems to me it must be a perverted taste that enjoys such caricatures. I consider their introduction the greatest mistake THE TRUTH SEEKER has ever made. The pictures are repulsiv exaggerations of truth, which would be very appropriate in Puck and other papers that appeal to man's sensual nature, but are sadly out of place in the old TRUTH SEEKER. They will very much mar the good influence of your paper among those who most need its light. Repulsiv pictures glaring up from both the outside pages will cause many to throw the paper down with disgust who might otherwise be induced to read it. I never was ashamed to open up my TRUTH SEEKER any place until you spoiled its neat outside appearance with hideous cartoons. I want you to publish this, and if there are others of the same way of thinking I should like to hear from them.

Fraternally, H. CLAY LUSE.

BURR OAK, MICH., Feb. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Having long been a reader of your interesting paper, I hav read many articles from the pen of "N. G. W.," and had always considered him a person of average good sense and sound judgment. You can therefore judge of my surprise on reading his letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 6th. To think that, after proving to the best of his ability the author of the article he refers to, in the Burr Oak Acorn, to be, if not quite a fool, but a few degrees removed from one, he boldly asserts; "No man ever wrote that."

Evidently he thinks the weak-minded are all of the feminin gender. Poor fellow! He is undoubtedly an old "bach," and his poor opinion of the good sense of the ladies arises from the fact of his never having been able to persuade one of their number to change her name to Mrs. W.

DETROIT, MICH., Feb. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed $5 please send me "Men, Women, and Gods," by Helen H. Gardener; one TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1886; two copies "Crimes of Preachers." The balance I contribute to the extra expense of the pictures as now published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am well pleased with the push and beauty of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I take much pleasure in reading it Sundays. There is more truth and common sense in it than in all the sermons preached in our city. May you continue in well-doing. E. CHOPE.

Our Liberal Union is an organization of the past. None of us had the backbone to take the lead, and consequently the infant died. Our president, Dr. O. B. Whitford, did all in his power to keep us afloat. The doctor's pamphlets, "Christianity a Reward for Crime" and "Bible Fabrications Refuted," created a sensation here, and were undoubtedly the cause of his defeat last spring when he ran for mayor—an office he had been elected to twice in this city of the mountains. But, then, his views at that time were known to but few, and consequently when the pamphlets appeared everybody had something to say about them, and the followers of the "meek and lowly" did all in their power to defeat him. They did it, though, by only about 40 majority out of 1,200 votes cast. They tried to injure him in his profession too, but the doctor's reputation was too high.

Respectfully, FRED. COOKE.

Feb. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In your last issue is a letter from "A. H. K.," of Pacific, Mo., stating that the Masonic Lodge had expelled two of its members for non-belief in a God. I wonder how long the Liberal and Freethinking masses intend to quietly submit to the persecuting, domineering spirit and bigotry of Christian fanatics. Fully one-half or two-thirds of the Masons within the circle of my acquaintance are Agnostics, and this the Grand Master of New York stamps as "practical Atheism," which his grand jurisdiction will not tolerate. Well, let him so stamp it if he wishes, and in a few years he can stamp his feet in a rage of despair, for just as sure as the night follows the day there is going to be a reformation in the Masonic constitution, by-laws, and ritual.

No intelligent Mason now believes in the efficacy and power of prayer; few believe in the inspiration of the Bible, or that it is a gift from God to man, and none pretend to follow its teachings. How absurd, how ridiculous, then, for Freethinking, Liberal-minded Masons to teach those old, worn-out fables when both "Master" and "candidate" know that it is but a pack of falsehoods and fraud.

The Grand Orient, of France, has set us an example that is well worthy of our consideration, and until we follow in her footsteps it is useless to proclaim ourselvs as Free-masons. We are not free. The chains and fetters of a law based upon a superstitious dogma are as galling upon the mind of a Liberal Mason as were ever the iron chains upon the limbs of a negro slave. We are not free; we are bound in the fetters of a dying creed. We are little else than a prop to the church, that in its day of supremacy forced upon our brotherhood its God, its Christ, its saints, its "holy" Bible, and all of our laws which tend to the suppression of honest thought and the complete crushing out of every intellectual advancement. If Agnostic Masons will unite in the reformation and regeneration of our brotherhood, there is no doubt of our ultimate success. The whole drift of scientific and intelligent thought is toward Agnosticism, and if our order cannot keep pace with the advancement of the age it must necessarily giv way to some other organization that can adapt itself to the environments.

Will not "A. H. K." and his expelled friends, and all other Liberal Masons, make some inquiries in their respectiv localities and see what the prospects are for forming a Masonic lodge under a constitution, by-laws, and ritual sufficiently free from bigotry and superstition as not to bar from our fold or expell from our ranks an honest man on account of his opinions? I hav the requisit number pledged to form such a lodge where I liv, and when the call is made for a national meeting for the purpose of organizing and framing the constitution and by-laws, etc., we will hav a delegate present. Let every man, whether a Mason or not, who is in favor of such a move, write a few lines for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

PLUMB LINE.

FILLMORE, UTAH, Jan. 28, 286.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 16th I find an article entitled "Persecuting the Mormons," in which Judge Powers is taken to task for failing to naturalize an alien because of his belief as a Mormon, with which I beg leave to differ. Is it not contradictory for a man to say that he believes in polygamy and could not as a juror convict a man found guilty of that charge, and at the same time say that he is attached to the principles and laws of this country? The anti-polygamy law is as much a law against polygamy as a law against stealing or counterfeiting. It is rightfully said that it is not possible to stretch the clause defining the requirements for qualification for citizenship to cover belief. But when belief culminates in action, and that action is unlawful, as it clearly is in this case when a man says he could not or would not render a verdict of guilty in a polygamy case, I hold that he should be debarred from citizenship, because he denies the supremacy of the laws of the land he would adopt. It does not help the case any to cite the case of capital punishment and say that some people are opposed to it. If an alien should apply for papers of citizenship in a state where capital punishment formed part of the penal code, and the officer to whom he should apply, having the authority, should ask the question if he would convict a man, the proof being conclusiv, and he should answer No, I would debar him on the same principle.

A man may not like a certain law, he may even think it is unconstitutional, yet he may not disobey it with impunity. Of course a man has the right to test the constitutionality of a law, but if he does and it is decided against him, he should abide by the result. I do not like the Comstock laws, and always hav urged, and always will urge, their repeal (the question of modification is not worth considering), but until they are repealed I shall endeavor to obey them. It is in the mean time my right and privilege to agitate and petition for their repeal until I get it. I wish I could see as good excuse for some of the acts in the Edmunds bill, notably Sections 10, 11, and 12, referred to in the same article of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If the property of the Mormon church and the emigration fund can be taken and be appropriated for public uses, I do not see why the property of any or all of the other denominations cannot be likewise used. He should hav included all while he was about it. I suppose, however, there is good reason why the honored senator refrained. It would hav hit some darling institution of his own, where part of his treasures was lodging, and from which he expected another lift in the future, besides a passport to everlasting glory and a big harp on the other side of Jordan. I believe there are plenty of means within the bounds of the constitution for putting down polygamy without using means that are clearly unconstitutional according to my idea. Or, if constitutional because it is alleged that they use it to fight the government and bring in immigrants to help defy the laws of the land, where is the sect who has not used its means to fight the state when the latter came in contact with her pet schemes? To me it seems that our law-givers hav been trying to see how long they could beat around the bush without routing the enemy. In one thing, however, they hav succeeded; they hav made themselvs despicable not only to the Mormon people but to the world. They hav also succeeded in keeping up an enmity between the Mormons and outsiders that could not hav been so bitter if they had either let them alone or made them respect the laws of the land.

To me it is immaterial which course they pursue, but they should hav done the one or the other long ago.

It is a consolation to know that Infidels as a class hav no share in this crusade. It is the Bible God following his old business, inspiring the weaker to stand up and be crushed by the stronger. When they get done with the Mormons they will likely take hold of the Infidels. I am not afraid of anything they can do to us so long as they keep within the spirit and letter of the Constitution, but past experience teaches that they stretch it like India rubber. In fact, in the hands of united Christianity is becomes a rope of sand.

Therefore we should strengthen our forces while we can, as every one gained from the majority counts two for us.

Respectfully, GEO. C. VEILE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Truth.

"The rich man's child is clad, forsooth,
In garments rich and rare;
And shall my child, my own dear Truth,
Hav nothing then to wear?"
Then looked I down upon my breast,
Where she had sweetly sunk to rest;
The light of heaven was in her face
Its blue was in her eyes so sweet:
Unclad she lay in my embrace;
I felt our hearts together beat.
The dancing dimples on each cheek
Seemed fairies playing hide-go-seek,
Now in the chin, now on the neck,
Now on her side a floating speck,
Now ambushed on her heaving breast,
Then flitting to the cheek's "home-rest."
Her lips, a parted rosebud, drew
The nourishment by which she grew.
An infant's lisp was on her tongue,
Simple but sweet the songs she sung,
Her speech of shortest words and few,
But all its meaning kind and true.
"The rich man's child is taught," I cried,
"In style to speak, to dance, to sing:
Music and teachers are supplied
To every daughter of a king.
So shall my Truth, my own dear pet,
Her robes, her books, her teachers, get.
Bring forth, bring forth the magic ring
The fairies gave her at her birth;
That little gem bring forth, oh, bring,
For it is all Truth has on earth.
Its magic spell can loss restore,
The friends and pleasures that hav fled;
Can giv us what we had before,
Can even resurrect the dead;
But it cannot create anew
To please a vagrant wish or whim—
Then sell this bauble to the Jew
And take, oh, take, his gold of him!"
Then Pride went forth, as I desired,
With eagerness she flew;
And then my cherub was attired
In garments strange and new:
Nurses and governantes were hired,
A strange and motley crew.
And day by day, as this transpired,
Further apart we grew,
Till, into royal greatness grown,
My child no more I knew.
In vain my loss I advertise:
A thousand false pretenders rise
With, "I am Truth," and "I," and "I,"
"Come, prove me, try," and, "Try," and "Try."
Ah, well they know, these claimants bold,
I sold Truth's magic ring for gold,
And now I hav no test to try
If these be Truth, or if they lie.
The cunning Jew her ring will hold,
And I hav misery—and gold.
Oh, for one moment of the past
When next my heart I held Truth fast!
"Faith, faith!" You mock, you mock me sore!
Faith cannot my lost joy restore.
Or, could I think Truth changed like this,
It only more would mar my bliss.
Nay, let me mourn my child as dead—
'Tis better than to be misled.
Till I Truth's natal ring shall find,
Faith's consolations are unkind.
The naked Infant then, once more
I'll nourish, worship, and adore.

Our Dog Captain.

Our dog Captain was a large Newfoundland, almost as white as a sheep—yes, whiter, for his hair was a clear white, not even creamy. He had one black eye, one black ear, one black foot, and two or three small black spots on his body. Like all dogs of his kind he loved the water, and to go hunting in a boat was his chief delight. Brother trained him to fetch and carry, until he could fill the place of an errand boy in many respects.

My home was one-fourth of a mile from my father's, and it was not unusual for Captain to come to my door and set a basket or pail down at my feet, and woe betide the one who offered to touch it except myself. Mother had said, "Cap, take this to Vira." Vira might hav it, but not anybody else.

I would take off the cover and find a note, aud put in whatever it called for, and, putting the bail in his mouth, say, "Take that to mother," and he would immediately start home with it. If mother did not happen to be in, he would stand guard over it until she returned. He knew all our names as well as we did, and would deliver anything to the one it was sent to, and to no one else. He frequently brought a baskct of eggs, or a pail of butter, and I would send back meat or groceries.

He appeared to be very much afraid my brother was going to be drowned. My house was quite close to the lake, and summer evenings the boys liked to go bathing, and brother would bring Cap to me to keep until he called for him. The moment he heard the boys' voices in the water he was wild, and if one of the children opened a door, out he went. He would stand on the bluff and look until he spied his master, then plunge in the water, and brother either had to come ashore of his own will or Cap would bring him by force. He would find brother, no matter how many there were, or how much they tried to puzzle him. He did not appear to care if all the boys in town were in the water so long as Seward was not there.

Nothing made him quite as angry as to fool him in any way. He would try to tear father or brother all to pieces if they played any tricks on him. Another thing that angered him was to talk baby-talk. Oh, how it did disgust him! He acted as though he was utterly dumbfounded; would snarl, show his teeth, and get out of sight as soon as possible.

Seward carries quite a scar on one of his cheeks, where Cap snapped him once when he held him and talked nonsense to him.

He once undertook to bring up two young motherless chickens. When they were very small he would lie down and put his great shaggy head over them, and they would nestle close to him and appear perfectly contented. For a few days they got along nicely, but when large enough to run around and get away from him, his trouble commenced. His efforts to keep them together were amusing; he would walk around them, put his nose aga nst them, and lie down in front of them; but, finding his efforts fruitless, he set his great paw on them to hold them fast. Of course they did not run any more. Then he was puzzled worse than ever. Aftcr looking at them and turning them over several times, he brought them to mother, mutely asking what was the matter. Mother then buried them, but he dug them up and brought them back. She then took them and when he was off with brother carried them quite a distance and threw them into a field, but, in a few hours, home came Cap with those chickens! Finally she put them on a pile of brush and set fire to it and cremated them.

He always liked to work, and would carry potatoes all day if some one would put them in a basket for him, tried to help feed the cattle, and always carried in wood when anyone else did. When he was about twelve years of age some malicious person poisoned him, and we all mourned him sincerely.

"That's How."

After a great snow storm, a little fellow began to shovel a path through a large snow bank before his grandmother's door. He had nothing but a small shovel to work with.

"How do you expect to get through that drift?" asked a man passing along.

"By keeping at it," said the boy, cheerfully, "that's how."

That is the secret of mastering almost every difficulty under the sun. If a hard task is before you, stick to it. Do not keep thinking how large or how hard it is; but go at it, and little by little it will grow smaller and smaller, until it is done.

If a hard lesson is to be learned, do not spend a moment in fretting; do not lose a breath in saying, "I can't," or, "I don't see how;" but go at it, and keep at it. Study. That is the only way to conquer it.

On the Eve of Boyhood.

A gentleman passing along Franklin street yesterday saw two children, apparently five and six years old, playing in the gutter. The elder wore pantaloons, while the younger still clung to infantil dresses. Stopping, he addressed the boy with pantaloons: "Are you both boys?" "No," was the answer! "I'm one, and Johnny's going to be one next week."

Correspondence.

ELY, VT., Jan. 30, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I think I will write a few lines for it. I am fifteen years old and go to school. Our teacher is an Advent minister, although he is very kind, and tries to help us in our studies. I study arithmetic, geography, grammar, history, reading, and spelling. I like to read the pieces in the Children's Corner very much. I think the piece in the last copy was very nice. Thomas Paine surely was a great hero. My papa has the "Age of Reason," and if people read it thoroughly they can get a great deal of reason from it. My mother is a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav a twin brother who is also a reader of it. My only sister died two years ago with the typhoid fever. We hav her youngest child. He is three years old, has long, curly hair and black eyes. If he livs to be a young man he will be a Freethinker. Now, dear Miss Wixon, I think I must close. This is the first piece I hav ever written. If you think it is worth printing, I should be pleased to hav you print it, so good-bye. From your true and loving friend, DENA L. DIMOND.

ALLIANCE, O., Feb. 9, 1886.

MISS SUSAN WIXON: I hav seen so many pieces in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I thought I would write, too. My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time, and I takc so much pleasure in reading the Children's Corner. I go to Progressiv Lyceum, and I say a good many speeches out of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I go to public school, and am in the Second Reader. I am nine years old. I hav two brothers and three sisters. I think I hav written enough this time, and if you think this is nice enough to put in the paper I will try to do better. HENRY BIRCH.

PAWTUCKET, R. I., Feb. 12, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has for the last three or four years. I never thought anything about reading it until a few days ago I took it up and read the Children's Corner. I was so pleased with it that I thought I would write and tell you. I correspond with a little girl, and she livs in Bermuda. She seut me a leaf from the allspice-tree in one of her letters. I hav been sick with the scarlet fever, and hav not been out of doors yet. I am twelve years old, and am in the highest grammar school. I hav a very nice teacher. His name is Mr. Harrub. On my birthday he sent me some beautiful hot-house roses. Do you not think him very kind?* I expect to spend next summer on Bullock's Point, as papa has recently bought a cottage there. We spent last summer there, and liked it very much. It is not very far from Fall River. I will now close, hoping you will like this well enoughto publish it. I remain,

Your loving friend, MAUDE DAVIS.

*[Yes, it is always pleasant to be remembered when sick.—ED. C. C.]

DODGE CITY, KAN., Feb. 9, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw my letter in the Children's Corner, and I thought if I wrote again I could do better. I am in the Fourth Reader. My teacher's name is Mrs. Keating. I like her very much. We had examination. When we say to my little sister, "Where is mamma?" she says, "Da da." She will be two years old in July. If this letter is not good enough please do not print it. Papa says he will get the "Story Hour" for me.

Ever your friend, KATIE COLLAR.

TORONTO, Jan. 25, 1886.

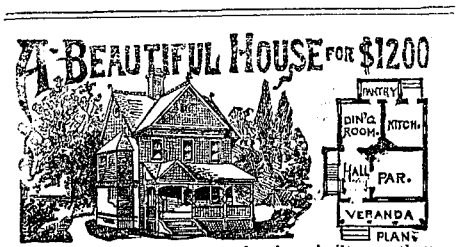
DEAR MISS WIXON: My pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and thinks so much of you that he has your picture, which was in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, framed, and when I look at your sweet facc I know you are too good to make fun or burn a letter from one of your friends, so I write you. Do not be afraid of being liked by me, for I am only ten years old, but I am getting older fast. I can "rassle" any boy of my size that I know of. I got a first-class certificate in Wellsley street school for perfect lessons and good conduct. Miss Spence, our teacher, does not say much about God, but she has to read a chapter in the Bible every morning. The other day she read about Jesus feeding five hundred folks on five small loaves and two fishes! I asked my chum, Jack Wright, if he thought Jesus could do that, and he said he thought that was the biggest lie ever started out on Jesus, and if it ever was true wouldn't he be a first-class man to run a boarding-house? Then we both laughed, and we had an extra page of lessons to write. I think it is a good thing to hav to hav the Bible read in school, because it cheers a fellow up just as good as "Gulliver's Travels," "Robinson Crusoe," or "Arabian Nights." It has been snowing here for about two days, and the snow is about two feet deep on the streets, but I guess you won't much care to hear about the weather in this north country. I go with pa to hear the Freethought lectures. I am going to lecture myself. I cannot talk much about it now, because pa says they would expell me from school if they knew I was an Infidel. But just you wait and I'll bet you'll hear from me. I weigh eighty-seven pounds, and my head measures twenty-two inches. Now you must not think I am a blower, but I do feel proud that I am healthy and strong. With best love I am, Yours truly,

EDWIN F. CHUROHILL.

TEXAS, MICH., Feb. 20, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav often read THE TRUTH SEEKER at my grandpa's for several years past, and hav thought I would like to be one of the many who correspond in the Children's Cornor. I am fourteen years old, and go to school when I am well enough. I hav often got the answers to puzzles in other papers, and think that I hav the enigma in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 13th.

Miss Wixon, I would like to see my letter printed, if it is correct and you think it good enough. I will try and do better next time.



Ever your friend, MARY MCLIN.

BRAMWELL, W. VA., Feb. 18, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: In your Chats with Puzzlers, I noticed your kind inquiry of my whereabouts, but, being in my uncle's store at Pocahontas, Va., at the time, I could not write for the Children's Corner, for he, as an orthodox, is very much opposed to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I left Newburgh in June, and, as wc hav had no post-office until lately, we had to go without THE TRUTH SEEKER for a while. Bramwell is surrounded by seven mountains. The Bluestone river flows around it in the shape of a horseshoe. It is about three thousand feet above the sea. I inclose you two puzzles, and hope you will find them acceptable. Yours respectfully,

ROBERT BERNHEIM.

A Lecturer's Story.

This is the story that was told me by Barnaby Barnhuller, the reformed lecturer:

"I can't recall the year, but it was a good while ago, that I made an engagement by letter to deliver my then famous humorous lecture, 'The Bulldog's Smile,' down at Dagsboro. You hav heard the lecture yourself, and know full well how I used to almost paralyze intelligent audiences with it—how the most obscure announcement of my coming never failed to bring out the janitor of the hall and the local editor, even in the most inclement weather. 'The Bulldog's Smile' was in its prime then, and I took it to Dogsboro with perfect self-assurance that it would reach the laughers of the solemnest, and shake out the shoe-pegs of the painfully grim and sedate. I did not know anything about it at the time I made the engagement, but it all came out afterward, and in a very annoying sort of way, too, that the Rev. Joseph Q. J. Potts, the great archeologist, had been engaged by another committee to deliver his great lecture, 'The Universal Deluge,' in the same town and on the same evening. I was to run on the fountains of my humor in one hall, and the Rev. Potts was to review the Deluge in the other, for there were but two in Dagsboro. I learned later, too, that there was a strong sentiment against my style of humor in Dagsboro, and that the Potts lecture had been arranged by the opposition party to draw away the people from 'The Bulldog's Smile.'

"Trains that carry lecturers are liable to delays. The one that carried me on this occasion held up with a hot-box or something, and set me down in Dagsboro half an hour after the time announced for the lecture to begin. A young man met me at the train, nervously asked if I were the lecturer, and, receiving an affirmativ reply, hurried me off to the hall and on the stage without as much as a word of introduction to the audience.

"The hall was packed, and I never saw a more solemn congregation of folks at any funeral I ever attended. What with the delay on the road and the hurry from the train to the hall, I was a bit nervous; but with the opening sentences I regained my usual composure.

"I let loose in rapid succession a few of my choicest gems of humor, and then paused to note the effect. You could hav heard a sixty-days' note fall due, and there wasn't a smile on a face before me. I was perplexed. I had never, in all my professional life, struck an audience so hard to fetch as that. But I was not easily discouraged in those days, and be sides, I was loaded to the muzzle with fun. I brought out my most effectiv ammunition. I described the unfortunate wooer fleeing from the foot of an irate parent, and in my most beautiful imagery, pictured him attempting to climb the five-rail fence in his way, while the family bull-dog clung to the slack of his trousers, oblivious of the mysterious future and of the dead and silent past. I told of the honorable and scantily clad citizen pursuing the wayward spotted steer round and round his garden at midnight's solemn hour. I sung of the cook and the kerosene can, and of the gathering of the remains in the adjoining county, and I warbled also of the long red wasp in the Sunday trousers of the pious man who had never learned to swear. And yet there was not a smile. Faces before me that were but a foot in length at the beginning, now, to my excited imagination, seemed to hav lengthened to a yard. But I went on. I marshaled my broadest and hardest-hitting jokes, and marched them in merriest step before those rows of solemn faces; but I looked in vain for one little smile. I was mad. I was half tempted to take up a club I had seen on the stage, and go out among those people and show them that the feelings of a humorist could not thus be wantonly trifled with for even as much as one hundred dollars per night.

"My audience was respectful, but totally uncomprehensiv, and at last, thoroughly disgusted, I cut my lecture short off, left the stage, received my fee from the young man who had met me at the train, went to the nearest hotel, and locked myself in my room.

"The first man I saw on the train next morning was my old friend, the Rev. Joseph Q. J. Potts. The meeting was a mutual surprise. Neither of us knew the other had been in Dagsboro.

"'I lectured there last night on 'The Universal Deluge,' said Mr. Potts, in answer to my query; 'and such an unmannerly audience may the blessings of an over-ruling providence spare me from ever meeting again. They smiled at my finest word-painting, they laughed uproariously at my most tear-starting passages, and at my grandest climaxes they just got up and stamped their feet and howled. When I was describing the animals coming from the ark in grand and solemn procession, perhaps the most deeply pathetic passage in my lecture, one man howled himself into a fit, and had to be carried out. I tell you, friend Barnhuller, I I don't want to ever pass through such another experience. I am almost tempted to leave the platform forever.'

"The thing was as plain as daylight, now. The men who had met us at the train had blundered. The Rev. Mr. J. Potts had lectured to those who had assembled to hear me tell of the bull-dog's smile, and I had talked to those who wanted light on the universal deluge. When Mr. Potts had heard my experience, he seemed to be annoyed, though I cannot now see why he should hav been. His lecture, if he spoke the truth, was a tremendous success. I only had cause to feel hurt.

"During the following two months I received six offers to repeat my lecture at Dagsboro at double my regular rates, and I sent every one of them to the Rev. Joseph Q. J. Potts, who treated them with silent contempt. Some men would hav been proud of a colossal success like that," concluded Mr. Barnhuller; "but the Rev. Joseph Q. J. Potts, the eminent archeologist and able commentator on the universal deluge, was not."—Scott Way in Puck.

Book Notices.

ADAMI AND HEVA.

I hav just read this charming contribution to our poesy—or, as I should say, this valuable addition to the literature of the age—which, nevertheless, will redound to the credit of the Liberal cause. "This power of poetry to refine our views of life and happiness is more and more needed as society advances. It is needed to withstand the encroachments of heartless and artificial manners that make civilization so tame and uninteresting," wrote William Ellery Channing, as though referring to this very Hindoo idyl which Putnam has presented us.

Poets find poor financial consolation, for Goldsmith exclaimed of poetry:

"Dear charming nymph, neglected and decried;
My shame in crowds, my solitary pride;
Thou source of all my bliss, and all my woe,
Thou found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so."

This should not be so, for "Adami and Heva" is a historical ode to the "divine passion," love, embracing the imagery of an Addison, the sweetness and delicacy of a Wordsworth, and the strength and fervor of a Shelley.

Prepare the laurel crown for S. P. Putnam, poet laureate of Liberalism!

E. A. STEVENS.

I hav read this new poem with genuin delight. It is an intrinsic gem, whose beauty would charm me if I found it in a desert, and never learned its author's name. I indorse its philosophy. Love is indeed life, and the highest law. I am glad this book is written. It is an argument for the existence of the most magnanimous conceptions independent of the Jewish Bible. I hav read it to several friends, including one of the finest literary critics in the world, who pronounced it really fine, and interrupted me with exclamations of pleasure and admiration. This New Version should be read by all. It is the poetry of truth and the truth of poetry.

EDGAR C. BEALL.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC for 1886 is full of interesting matter. It has thirty portraits, some of them very good indeed, of distinguished Freethinkers, scientists, and philosophers. In these last one or two likenesses are included on very slight grounds. There is a well-filled calendar, and the first article is a very ably written résumé of the present position of Freethought in the United States. James Parton writes approvingly to the editor, who contributes an excellent paper headed "How Voltaire Died." David A. Andrade sends a full report to date of Freethought in Australia. The ANNUAL is admirably printed. —National Reformer.

"Sabbath-Breaking." By John E. Remsburg. An exhaustiv pamphlet on the origin of the Sabbath day, and an examination into the Sunday arguments, together with a historical account of the Sabbath in the Middle Ages, as well as testimony of scholars, divines, and reformers. A valuable vade mecum of the entire Sunday question. Published by the Truth Seeker Commpany. For sale by Robert Clarke & Co. Price 25 cents.——"TRUTH SEEKER'S ALMANAC, 1886." Full of quaint historical facts and statistics, with thirty portraits of prominent European Freethinkers, scientists, and philosophers. Price 25 cents.——"Adami and Heva." By Samuel P. Putnam. Mr. Putnam in this short poem has dressed up the Brahman version of Adam and Eve. It abounds in many fine passages, and some of the descriptions are replete with a highly imaginativ coloring. Published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

ELMINA'S BOOK.

Mrs. Slenker's new book, "The Infidel School Teacher and the Handsomest Woman," is very interesting as well as instructiv, and will make an admirable book for Infidels to buy, read, and hand around to the young men and women of their neighborhood to read. In times of religious revivals it would save people from an insane asylum, for how often is it the case that some poor mortal loses their mental balance through the excitement of the revivals, and, as Liberals, it is our duty to do what little we can to enlighten people. It is not enough that we bask in the sunshine of intellectual freedom, we must lead others from the darkness of superstition into the light of science and truth, and Mrs. Slenker's book will help us to do it.

News of the Week.

NEARLY $36,000 has been raised by subscription for the widow of General Hancock.

ACTORS were arrested last Sunday in Cincinnati for breaking the Sabbath by appearing on the stage.

THE REV. THOMAS K. BEECHER was last week defeated in his aspirations for the mayoralty of Elmira, N. Y.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND decides that no indemnity is due to China on account of anti-Chinese outrages in this country.

BRIG.-GEN. ALFRED H. TERRY has been nominated by the president to be major-general vice Winfield Scott Hancock deceased.

A NEGRO was clubbed nearly to death and then hanged by lynchers at Eatontown, N. J., last week Friday. He had assaulted and outraged an invalid young woman.

JUSTICE MEECH, of Chicago, has brought suit for libel against the Rev. A. E. Kittridge of the same city. Kittridge, in a sensational sermon, accused Justice Meech of accepting bribes.

THE husband of Poet Joaquin Miller's daughter, Mrs. Mackaye, has secured a divorce. She claimed never to hav been religiously married to Mackaye because he was not a Catholic.

A LARGE meeting of Mormon women was held in a theater in Salt Lake City last Saturday. They defended their right to enter polygamy, and appointed a committee to memorialize President Cleveland to let them alone.

JUDGE PUTNAM, of Uxbride, Mass., has been sued for slander by the Rev. Mr. Bremner. The judge accused the preacher of making improper advances toward Mrs. Putnam, and the lady corroborates her husband. She several times very narrowly escaped being the victim of the violence of the Rev. Mr. Bremner.

As the Rev. J. A. Rood, of Cohasset, Mass., was returning from a prayer-meeting one evening last week he was fired at by some person unknown. The parson, who chanced to hav a revolver in his pocket, returned the fire, though with no marked result. He attributes the assault to the liquor interest, which he has been fighting.

THE Rev. Mr. Bache, of this city, who sued the Rev. Mr. Ray for slander, and estimated the damage to his character at $50,000, has withdrawn the suit and paid all the preliminary costs. The slanderous statements imputed by Mr. Bache to Mr. Ray were to the effect that Mr. Bache had more wives than one and kept a mistress.

ONE night last week a sick man, well-dressed, was picked up in a street in Jersey City and taken to a hospital, where he gave the name of Harris. The next day the physician told him he would die, and he then said he was the Rev. C. E. Rider, of Williamsport, Pa. Having said this he fell back dead. No further particulars of his death hav been made public.

SOME time ago Jim Holland came to New York from Abilene, Texas, to see the city. He fell in with one Tom Davis, a dealer in counterfeit money. Davis tried to shove some of the bad money upon Holland, and in the course of the discussion which followed, Mr. Holland fired a bullet through Mr. Davis and killed him. Last week Holland was tried here for murder and acquitted.

THE pallium which the pope has recently sent to America was not conferred on the new cardinal, Gibbons, as stated, but upon Archbishop Corrigan. Mr. Gibbons catches a red hat instead. The ceremony of conferring the pallium, or pall, or ulster, took place in St. Patrick's Cathedral, in this city, on the 4th. With the usual mummery Archbishop Corrigan was seated on the throne of McCloskey, defunct, as spiritual ruler of the papists of this diocese.

ON Friday of last week about 15,000 men employed on the horse-car roads of this city and Brooklyn "tied up" and resolved not to go to work again until Deacon Richardson, of Brooklyn, would pay his men $2 a day for twelve hours' work. At the end of ten hours the deacon surrendered, and the cars all over the city were soon running. The character of Mr. Richardson is thus outlined by John Swinton's Paper: "As Deacon William Richardson, of Brooklyn, is the most pious, so he the most penurious and grinding of railroad monopolists."

Odds and Ends.

"EVIL to him," etc.—"Look here, my friend, your molasses and whisky are not pure," said Gilhooly to an Austin grocer. Grocer (striking a tragic attitude): "To the pure all things are pure."

MINISTER: "That was a very vivid picture I drew in this morning's sermon of the burning tortures of the lost, deacon, and yet the congregation did not seem to be particularly impressed." Deacon: "Yes, I noticed that myself, and I partly account for it by the fact that the temperature of the church was only a degree or two above freezing."

IT WON'T WORK.

A bluebird perched on an aspen limb
In the February glitter,
You can't fool me with your siren hymn
Or the twit of your tunesome twitter;
I know, while of vernal things you blab,
That the buds won't burst nor the brooklets bab,
And that 'neath your promissory gab
There's an ornithological titter.

It's a chestnut, birdie, so it is—
This little toot you're tooting;
You seem to make it your annual "biz"
To come at the first saluting
Of genial air, and chirp about
The dandelion's coming out,
And the rhubarb's readiness to sprout,
And the verdure's general shooting.

But the bluebird perched on an aspen limb!
This spring you sing's a specter,
You can yawp the thing till your senses swim
In the sea of a god-kissed nectar,
But you can't inveigle a chap that's cute
To shuffle his four-ply flannel suit,
Or, in a moment of rashness, shoot
His all-wool chest-protector.

IN days of a past that is flown,
When dead folks were buried, I ween,
The dying one feebly would groan,
"Please see that my grave is kept green."

Cremation, alas, has to-day
This saying completely abolished.
It is now the custom to say,
"Just see that my urn is kept polished."

CONSISTENT PRONUNCIATION.

My faithful dawg
All through the fawg
Pursued a hawg
Into the bawg,
And leaped a lawg
Where sat a frawg
With eyes agawg.

But my good dawg,
Intent on hawg,
Kept on his jawg
And missed that frawg.

THE MORMON AND THE CHINAMAN.

A Mormon going southward,
A Chinaman going west—
They stopped beneath a sign-board
To sit them down to rest.

"Now, what a damned mean country
This is!" the Mormon said.
"A too muchee must glo countlee!"
And Chin Wong shook his head.

"Oh, whel you goin', Molmon!"
"Look up and you will know."
The Chinese climbed the sign-board,
And read, "To Mexico ☞."

"And where you going, heathen?"
"Look upee," said Chin Wong.
They read the other sign-board,
"This road to reach Hong Kong ☞."

Gems of Thought.

A PEOPLE cannot believe in such impossibilities as miracles unless fully immured in the darkness of religious superstition. It requires ignorance to make miracles a possibility.—D. M. Bennett.

MRS. POYSER is by no means the only one of her sex who believes that if women are fools, God almighty made them so to match the men.—Mrs. William Grey.

HE that has never suffered extreme adversity knows not the full extent of his deprivation [depravity]; and he that has never enjoyed the summit of prosperity is equally ignorant how far the iniquity of others can go. For our adversity will excite temptations in ourselvs, our prosperity in others. Sir Robert Walpole observed it was fortunate that few men could be prime ministers, because it was fortunate that few men could know the abandoned profligacy of the human mind. Therefore a beautiful woman, if poor, should use a double circumspection, for her beauty will tempt others and her poverty will tempt herself.—Colton's Lacon.

To speak in a mean, the virtue of prosperity is temperance, the virtue of adversity is fortitude, which in morals is the more heroical virtue. Prosperity is the blessing of the Old Testament. Adversity is the blessing of the New, which carrieth the greater benediction and the clearer revelation of God's favor. Yet even in the Old Testament, if you will listen to David's harp, you shall hear as many hearse-like airs as carols, and the pencil of the Holy Ghost hath labored more in describing the afflictions of Job than the felicities of Solomon.—Bacon's Essays.

THE Cartesian doubt, were it ever possible to be attained by any human creature (which it plainly is not), would be entirely incurable and no reasoning could ever bring him to a state of assurance or conviction upon any subject. It must, however, be confessed that this species of skepticism, when more moderate, may be understood in a very reasonable sense, and it is a necessary preparation to the study of philosophy, by preserving a proper impartiality in our judgments, and weaning our mind from all those prejudices which we may hav imbibed from education or rash opinion. To begin with clear and self-evident principles, to advance by timorous and sure steps, to review frequently our conclusions and examin accurately all their consequences; though by these means we shall make both a slow and a short progress in our systems—these are the only methods by which we can ever hope to reach truth, and attain a proper stability in certainty in our determinations.—Hume's Academical and Skeptical Philosophy.

CURIOUS INSTANCES OF HISTORICAL ILLUSION.

THE contemporaries of Louis the Fourteenth thought him tall. Voltaire, who might hav seen him and who had lived with some of the most distinguished members of his court, speaks repeatedly of his majestic stature. Yet it is as certain as any fact can be that he was rather below than above the middle size. He had, it seems, a way of holding himself, a way of walking, a way of swelling his chest and rearing his head, which deceived the eyes of the multitude. Eighty years after his death, the royal cemetery was violated by the Revolutionists, his coffin was opened, his body was dragged out, and it appeared that the prince whose majestic figure had been so long and loudly extolled was in truth a little man.—Macaulay.

AND behold the vail of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom and the earth did quake and the rocks rent; and the graves were opened and many bodies of the saints which slept arose and came out of the graves after his resurrection and went unto the holy city and appeared unto many.—Matt. xxvii, 49-53.

SUPPOSE that all the historians who treat of England should agree that on the 1st of January, 1600, Queen Elizabeth died; that both before and after her death she was seen by her physicians and the whole court, as is usual with persons of her rank; that her successor was acknowledged and proclaimed by the Parliament; and that after being interred one month [and not merely three days and three nights, according to the Jewish mode of speaking, but actually only thirty-six hours] she again appeared, resumed the throne, and governed England for three years. I must confess that I should be surprised at the concurrence of so many odd circumstances, but should not hav the least inclination to believe so miraculous an event. I should not doubt of her pretended death aud of those other public circumstances that followed it. I should only assert it to hav been pretended and that it neither was nor possibly could be real. . . The knavery and folly of men are such common phenomena that I should rather believe the most extraordinary events to arise from their concurrence than admit of so signal a violation of the laws of nature.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

So soon as men understand that they must not get their geology from the Bible, but from their knowledge of the earth, then geology as a science was suddenly found making a marvelous progress. So soon as men understood that they were not to look to the Bible for their knowledge concerning the science of life, then biology began to develop. So astronomy developed with marvelous rapidity. So soon as men cut loose from their dependence upon the Bible for their geology, astronomy, biology, and the other sciences, then these sciences began to grow and progress. It will be the same, depend upon it, with respect to the science of morality.—Felix Adler.

DEATH has two aspects; dreary and sorrowful to those of prosperous, mild and almost genial to those of adverse, fortune. Her countenance is old to the young and youthful to the aged; to the former, her voice is importunate, her gait terrific; the latter she approaches like a bedside friend and calls in a whisper that invites to rest.—W. S. Landor.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE IRISH QUESTION.

Notes and Clippings.

SAM JONES and Sam Small object to dancing. Sam Jones chews tobacco, and Sam Small, it is said, smokes cigarets.

THE Boston Athenæum will hereafter open its library for visitors on Sunday afternoon, though no books will be given out on that day.

THE Rev. M. D. Shutter, Baptist, of Minneapolis, has resigned from his pastorate, giving as a reason his inability to longer believe in the faith of the Baptists, or to sympathize with them.

AT Homer Village, a few miles southeast of Ottawa, Can., Clarence J. Sears, over eighty years of age, recently had some trouble with his wife upon the subject of religion. To settle the question he procured a hand-saw and slashed her so fearfully that she died in a couple of hours.

THE New Orleans Picayune suggests: "One good Lord's day at the Exposition would be profitable. Let it be on Sunday, and let all members of all religious denominations go there to worship in a millennium union service, and pay their way in at the gate in lieu of putting a nickel in the contribution box."

THE Churchman is still unhappy over the religious situation at Harvard, as explained by President Eliot. It intimates rather broadly that Christians who send their sons to Harvard may expect judgments instead of blessings. And in the blackest of italics it calls this venerable university a school of irreligion. It is quite evident that the ministers and the church papers intend to make it very lively for the reforming president of Harvard.

WE get this from Dr. Foote's Health Monthly: "It is related that at the burial of the Hon. Elizur Wright, the sun came out just as he was lowered into the grave. It had been storming steadily for a week, but at that moment the black cloud rose suddenly, a golden sunset lit up the sorrowing faces gathered around the bier, and a rainbow appeared in the sky opposit; and then it all darkened again as the earth fell heavily on the casket containing the precious remains."

THE Austrian government has set out to suppress Socialism. The Committee of the Hungarian Diet has given its approval to a bill for the suppression of Socialism. Under the provisions of this measure summary dealings with all Socialists are authorized and severe punishment will be visited upon any person having letters on his person declaring Socialistic tendencies or anyone providing rooms for the meeting of Socialists. Keepers of public houses allowing Socialists to hold sessions on their premises will be deprived of their licenses.

BISHOP SELWYN, who interested himself greatly in the poor, one day, coming on a company of miners, heard them talking in a very animated way, so loudly that he said to them, "My friends, something seems to interest you all very much; I heard your voices quite in the distance—may I inquire what it is?" To which they replied: "You see that copper tea-kettle there? We found it, and we were just saying that the one who could tell the biggest lie should hav it." "Oh!" said the bishop, "I am sorry for that; I hope you will never again tell lies. 'Tis a fearful bad habit, and so unmanly. Why, I never told a tie in my life." Whereupon the four miners shouted in one breath, "Giv the governor the kettle."

IT is reported that the Communists and Socialists of Cincinnati are drilling and practicing rifle-shooting weekly. This is alarming on the face of it, but the fact that there are never more than nineteen men in line on one occasion, and that the object of the organization is mainly to fire at a target and drink beer socially, will allay the fears of those who liv at a distance from Cincinnati.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL VILAS has refused to allow a Sunday delivery in Baltimore. The Tribune comments: "Out of respect to 'the moral sense of the community,' Postmaster-General Vilas declines to giv Baltimore a Sunday morning delivery. A large accumulation of moral sense, not to speak of horse sense and common sense, backed the petition which the business men of the United States addressed to Mr. Vilas, begging him not to array himself against them by crippling the mail service. But Vilas, who is so tender of Baltimore's Sunday morning, showed that he cared nothing at all about the best interests of business men. It is statesmen of the Vilas school that strain at a gnat and swallow a whole caravan of camels."

Two distinguished writers hav just expressed decided opinions concerning Voltaire, and it is interesting to see these opinions in conjunction. Thus Ruskin: "Voltaire.—His work is, in comparison with good literature, what nitric acid is to wine, and sulphureted hydrogen to air. Literary chemists cannot but take account of the sting and stench of him; but he has no place in the library of a thoughtful scholar. Every man of sense knows more of the world than Voltaire can tell him; and what he wishes to express of such knowledge he will say without a snarl." Of course we hav not Voltaire's opinion of Ruskin. Mr. Lowell says of the great Frenchman that he was one "who, if he used ridicule too often for the satisfaction of personal spite, employed it also for sixty years in the service of truth and justice, and to him more than to any other one man we owe it that we can now think and speak as we choose."

THE Saturday Evening Gazette, of Boston, says: "Mr. Joseph Cook has Gratiano's talent for saying an infinit deal of nothing. In common with that other windy, quarrelsome, and nonsensical person, the Rev. Mr. Talmage, he possesses an unfortunate gift for verbosity which he mistakes for both eloquence and argument, and this erroneous estimate leads him into no end of trouble. He has, during the years which he has poured forth unfathomable torrents of words, accomplished nothing more important than talking himself into notoriety. He has worn the public out by his volubility, and the wonder is that he has not worn himself out as well. The only explanation that offers is the indestructibility of wind. The potency of humbug when assisted by invulnerable egotism was never more felicitously exemplified than in the careers of these Tuppers of religious polemics, Messrs. Talmage and Cook. Ridicule, no matter how justly provoked, or how unerring its aim, hurls its shafts at them in vain. Their hides are impervious, and the professors of verbosity continue to pour out words in an endless, wishy-washy flood. Like neighbor Verges, they will be talking."

An Examination of Church History.

BEING LETTERS TO A CATHOLIC.—IX.

Liguori assures his readers that a simple dependence on the Virgin is all that is necessary to secure salvation. No matter what may be the nature of the crime, attend to her particular devotions and all will be well; but if you slight her, woe betide you.

To impress this on his readers he says that in 1610 some people dishonored the vigil of Pentecost by drinking and dancing. The Virgin came in person, set fire to the building, and fifteen hundred were burnt. This is attested by five eye-witnesses.

This proves her power; now for her morals: A notorious robber being urged to repent declared it was too late, but promised to fast every Saturday in honor of Mary. After awhile he was caught, tried, beheaded, and thrown into a ditch. The virgin came with four angels, wrapped the body in a cloth embroidered with gold, took it to the nearest city and told the guard to tell the bishop to bury it in consecrated ground, because he (the robber) was her faithful servant.

Another robber in Normandy had also been beheaded, and his head was heard to say, "Mary, giv me confession." A priest was sent after and confessed the head, which admitted that the only thing its former owner had ever done for the salvation of his soul was to fast one day in the week in honor of the Virgin.

The "Glories of Mary" contain several dogmas of like stories, and the gentleman who records and vouches for them is not only a saint, but a doctor of your church. Dominus vobiscum!

There are many letters written by Mary in heaven, and sent down to her admirers on earth, but the following is, as near as I can find out, the only one she wrote while here on earth. It is directed to the citizens of Messina, and can be seen in their cathedral:

The Virgin Mary, daughter of Joachim, the most humble mother of God, Christ Jesus crucified, of the tribe of Judah, and of the stock of David, to the people of Messina health and the blessing of God, the omnipotent father:

It appears by a public instrument that you, recognizing the way of truth through the preaching of Paul, the elect apostle, hav in your great faith sent to us embassadors and messengers; you confess our son, begotten of God, to be God and Man, and that after his resurrection he ascended to heaven; for which cause we bless you and your city, and will be her perpetual protector.

Jerusalem, in the forty-second year of our son. Indiction first Thursday, June 3d.

This letter was first brought to light in 1629 by the Jesuit Inchofer, one of the accusers of Galileo. An infallible pope, by solemn decree, has guaranteed its genuinness, and authorized copies to be sold to the faithful.

There is hardly any need to refer to the fraud of La Salette. Even your church is ashamed of it, and the good Jesuit fathers no longer point to it with pride, as the late national pilgrimage to that shrine, though numbering 200,000 votaries, resulted in the expulsion of their order from France.

When the Virgin appeared at Lourdes and said, "I am the immaculate conception," people thought it a queer expression, and awaited results; which, when they culminated in a spring flowing one thousand barrels of holy water a day, they were constrained to feel was a useless waste of holy things. But the announcement was an indorsement from on high of the latest dogma, and that, together with the water being shipped to all parts of the world, and entered duty free in every Catholic country, may repay the Jesuits for what they hav lost by being turned out of France. The order has fallen on evil times, for even the house of Loretto refuses to take wings and fly. When the Infidel Piedmontese took that town the house refused to budge. The power of Infidelity had overcome the power of the angels, and the pope negotiated to hav it taken down and carried piecemeal to Rome. But as the Italians took that city in 1870, God was again foiled. I hav lost track of the house; can you furnish me with the sequel?

The veneration for Mary has most certainly grown into an adoration. We can now look back on the past, deplore the darkness of the Middle Ages, pity their condition, even pardon many faults; but I do object to your shielding ourself behind specious arguments and theological terms. Your theologians claim you do not worship the Virgin in the true sense of the term, and hav distinguished it by hyperdalia in contradistinction to the term latria as applied to God. But how many of you Catholics know the difference? How many know that any difference is claimed?

Pio Nono, in his decree, December 8, 1854, says: "Let all the children of the Catholic church most dear to us hear these words, and with a most ardent zeal of piety and love, proceed to worship, invoke, and pray to the most blessed Virgin Mary, mother of God, conceived without original sin." As Pio Nono says worship, they will worship, and will continue to worship, till you can explain satisfactorily to the Irish servant-girl the difference between Hyperdalia and Latria. I am an ordinarily intelligent man, and hav examined as closely as I am able the two systems, and will say that if I were to be the object and had the choice I should choose the position of your Virgin to that of your God.

Subtle distinctions hav some weight with the intelligent, none with the ignorant. The masses are attracted by that which appeals to the senses, and very frequently a picture will sway a multitude when an argument would be powerless. I call your attention to a picture sold openly in the streets of Rome. In his controversy, Mr. Gladstone referred to it. At the top is God the father bestowing his blessing; at his right hand the Virgin Mary; at his left St. Peter; directly beneath him the Holy Ghost, showering rays of light on Pio Nono, who, as the central figure, is seated on the papal throne, dressed in all his insignia, and Europe, Asia, Africa, and America in adoration at his feet.

And your God, Jesus Christ—where was he? Conspicuous by his absence.

With the ordinary private scandals of any religious system I hav nothing to do. Baptists, Methodists, Episcopalians, Catholics, and the rest of the pagan crew hav plenty of them, but an outsider can very reasonably object to any public scandal which is directly traceable to your peculiar methods, and therefore I propose to point out a few.

The first is what are known as Christian lies. Not long ago Colonel Ingersoll was advertised to deliver his lecture, "Which Way?" in a certain New England town, and I went ten miles to hear him. To me, at least, it was two and a half hours of music and poetry, and, from the respectful manner of the audience, and what I heard as I passed out, it was evident that a serious impression had been made. The next morning I had occasion to call at a drug-store, and found a deacon of the Baptist church, surrounded by half a dozen men, speaking of the lecture. I listened, and, to my surprise, heard the deacon say that Mr. Ingersoll had pulled out his watch on the platform and said, "If there be a God I defy him to kill me within three minutes," and after waiting that length of time declared, as he was still alive, it was proof positiv there was no God. I then ventured to join the group, said I had attended the lecture, occupied one of the front seats, had my eyes riveted on the speaker from his entrance to his exit, and did not hear anything of it; that the action and remark would hav been worthy of a blackguard, and Mr. Ingersoll was a gentleman, and asked the deacon for his authority. I was referred to a laundryman down the street. I called on him, stated my business, and was told that his informant was Mr. ——, a salesman in a drygoods store opposit. I crossed the street and interviewed this gentleman. On repeating the story, as given by the deacon, he laughed, and said his words had been garbled; that during the lecture Colonel Ingersoll had pulled out his watch, and at this movement it had flashed across his mind that some one, under similar circumstances, had used the remarks already quoted, and he wondered if the colonel was going to repeat them. Now, here was a Christian vilifying a perfect stranger simply because there was a difference in opinion, although the Infidel was trying to clear the skirts of his God from the crimes his own followers had imputed to him.

The very moment any of you can answer the colonel, you will cease this vituperation, and set to work repairing the rock he has shattered.

But this is a Baptist lie. Well, let me giv you a Catholic lie. It is not a score of years since I accompanied your wife and self to a mission held by the Redemptionists. The subject was, "Infidelity: Its Cause and Cure." I will giv the priest credit for being one of the most eloquent men I ever listened to. I wish I could say as much for his truthfulness. In the course of his remarks the reverend gentleman came to treat of Thomas Paine, and pictured in the most glowing manner all his vices, traced him through the American Revolution, then the French, back to America. He spoke of the "Age of Reason," informed us that his duty as a priest had compelled him to read it, gave us a synopsis of its contents, and his appeal to the congregation never even to look at its cover was equaled only by his picture of the death scene. I could see that Infidel as he lay on his bed deserted by God and man, his pinched, wan face and hungry eyes betokening early dissolution, striving in vain to remember the prayers learned at his mother's knee. As he writhed in agony, almost gasping his last breath, the Virgin was depicted kneeling at her son's feet, imploring him by the love he bore her to save the unhappy man. Around the bed were a score of devils ready to seize the soul as soon as it was freed from the earthly tenement, and Lucifer himself, conscious of his priority of claim, stood by to defend his rights. Jesus, with his heart full of compassion, was about to accede to the Virgin, when the father interposed saying that as Paine had lived without a God, he should die without one. A whole procession of saints and angels joined with the Virgin, but all to no purpose. The decree had passed. Then the devils advanced to seize their victim, and with one despairing shriek Paine, in his eagerness to escape them, fell out of bed and died with his head in his chamber. The imaginary shriek of Paine was answered by several throughout the church, and one lady, only a few pews in front of us, was carried out in a dead faint. Though it was winter, beads of perspiration stood on my forehead, and, if I remember correctly, you were equally impressed. This sermon haunted me for months, and was one of the reasons why I did not read the "Age of Reason" sooner. When I read it I found Mr. Paine did believe in God, was in fact a Unitarian, and gave his reasons for his belief in no less than seven different parts of his work.

Now which was the worse, the Baptist or the Catholic lie? Here was your priest in the very sanctuary of God, under the very shadow of the body and blood of Jesus, telling a wilful, deliberate, and malicious lie. Cui bono?

If it be true that "the consecrated wafer is not only the body of Jesus Christ, it is Jesus Christ upon the cross, Jesus Christ dying for us," then I can see your God, writhing in agony and despair, regret his sacrifice; for the pagans, from whom he came to save you, inscribed in their temples the legend, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum." Those eminent Christians, Messrs. McClintock and Strong, say: "The religion which Paine proposed to substitute for Christianity was the belief in one God as revealed by science, in immortality as the continuance of conscious existence, in the natural equality of man, and in the obligation of justice and mercy to one's neighbor."

But this was under the excitement of a revival. Well, let us look further. Examin the career of Capel, "the wandering prelate of the Vatican." He comes to America with the title of monsignor, secretary or confidant of the pope, and authorized to speak for him. Take his lecture on the Inquisition. What a mess of stuff and lies! In the Dominican church, and in the presence of that Jesus "at the mention of whose name every head in heaven, on earth, and in hell bows," he claims that the church is entirely free from the stain of blood spilt by the Inquisition. Now you and I hav conversed many times on this subject, and, although you would not go as far in denunciation as I, yet I hav heard you say that the church was responsible. Do you think if Capel were visiting you, and this subject were to arise, that he would use his arguments in your parlor? You know he would not. You would consider it an insult to your intelligence, and would so inform him. So then he has less respect for his God than for you. You could answer him; his God could not.

If there be anything you Catholics prate more about than another, it is of the consolations of your religion in the hour of death. Theoretically you may be correct; practically I know you are not. Let me giv you an instance or two.

A relativ of mine, a good Catholic, was called on to mourn the loss of his oldest child, a bright, intelligent lad of eleven years. It had been sudden; the family were in deep despair; the mother particularly was inconsolable. A few days after the funeral, the lady was surprised by a visit from a clergyman who explained his presence by saying though he had not the pleasure of her personal acquaintance, he knew her husband, had been a college mate, and was intimate with his family. Hearing of the loss, he had taken the liberty to call, offer his condolence, etc. As he warmed to his subject the bereaved mother interrupted him and, motherlike, said: "Why did God take away my darling? Death, you say, is the punishment of sin, and surely my innocent boy was blameless. If sin was committed, I was the one, not he. Why did not God take me away and leave him?" etc., etc. "My dear madam," answered the reverend consoler, "the ways of God are mysterious. Humble yourself in his presence, for this may be a blessing in disguise. Possibly, looking into the future, he saw your boy, the pride of your heart, having grown to man's estate, enter a liquor saloon, become intoxicated, engage in a brawl, and take the life of a fellow-being. Knowing you to be a model wife and mother, and a good daughter of our holy church, he has taken your boy away thus early in order to save you from a greater pang." The lady quietly rang the bell and told the servant that the reverend gentleman wished his hat and cane. Now, I know this to be a fact; I had it from the lips of my relativ. So where are your consolations? Tell a bereaved mother that her son was taken from her to prevent his being a murderer!

But you may say this is an isolated case. Let me giv you another. All the actors are dead, so I will use names. I speak of John Manning's. You knew him as well as I, and though you may not be aware of every detail, yet you know enough about it to check me if I state a falsehood.

I had received a letter from John, inviting me to the marriage of his daughter, to take place in six weeks. Within a month I was shocked to read in the Herald the announcement of her sudden death. I packed my valise, hurried to your city, and arrived at John's house just at dusk. He answered my ring at the bell, and his cold hand, as it lay in mine, spoke more eloquently than words. I did not attempt any consolation. I am glad now that I did not. He ushered me into the parlor, where lay the corpse, dressed in her bridal robes, hands folded over her breast, and a tiny forget-me-not, the last gift of her lover, held between her fingers. As we stood over the coffin, poor John's eyes riveted on the face he loved so well, a ring came and in entered a priest. Bowing to all, he glanced around, quickly passed to a table, and taking from it two candles, lit and placed them among the others at the head of the corpse and rearranged those at its feet. It was done with the self-possession of a man who knew what he was doing. He then came over to John's side and took his hand, but before he could speak my poor friend burst out into an apostrophe which chilled me to the very marrow. His appeal to her for just one word, one look of recognition, I shall never forget. But no answer came. Then, turning to the priest, he said, "Father, where is Lou? Where is my pet?"

Now was the opportunity I had so long sought. Here was one who claimed to be commissioned to speak. From his actions with the candles, he was acquainted with every minutia, every detail—he knew everything. I looked up in his face, and a smile covered it as he answered, "My dear sir, let us hope——" He proceeded no further. John had dashed his hand aside, and if ever I saw despair pictured on a human countenance I saw it then. John reeled to a sofa; the scene was ended. I remained for the funaral, and never desire to duplicate my experience. And poor John—what of him? For over forty years he had been a good and faithful son of the church; had fasted and feasted at her command; was a regular communicant; and his check-book could show that he had not been called on in vain.

One by one, he had seen his children, then their mother, laid in their graves, and now, when called on to part with his last, all the consolation he could obtain was, "Let us hope." Of what consequence were "the glad tidings of great joy" to him? He had pinned all to faith and discarded reason, and now, as you know well, reason had almost discarded him.

If this be all the consolation that the religion founded by Jesus can giv, after being established eighteen hundred years, I'll hav none of it. It has cost millions of lives and countless treasure, and when the supreme moment arrives the priestly hypocrit, who is too lazy to do an honest day's labor, and has been fattening on your credulity, quietly folds his hands over his well-filled paunch, raises his sanctimonious eyes toward your imaginary heaven, and with a self-satisfied smile simply says, "Let us hope."

I hav already made this letter too long, but will try to finish all I hav to say in my next.

Yours truly, McArthur.

Inhumanity.

Bobbie Burns has said that "man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn." Nothing could be truer than this saying of "nature's sweetest bard." The law of heredity has incorporated into manhood some of the elements of the brute as well as those of humanity. Nothing could better serve to prove man's evolution from the lower animals than the fact that he has brought up with him some of their characteristics. We hav all seen exhibited in man the elements of a coyote, hyena, and a snake. Artful cunning, cowardly treachery, deceitful hypocrisy, and poisonous venom each finds a habitation in the mind of man. Brute force is argument, and might is often made the criterion of right. Vices hav been characterized as virtues, and the tenderest mercies were but the basest cruelties. The very thought of all the vice and villainies of man is enough to make the impressible cheek of modesty crimson with shame. All the great and good of earth who dared to think and speak their thought were given to the sword and stake, save those alone who could elude the vulture's eye or kneel in abjuration of their life's long thought. Thousands hav been the victims of mistaken crimes, but for every victim nature bleeds and justice weeps. On every hand we hear the cries of deep distress, of sunken hopes, of blasted aims. The fluctuating sea of life has drunk the hosts of fell despair, and thousands now are sleeping on beneath its restless waves. These cries are not in vain. All social wrongs must be retrenched. Each sad and wounded heart inhuman monsters broke must sure be healed. Through social wrongs the mind of man must reach and penetrate the festered mass. Corrupt and injudicious laws must be repealed, all useless sinecures must die. The shallow, brainless, wandering waifs who never knew the force of love, the soothing balm of joyous homes; the denizens of countless slums, examples of the force of want—all indicate a growing need, a panacea unsupplied. Distressing cries surmount the air. From foreign lands resound the wails of much-abused and starving souls. A million hosts, unknown to freedom but to serfdom born, must toil and weep and sweat to clothe and feed in luxury and ease the chronic paupers and royal loafers of imperial thrones. In the brazen face of plenteous wealth thousands die of growing want. On every hand we hear the cries of Labor seeking for his rights. What does it mean? It means that gilded capital must step down and out from power that the knight of labor dispossessed may rule instead. It means that equal rights, equal liberties, and equal opportunities must be extended to all, and that upon the domed firmament above, inlaid with suns and wrapped in the fraternal harmony of the stars, we must inscribe these three words: Liberty, Fraternity, Equality, the grandest words that ever dropped from human lips. The wrongs and cruelties of earth are great; a helping hand must come. In curing ills we need no saints, much less a sacred shrine. The power lies with man, and he alone, when rightly led, can render aid. The grandest hearts are those who grasp the diverse needs, the various wants, of all mankind. Exhaustless charities their portals fill. The hopes and aims of each and all should be to so condition man that all remediable ills should cease. When man shall rise above the brute, assert his higher powers and aims, and banish all ignoble traits, Utopia will gleam. G. F. Rinehart.

A Cosmopolitan Republic.

The idea of a grand central universal government is not a despicable one. The reasons it has as yet failed of realization are obvious.

Napoleon had the idea, and it nerved him in his greatest military efforts. Many others, and probably all of royal blood, hav slightly dreamed of a universal crown. But all these golden dreams hav been doomed to infamous annihilation. Why?

The reason evidently lies in the nature of the governments which those royal aspirants hav meant to establish.

It is natural and right for men to be self-interested. But, since it is as proper and just as natural to a common man as to one of royal ancestry, self-interest has been circumscribed by tolerably definit limits. Besides, there hav been and are too many princes entertaining the same ambition. Their interests hav been antagonistic; and, sustained by their less ambitious, but nevertheless, though more unconsciously, self-interested adherents, they hav defeated each other's schemes.

It is evident that the greatest amount of poverty, and much of the sufferings, of people in monarchies are the result of the extravagance and immorality of their so-called merciful paternal sovereigns gratia Dei. What insanity for starving nations to expend billions of dollars upon their houses of worthless princes and princesses, when their public and private safety can be secured by a republican government a thousand times better and not half so expensiv!

The world is gradually, and more rapidly than generally supposed, being instructed in republican principles. Democracy is said to be the one progressiv principle; which claim, if true, must enable us to believe that it will soon fill the earth like Nebuchadnezzar's stone.

The nation doing most for the enlightenment of the world upon the advantages of republican institutions is doubtless the United States. It is the most extensiv, and is composed of people from nearly all other nations, who, still connected by ties of consanguinity with their mother countries, are, consciously or unconsciously, spreading the doctrin of human rights, and a knowledge of the advantages of the government under which they liv. This leads us to infer, and the frequent efforts in different parts of the world to shake off the chains of despotism prove, the fact.

The president of the United States is paid for his services not one-twentieth proportionately of what the king of the Scandinavian peninsula, for instance, is paid. The president really does something, and works hard for the people he serves, while what the king usually does with all his might, and by the assistance of his sons, daughters, attendants, and ministers, all paid by the people, is to oppress his employers and waste his wages in disgraceful dissipation. Can people much longer see this and not see through it?

If all the monarchs of the world, like the king of the Sandwich Islands, had sense enough to see the unprofitableness of their service, and would enter into negotiations with the United States, their subjects, I think, would immediately say Amen to the transaction. A voluntary universal sale of crowns would be the greatest benevolent act of which the monarchs are capable. How changed would soon become the aspect of the earth! What a grand thing would be a cosmical republic! States in every respect coördinate! All peoples, though living in different countries, equally heirs of all the blessings of the whole earth! No protectiv tariffs to destroy the equality of rights; no wars to murder body and soul and impoverish humanity; no state church to encroach upon the liberties of men! A single, practical, cosmical congress representing all nations, and in which all nations would hav a never-dying interest! A single, amicable, cosmical brotherhood! How sublime! The thought ought to recommend itself to all thinking people as one of the grandest of our age.

And when sometime you can engage
In mental grasp
The thought which animates the age,
Then you're a sage.

Samuel Garborg.

Sam Jones.

Chicago is just now being overhauled by the Georgia revivalist, a man who blends superstition and common sense in equal proportions more nearly, perhaps, than any living man.

There is scarcely a Freethinker who cannot indorse his mental independence—that rare thing among Christians. Take this as a sample:

You want courage, brother; courage that will stand in its tracks and die there. I hav had this old world play its intimidating tricks on me. I hav had dynamite on my premises, and if you don't shut your mouth about some things we will put it in your dwelling and blow your whole family into eternity, and I hav walked out on the streets and said: "I will never hush my mouth; I will denounce you as infernal scoundrels, violating the law of my state;" and, said I: "Put your dynamite under my home and blow us up. You will giv us a good start, and I had just as soon go to heaven by the dynamite route as any other God can make" [laughter and applause]. I never could be bought, I never could be scared; I never intend to swerve a hair's breath from what I see is right until this old world shall hush my mouth forever; and you could take me and dip me and drown me in ten fathoms of water in this lake, with a rock around my neck, and every babbling wave will sing it out on you, "You hav drowned a man who had the courage to say what he believed" [great applause].

I want to commend the trait, which even Christians applaud to the echo if it is exhibited in defense of Christianity. I am liberal enough to admire this trait of mental independence even in a Christian. But does a Christian admire and commend the same fine quality in an Infidel? No. I think the Rev. Sam Jones has a sort of Christian contempt for it when it leads to, and results in, a complete rejection of Christ and Christianity as divine.

In the presence of an audience of six thousand people in Chicago Sam Jones (he calls himself Sam) said about Infidelity:

I said once before that there is but one soil in the universe of God that Infidelity will grow in, and that is the soil that is littered with the unfaithful lives of professing Christians. No compliment to Christianity, or Infidelity either, to say that, but that's the truth as certain as I am standing here to-night.

Amazing ignorance! Yet on just such misrepresentations the clergy, and especially revivalists, are feeding their sheep. The man shows that he does not understand the first principle of Infidelity. Evidently the reverend Sam never suspected that the principle for which he was willing to be dropped into Lake Michigan is exactly what stiffens the spine of every Infidel in the land. Though every Christian on earth were a paragon of purity, that fact would not make his Christianity one whit more logical or true. When will Christians comprehend the issue between Freethought and Christianity?

How General Washington Swore.

When General Washington became president he was urged to hold levees. After resisting the importunities for three weeks he yielded, and Colonel Humphries was charged with the arrangement of ceremonies. When the hour arrived, the pompous colonel conducted him into the reception room, and with a loud voice called out, "The President of the United States." The president was so much disconcerted that he did not recover from the shock during the whole evening. After the company had retired he said to Humphries: "Well, you hav taken me in once, but by God you shall never take me in a second time." And every afterward he had the company introduced as they entered the room, where he stood to receive them. The levees were preserved in all their vigor at short intervals under President Adams, accompanied by sumptuous entertainments. But Jefferson discontinued them. He had but two days for public reception, the 4th of July and 1st of January.

This is taken from Rayner's "Life of Jefferson," 1832. Theodore Parker, in a lecture on Washington, once said: "It is refreshing to know that this great and good man did sometimes swear." Burr.

State Socialism in Russia—An Object Lesson.

The Russian government controls and operates the post-offices and telegraphs, the canals and the railroads, i.e., the whole system of communications and transportations, with result of a deficit for the twelve years past of $20,000,000 per annum. It also controls and operates most of the banks and the mines, hence not only coin and currency, but bullion also. It derives from excises a revenue of $149,000,000, and from customs $50,000,000; from direct taxes, $63,000,000. It pays for the management of its finances $57,000,000; for its army and navy, $123,000,000; imperial household, $5,000,000. The interest this year on its national debt is $106,000,000. Total income estimated at $394,000,000, and expenditures at $407,000,000. But if so, the deficit will be little over half what it has averaged for ten years past, namely, $22,000,000. Let America follow in these illustrious footsteps. The figures are Bradstreet's.

The Liberal Club.

A "chapel send-off" kept the regular reporter from the 403d meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. The "send-off" was given to Amrita Lal Roy, a Hindoo of high caste, who has sojourned in this country three years, and confesses that the months spent in THE TRUTH SEEKER office are the happiest of all the thirty-six. The "send-off" is elsewhere described by the Man With the Badge-Pin. It should hav been a sad affair, but was, the writer is privately informed, a sadly jovial one.

A detachment of the Salvation Army followed J. E. Remsburg up Third avenue to Fifteenth street, and fears were entertained that somehow they had got wind of his presence and contemplated storming the German Masonic Temple. But the cloud passed on and over, and Mr. Remsburg reached the hall in safety. On this occasion Mr. Remsburg did not speak by the card, for Acting-president Wakeman had forgotten to put him on. However, he was not undone, but made a good speech instead.

When Acting-president Wakeman had called the attention of the audience to the brilliant character of the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER (which paper was a standing proof of the truth of the saying that the last was the best), spoken encouragingly of the progress Jonah was making on his journey, and informed the people present that Your Humble Servant (meaning the acting-president) was going to Albany to enlighten the legislativ Committee of Ways and Means as to the advisability of revising our state tax laws, and especially of the necessity of taxing the churches, he introduced Mr. Remsburg as our evangelist John.

This lecture on Sabbath-Breaking, as Mr. Remsburg delivers it, grows upon one who hears it often. The writer has listened to it twice in New York, once in Jersey City, once in Albany, once in Cleveland, has read it before and since it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has carefully conned it since it appeared in pamphlet form. He feels, therefore, qualified to report upon it, which he does to the effect that it is good, and would be a healthy lecture for the New York Sabbath Committee to hear. Just now it is particularly appropriate in this city, when the museum trustees are considering the petition for the opening of these institutions on Sunday, and the press is vigorously urging them to do so. Mr. Remsburg spoke very spiritedly, and the audience, which reached clear back to the door, responded with applause. A local hit at Talmage—the lecturer pleading for Sunday rights of the "clown in the tent as well as the clown in the Tabernacle"—endangered the floor, and brought the German janitor out of his retreat in the basement. The points made by the lecturer are to be found in the pamphlet, and though the reader will miss the stirring eloquence of the orator, the matter is there, and that, after all, is the best part of a speech.

Mr. Remsburg closed about nine o'clock, and Acting-president Wakeman rose up to clinch with his ponderous logic the points of the spikes the lecturer had driven into the Sabbatarian coffin. He said that the argument in THE TRUTH SEEKER for opening the museums on Sundays was invincible in its logic and statesmanship. This would hav made Mr. Putnam feel glad if he had been there, but he had gone up to see Colonel Ingersoll, and missed this praise from Sir Hubert. The Liberals of New York, said Acting-president Wakeman, must carry this question of Sunday opening of the museums into politics if the trustees do not grant the petition. The museums are chiefly supported by the general public, and at the next election the officers who compose the Board of Estimate and Apportionment—the mayor, controller, president of the Board of Aldermen, and president of the Board of Assessment and Taxation—should be given to understand that they must not vote away the people's money to the museums unless they are open on Sundays, so that the people can get the benefit of them. The acting-president then quoted from St. Paul to the effect that no man goeth to war at his own charges, and appointed Mr. Deane and the secretary a committee of two to visit the audience and receive their favors. The lady secretary borrowed a hat, and when she returned it informed the owner that $14.37 had been deposited in it and Mr. Deane's head-covering.

The acting-president then announced that the floor was open. Dr. Weeks said that he would like to hav some Christian come forward to defend the Sabbath, and afterward be annihilated by the lecturer. In accordance with this suggestion a cordial invitation was extended to any Christian in the hall. None being forthcoming, Dr. Eccles was called upon as a substitute. He agreed with the trend of the lecture, but could criticise details. He did not see what Biblical authority the lecturer had for the statement that folks must keep the seventh day (Saturday). He thought the command was a general one to keep one day in seven, and it did not matter which day. He also thought the lecturer erred in saying nature knew no rest-day. Nature, he said, was full of rhythm. In its early condition the earth was like a drunken man, swaying back and forth, and progressing unsteadily and by jerks. Nature was also like a hired man, resting on rainy days. Plants, he said, rest in cloudy weather, and the average is one day in seven. In winter, nature takes a long sleep. Mr. Eccles concluded by saying that if the Liberals would not call the ministers damned liars, damned hypocrits, damned rogues, but should allow that they were honest men, as he knew them to be, more progress would be made in obtaining the ends sought. From their standpoint, the ministers were logical, and must be coaxed instead of driven. Mr. Eccles and Robert Blissert are the only Christian orators of the club, and the only ones who habitually use profane language on the platform.

Dr. Weeks agreed with what Mr. Eccles had said more nearly than with any other speech he ever heard him make. He also agreed with the lecturer. Dr. Weeks favored two rest-days in the week, or even three, rather than none. He was also in favor of the eight-hour law. He thought the clergy were better men than he would be in their place. This allusion to a Brooklyn pulpiteer's celebrated letter brought out much laughter from those whose memories were long enough to enable them to catch the point, and it gradually dawned upon the others. All through Dr. Weeks's ten minutes occasional snorts of mirth marked the dawning of the joke upon the audience. Dr. Weeks said that preachers could not be expected to throw away their bread and butter. They are the lawyers of the corporations called churches, and they must earn their fees by defending the corporations.

Calls for Mr. King were loud and continual. He had left the "chapel send-off," and had taken a modest seat near the door of the hall. In response to a direct appeal from the acting-president, he stated that he had nothing to say. Mr. Wakeman remarked that this was a wonder, and the secretary made a note of the fact.

No other champion of the clergy entering the lists, Mr. Remsburg rose to put the dagger of mercy (as the knights of old called the weapon with which they dispatched their opponents after disabling them) to the throat of Mr. Eccles. He thanked Mr. Eccles for disagreeing with him, but he would remind him that the Bible did command the seventh-day observance. God rested on the seventh day from the beginning and hallowed it. The seventh day is implied, and it is admitted by all Christians that the seventh day was the day given to the Jews. They rest on that day. It would be absurd to claim that they hav lost a day. This was Friday, not Saturday. It is absurd to suppose that Sunday is the seventh day. There is no passage in the Bible commanding the people to keep one day in seven. The command is to observe the seventh day. The lecturer quoted from Archbishop Whately: "There is no injunction to sanctify one day in seven throughout the whole of the Old Testament. We never hear of keeping holy some one day in every seven, but the seventh day, the day on which 'God rested from his labors.'" Mr. Remsburg said his work was not against Christians as individuals, but against priestcraft. "I may be severe," he said, "but I never expect to win the clergy. Their living depends upon keeping up the Sabbath. That gone, they are gone. In the words of Parker Pillsbury, 'Break this one yoke, and priestly domination is no more. With their holy day must go their holy office, and with it their holy and reverend selves.' I might kiss them all, but I could not win them." Mr. Remsburg wished to congratulate the Liberals of New York upon the practical work done in connection with the museums. "Every year," he said, "we meet in convention and pass resolutions, stirring, just, and grand; but without work these resolutions are useless. Work, practical work, just such as you hav been doing here in this city, and are going to do at Albany before the legislature, is what is demanded. Keep on in this work and you will triumph."

The audience then went home some half hour earlier than usual, owing to the absence of enthusiastic Christians.

Roy.

There was a notable gathering in the composing-room of THE TRUTH SEEKER on the evening of Friday, the 12th. Amrita Lal Roy, a young Hindoo, who has been employed here for a year or more, left for India Saturday morning. Friday night's festivities were arranged by his fellow-employees to giv him what is technically known as a "chapel send-off." The word chapel here has no religious significance, but is the name of the organization of printers in the establishment. There were present at the gathering, besides the members of the chapel, Mr. C. P. Somerby, James Redpath, Colonel Hinton, Edward King, Henry J. Thomas, J. N. Bogert, and Messrs. Archibald, Somoff, and Harris.

At about seven o'clock coffee and other things were served upon the imposing-stones, which had been scrubbed to unusual whiteness. Mr. Stevens, father of the chapel, was chosen president, and after mentioning to the assemblage that this was a little send-off that the boys had prepared for Roy, he invited everybody to lay aside their natural reserve and participate in the spread which they saw before them. The first toast, "Our Guest," was responded to by James Redpath, of the North American Review. Mr. King, perhaps the best known of all the speakers at workingmen's meetings, did the presentation act, the gift being a valuable pen, donated by Mr. Bogert and the heads of the various departments of this office, and Mr. Roy accepted the gift with such words as the occasion seemed to require. Colonel Hinton, of the New York Star, spoke to the toast, "The Press." He called attention to the remarkable fact that in an office dedicated to Freethought and the destruction of superstition we had met to speed a parting guest back to the land which, so far as we knew, was the very cradle of all superstitions. Further, it was significant that while in this gathering were representativs of many nationalities, English, Irish, German, Russian, and Indian, and representativs of divers views on all subjects, yet Freethought was over and around all.

Mr. King talked of "Organized Labor;" Mr. Archibald told about the "C. L. U." (Central Labor Union), and wished Mr. Roy a godspeed in Irish; Mr. Somoff, a Russian, paid his respects the "United States," and Mr. Bogert conveyed the regrets of John Swinton at his inability to be present. Mr. Roy spoke again of the great profit to himself of his stay in THE TRUTH SEEKER office. The intelligence and kindness of his fellow-workmen had been to him valuable teachers, and above all he had learned that the cause of labor and the cause of Freethought are identical. Being a high caste Brahman, and therefore supposed to be descended from the Supreme Brahma, he had clung for a long time to the traditions of his ancestors, despite the endeavors of the missionaries to convert him. But what the missionaries failed in, Freethought and the workingman's cause in America had accomplished. He now dropped for good the sacred thread which connected him with all gods, and merged himself with the great family of mankind, who embodied all the godliness of which we hav any knowledge.

The foreman of the office was called on, and proposed three cheers for Amrita, in which everybody joined. That terminated the regular program, and the visitors shook hands with the guest and departed. The printers then had the floor, and the real, bona fide proceedings began, and the official farewells were said in the traditional style. The departure of the mild Hindoo was more after the nature of an escape than a "send-off," but he finally got away.

The boys lingered a little while around the stone, developing considerable vocal talent, and setting the office in order for the next day. Beyond anything that was expressed in words, the loss of Mr. Roy is felt in THE TRUTH SEEKER office; for, somehow or other, the little chap, in spite of his dusky face, had worked himself into the regard of all who associated with him.

A testimonial is to be engrossed upon parchment and signed by all those who attended the gathering, and then forwarded to Roy in heathen lands.

Canadian Notes.

The epidemic of strikes and labor troubles which has prevailed so largely in the States of late has at last reached Canada, and the scenes enacted in New York last week during the street railway strike hav been repeated here in Toronto for the last three days. Some three hundred men are out, not of their own accord, but on account of the arbitrary action of the managers of the Toronto Street Railway Company.

The men hav been working for years sixteen hours a day, at from eight to nine dollars per week, with no hope of anything better, and always with the knowledge that they might at any time be discharged without a moment's notice. They hav, in fact, been in a condition of slavery far worse than that of the southern slaves before the war, and the present trouble arises from an attempt of a number of them to form a union for the purpose of improving their condition.

They held a meeting in the Arcade building on Tuesday night at 12 o'clock. The superintendent of the road was on hand and took the names of all who entered, and the next morning at 6 o'clock the whole lot were summarily dismissed. By noon the same day nearly the whole force of the road had joined them, and by five in the afternoon there was not a car running in the city. If there is not much originality among Canadians, they certainly hav the bump of imitation pretty well developed, for the mob hav carried out to the letter the program of the New York strikers, by derailing cars, dumping coal carts, etc. The men hav the public sympathy strongly in their favor, and as they are supported by the Knights of Labor, they will no doubt come out right side up. They hav made no demand, either for shorter hours or more pay, but are shut out simply for exercising the right which all men claim, of organization for self-protection.

The excitement over the affair has been increasing, and the crowd growing larger and having things pretty much their own way until this morning, when the police, foot and horse, charged the mob and clubbed some of them most unmercifully. The result for to-day is a number of broken heads, and two or three of the police sent to the hospital hors de combat. At the present writing it is hard to say how the matter will end, but if a gigantic and a grinding monopoly are taught a lesson, some good will be accomplished.

On Monday evening of this week, in the Temperance Hall, was held one of the liveliest public meetings which ever took place in Toronto. It was a meeting called by the ultra loyal and Orange portion of the community, for the purpose of giving expression to their sympathy with the struggling loyalists in Ireland. And such a meeting! The hall has a seating capacity of one thousand, but there was not less than double that number crowded into it on that night. A number of the Home Rule and Land Leaguers managed to gain admission early in the evening, and although outnumbered by ten to one, they contrived to make things interesting. At 8 o'clock the hall was crowded to the doors, and the fun began. Among the speakers present were Prof. Goldwin Smith, Professor Clark, the Rev. Dr. Wild, Rev. Dr. Potts, and others.

The first two named gentlemen, in eloquent speeches, worked up the race prejudices of the audience, and the two reverends, by wilful misrepresentation and abuse of the home rulers and Roman Catholics generally, fanned the fires of religious bigotry and sectarian hate into a white heat, and had it not been for the strong police force present there certainly would hav been blood spilt.

Our old friend, Jimuel Briggs, was early into the fray. He opened the ball by attempting to move an amendment to the first resolution. He fought his way to the platform, and stood there pale and trembling with excitement, vainly trying to be heard, while the crowd stood up on the benches and yelled like demons—cries of "Put him out," "Giv him a show," "To hell with him," etc. His life was saved by his being jammed into a seat at the back of the stage, and incontinently sat upon.

Dr. Wild said he would like to meet these home-rule people face to face, when an excited individual in the center of the hall yelled, "You're a damn liar! You hav been invited to their meetings, and you won't attend." Tremendous excitement and fight near the door; two thousand people all trying to be heard at once, and the reverend doctor doing a Talmagian pantomime. After the pandemonium had subsided, and the unfortunate individual (or his remains) had been thrown out, the doctor proceeded. "He would be a colonel in any movement to assist the brethren in Ireland." Dr. Potts said that he would be a captain in the same regiment, and the whole Orange force present wanted to enlist on the spot as privates. Great applause; more interruption. Barney Lynch, a prominent member of the Land League, tried to speak, but was howled down. Cries of "Go on, old man; you've the stuff." Dr. Potts, continuing, said: "I'll touch the ears of the handful of Fenians who hav found their way here to-night. The Fenians of Toronto would do just what the Fenians did in Phœnix Park if they could." Pointing his finger at Mr. Lynch, he exclaimed: "What is that I see down there? What right has that thing to be here?" The bold Barney sprang to his feet, struck an attitude à la John L. Sullivan, and dared the whole house to put him out, but the colonel, the captain, and the whole regiment were unequal to the task, and Barney remained.

The reverend doctor finished his remarks by telling the audience that the Land League were bringing a murderer to Toronto to lecture on St. Patrick's day. This statement seems to hav been a deliberate falsehood. It has been found upon inquiry that the Irish societies will hold no meetings, and as far as known no one is coming to lecture on that day. But it served the reverend gentleman's purpose, and helped to perpetuate the sectarian warfare upon which he and his kind are fattening.

Several others spoke in a similar strain, and the disgraceful affair ended by the audience singing "God Save the Queen."

"How these Christians love one another."

The foregoing account may perhaps giv the friends in the States an idea of how the ministers of the "gospel of peace" are working in Canada, and at the same time explain how it is that in a city like Toronto, where there is so much religious fanaticism, Secular lecturers can come and go without being interfered with. Roman Catholics and Protestants find their whole time occupied in fighting each other, and so we hav comparativ peace.

A Practical Reason for Prayers.

At the close of a novel called "After His Kind" there is this conversation between child and parent: "And oh, papa, but Judy is naughty. She refuses to say her prayers. Only think!" "I thought Judy was more obliging; you must hav been very tiresome." "No, indeed, papa! We only advised her to get down on her knees and say her prayers—so we could climb on her back."

News and Notes.

On Sunday, March 7th, I lectured before the Troy Secular Union. This Union is now doing good work. New members are being added from week to week, and its influence upon the community is becoming extended. On Sunday Mr. Remsburg lectured under the auspices of the Union in the Opera House. In spite of the exceeding cold weather, there was a large audience present. The effort was a great success, and Mr. Remsburg by his able address has given a fresh impulse to our friends at Troy. I found them full of enthusiasm and ready to put their shoulder to the wheel when necessary. Heaven helps those who help themselvs, and I believe that the best of fruit awaits the courage and persistency of this Union.

On Sunday evening I lectured at Albany on "The Taxation of Church Property." A good report of this was published in the city papers, and it thus received an extensiv hearing. Ever since the Convention there has been a lively battle at Albany. The clergymen hav evidently been aroused, and hav poured into our camp all the hot shot they had to spare, and supposed that they were utterly demolishing our fortifications. But the well-directed fire of President McCabe, Mr. A. Schell, Mr. McDonough, and others has shown our adversaries that our ammunition is inexhaustible, and although we hav not hell-fire to make a heat with, yet our hot shot is just as good as theirs. Indeed, they hav been driven to a discreet silence, and hav concluded that so far as a defense of orthodoxy is concerned "silence is golden." President McCabe has kept our forces in effectiv service. He has himself delivered several lectures, which hav had good reports in the Albany Express, and thus the whole community has been kept in agitation and thought in regard to our important enterprises.

A comprehensiv bill for the taxation of church property and other exempt property is now in the legislature, and this will be vigorously pushed. On Tuesday last Mr. Wakeman delivered an argument in favor of the bill before the committee. Many members of the legislature hav expressed opinions in favor of the bill. Of course we know that politicians hav a godly fear of the "religious racket," and we can hardly expect from many of them an independent vote. Yet this bill is so essentially right and so in accordance with American ideas of government that as time rolls on and thought progresses it must receive a vast popular support, and the politicians will then embark with flying colors upon this "stream of tendency." Meanwhile we, the pioneers, must keep hard at work and bear the brunt of the battle. Those who come in at the eleventh hour may receive as much and perhaps more gold than we, but they won't hav the comfort of knowing that they hav really done something for the progress of humanity. The progress of humanity serves them, but they giv nothing in return. Life is hardly worth living on such conditions. The worth of life abides in the deeds that are done for the universal welfare.

The petition for the opening of the museums on Sunday has been presented with quite a large indorsement from the New York press, as will be seen elsewhere. The action of the Union has compelled the attention of the directors of the museums to this question, and they must now meet it with frank and honorable argument. As the New York World says: "Nine-tenths of the people of New York city desire Sunday opening, and in the end it must be granted."

The work in the East so far has progressed to satisfactory and practical issues, and the organized Freethought of the country has been felt as never before. We do not expect to win immediate success, but the ear of the public has been gained; the newspapers of the country show a tenfold interest in our movement. They publish our lectures. They indorse much of our work and express the drift of American opinion, that, with increasing earnestness, is in favor of Liberty and Justice for which we stand.

And now I expect to turn my attention to the West and, two thousand miles away, to form the line of battle for another onset. The secretary ought to hav a pair of seven-leagued boots in order to do all the work that is required of him. As it is he must content himself with the lightning express and cover all the points that he can. After Pittsburgh, where I lecture on Sunday, the 14th, I shall be at Alliance, March 16th; at Painesville, March 17th; at Ridge Farm, Ill., March 19th; at Chicago, March 21st; at Rochelle, March 22d and 23d; at Rockford, March 24th; at Allumna, Iowa, March 25th; at Leon, March 26th; at Creston, March 27th; at Omaha, March 28th; at Creighton, Fremont, Plum Creek, Leonard, Lincoln, Stanton, North Platte, and other places in Nebraska and Wyoming the two following weeks; at Ogden City, April 18th; at Salt Lake City, April 25th and May 2d.

The following are the places I shall visit in Utah: Wanship, Peoa, Park City, Kamas, Heber, Coalsville, Morgan, Unitah, Logan, Collingston, Deweyville, Slaterville, Hooper, Kaysville, Farmington, Sessions, Murray, Stockton, Lehi, Provo, Springville, Payson, Goshen, Nephi, Juab, Wales, Ephraim, Fillmore; and also Lost River, Idaho, and places in Montana, etc. It will be seen that the secretary has considerably lively traveling to do both day and night, on foot and horseback, as well as by car and stage, and all sorts of occidental conveyances. He does not expect to be sustained by any miracle, nor will the birds of heaven bring him anything to eat, nor will he find honey in the carcass of a lion, nor will he sojourn in the belly of a whale for three days and nights, even to save hotel fare, which is a great item in these non-scriptural days; neither does he expect to walk in a fiery furnace, and he certainly will not go to grass like Nebuchadnezzar. He expects to meet with royal friends who will enable him to bear many a hardship, who will do their best to giv him welcome, cheer, and victory. It is to be hoped that while a small minority is thus waging the battle against a huge and superstitious majority all the friends of progress in every place will giv what they can, for humanity must take the place of deity, and kindness and fellowship the place of miracle, and, as we hav not the "grace of God," it is to be hoped that we shall hav the aid of inspiring comradeship. We shall giv reports of our progress from place to place, and it is our desire that this extended tour among distant friends may make the union of all Liberals more fervent and powerful and productiv of a better social and political life.

Relativ to lecture engagements correspondents may address me at the places named (providing their letters are sure of reaching the towns by the dates given). Letters on Union business should be sent as usual to New York. During April letters sent in care of William Reynolds, Wanship, Utah, will reach me earliest.

The Museums.

From the New York World.

There appears to be a union of church and state involved in the present conditions of the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Museum of Natural History. The city owns the grounds on which the buildings stand, and the people are taxed to pay for their erection. An appropriation of some magnitude has recently been made for needed additions. In so far the museums are state institutions and the people hav a right to demand that they shall be opened on Sunday or any other day they see fit.

But the contents of the museums belong, it may be said, to representativs of the church, since the owners, or the prevailing part of them, object to their property being exhibited on Sunday on account of their religious views. General di Cesnola states that the owners will remove the collections if the buildings are opened on Sunday. The reasons may be in part other than religious ones, but if they are religious at all the principle involved remains the same.

Now the question arises as to whether the people should be taxed to furnish accommodations for collections placed under such a restriction, and, if we are going to hav public museums, whether they should not be placed wholly on the state basis. It is an ungrateful thing to look a gift-horse in the mouth, but nothing should be allowed to stand in the way of principle.

From the New York Times.

The latest petition for the opening of the museums on Sunday is in one respect the most noteworthy of all the petitions for that purpose. It has nine thousand signatures, and among them are four clergymen, and the representativs of one hundred and twelve labor organizations. These four clergymen are aware that shutting poor people up on Sunday to a choice between the church and the grog-shop will not necessarily increase the attendance at church. It is to be hoped that more clergymen may make this discovery and use their influence accordingly. The part taken by the labor organizations disposes of the gratuitous assumption that the laboring classes do not desire the Sunday opening so far as that assumption can be disposed of without the actual trial which the persons who make the assumption are opposed to giving.

From the New York Sun.

The laboring men want shorter and more regular working hours every week day in order to get more time to rest, and they want Sunday, their weekly holiday, to go to church on and to devote to such interesting and instructiv modes of relaxation as the town affords. Unfortunately, the best possible means of supplying that want is denied them because the doors of the museums are shut on Sunday. Some day, though, they will be open on Sunday as well as on other days.

Communications.

Is Life Worth Living?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 27th is a communication from Otto Wettstein, upon which, with the editor's permission, I would offer some comment.

In the first place, Mr. Wettstein depreciates life in this world as hardly worth living. In the generality of cases, especially in large cities, where in the terrible struggle to get rich, humanity is ground to powder between the upper and nether millstones of business, I agree with him that mere life, such as that, has nothing compensatory in it, and that death and annihilation would be infinitly preferable.

In the second place, he speaks of the theory of a future state of existence in a way and spirit that astounds me with its dogmatism, coming, as it does, from a Freethinker, and so good a man as Mr. W. is. I know nothing so discouraging in the whole Freethought movement as the bigotry displayed by so many in its ranks. It shows by its temper that if it had power it would establish an Inquisition as dangerous to liberty as was that of the Catholics. Listen to Mr. Wettstein: "The unreasonable hope in an endless, miraculous kind of existence"—"which, to the philosopher, is only endurable on account of his absolute knowledge that death ends all"—"Puny man's unreasonable longings, prompted by his ignorance and egotism, can never be realized," etc. It seems to me that a dozen Sir Isaac Newtons or Charles Darwins, wrapped up in one skin, would blush to speak on unsettled questions with so much conceit and overweening confidence as Mr. Wettstein does in the words I hav italicized. Who, of all the believers in a future state of being, ever said that it would be a "miraculous" kind of existence? Not one. On the contrary, every representativ man among them rejects the doctrin of miracle entirely, and claims that life after death is just as natural as life before birth. If Mr. Wettstein is ignorant of this fact, he is unfit to discuss the question, because he don't understand what the question is. If he is not ignorant of it, then he dishonestly imputes to those he opposes what he knows to be false, and so must be debarred from court as an unfair advocate. Just think of a man saying that he has absolute knowledge that death ends all!

Suppose that, a hundred years ago, at a meeting of the "British Association for the Advancement of Science," a seer had risen up and told the crowd of savans present that before the close of the nineteenth century, by new discoveries and inventions in electro-magnetism, a man standing in New York city could speak to another in London, as one speaks to his neighbor face to face, the whole of them, feeling that their intellects were insulted by such an announcement, would hav proclaimed, with united voice, "False wizard! avaunt!" Indeed, when Franklin wrote his dissertation to prove that electricity was lightning, and that it could be controled by natural laws so as to prevent it from striking houses and killing their inhabitants, the Otto Wettsteins in the association were so numerous that they refused to allow his papers to be recorded among its archives! They said, as our Otto says, it was impossible; they knew absolutely that it was impossible! But the telegraph, and the telephone, and the other wonders of our times were possibilities a hundred years ago as truly as they are realities now. Ought not such astounding facts as these to make a man modest? Is it reverential to the dignity and eternity of truth for a man, when he stands among the mysterious facts of the universe, and is one of the most mysterious of these himself, to say of this proposition and the other that the one is absolutely impossible and the other absolutely foolish? Any man who reads the antenatal history of a human being which the science of embryology givs, and notes the countless changes it undergoes during the forty weeks of its development, would choke, it seems to me, if he would dare to say that another change was impossible at the time of death. The universe is all matter. What is called spirit, or mind, is but a form of matter, and among its infinit possibilities may there not be one that the thinking and remembering faculty which constitutes this personality and individuality survives the disintegration called death? As this is a scientific question, and not a religious one, any more than birth is, ought we not, in discussing it, to imitate the modesty of the greatest of all the sons of men, who, in pouring out the wealth of his attainments to the world, began by saying "Franciscus de verulamio sic cogitavit?" Men who call themselves inquirers should never say I know till, by a calm and unprejudiced examination of both sides of a question, they hav arrived at the quod erat demonstrandum. He then has a right to say, I know my opinion is founded on truth and yours on falsehood. He is no longer a seeker, an inquirer after truth. He is a possessor.

As Mr. Wettstein thinks that a future state of existence would be so great a bore that one would pray to hav his being extinguished like a candle, let us inquire whether there might not be a state of things on earth in which human beings would be as perfect in happiness as a clock is perfect in its movements as a time-keeper; and whether, if such a condition were projected into the future, there would be any need of the bitter mournings over the emptiness of the future life in which Mr. Wettstein indulges.

Happiness is our being's end and aim; and the first condition necessary to it is perfect health, of body and of mind, which means a constitution adapted to its environments. Mere life, if its owner be in vigorous health, is full of happiness. I hav heard a child in such circumstances exclaim, "Oh, how happy I am!" My word health would include the physical development of the person; no ugliness of feature, no deformity of the body, to occasion constant worriment.

The second condition necessary to happiness is a sure competency to meet all the reasonable wants of the person, in books, travel, etc. I carefully avoid saying wealth; for wealth, which is a large excess above competency, is a millstone hung about the owner's neck, and impedes his freedom of movement. It is to a man what baggage was to a Roman army—"impedimenta," hindrance to motion, instead of help. A morbid desire for wealth is a form of insanity, as much so as it would be in a man to insist upon wearing a dozen overcoats instead of one. A sure competency is all that we can enjoy. All over it brings carking care.

The third condition is care. Except during the growing period of childhood, a person without care is a person without happiness. Care must not be excessiv. Too much is as bad as too little. I had occasion to see this illustrated in the case of a rich man's daughter in the city, who went to spend a year in the family of an intelligent farmer, where order was the rule, and disorder the exception. At her father's home this girl had nothing in the world to do. She had not a single care. Consequently, she suffered from ennui, and was so dissatisfied and miserable that she became out of health. At the farmhouse, where every member of the family was busy, yet, because of their orderly arrangements, all had plenty of time for company and amusement, the mistress of the household assigned Miss Jennie to duty. She must lay the table three times a day, feed three broods of chickens, and care for them, and go to the post-office on foot, or on horseback, every clear day. In a week the good effect of this disciplin was perceptible in the girl's health, spirits, and happiness. The secret was, she had care, not too much, to embarrass and oppress, but just enough to make her conscious of responsibility, and to feel that there was a place in the big universe for her to fill, and that she was not a mere nonentity. She was therefore as happy as a girl in her "teens" could be.

The last condition necessary to happiness is that the seeker after it hav an activ, inquiring mind. The fields of knowledge are more than I hav space to mention. The sciences are a sisterhood, and flourish in the neighborhood of each other. To those who study them, they are the sources of the purest happiness. Observing the phenomena of nature in all her departments, communicating the knowledge we get to others, one never suffers from ennui or monotony. Under the law of change he is in a perpetual heaven. The more he drinks of the fountain of knowledge the more he thirsts, and in the quenching of this thirst consists his purest happiness.

Now, all these conditions being present, with father, mother, husband, wife, brother, sister, friends, and congenial neighbors superadded, what is to hinder a human being from enjoying perfect happiness for, say, seventy years of his life? Such a one has no idea of, and no craving for, any more happiness than he enjoys. Life, in these circumstances of endless change and variety, is a blessing which no one would be willing to giv up, until old age, with its infirmities, overtook him, and from sheer weakness made it too heavy a burden to bear. But suppose that the function of death was merely to shift him to a new stage of being, and that he carried with him his identity of person, his attainments in knowledge, the tastes he had here, and entered upon a period of perpetual youth and strength, why might he not go on enjoying his new lease of life for a million of years?

I can easily understand how playing eternally on a harp of gold and walking the golden streets of the New Jerusalem in silver slippers, as I once heard a preacher assure his delighted audience was to be the employment of the saints in heaven, would be a very monotonous and tiresome business, and cause a man to wish for a change. But with the fields of knowledge all open and the thirst for knowledge never satiated, might not existence in the endless future be as much a delight as it would be in the supposed case in this world?

As to a future life, I vex not myself about it. I was not consulted as to whether I would be born into this world or not. Neither hav I been consulted as to whether I would like it or not, to liv after death. The fate of one is the fate of all. My business in this life is to get as much good and to do as much good as my circumstances allow, and then calmly and cheerfully meet my destiny, whatever it may be.

Fiat and the Function of Money.

The question of money has been discussed by several correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and as it is one of those questions which are fundamental, allow me to participate and set forth my views. I began the study of money, banks, and currency when a boy, just coming on the stage of action at the first election of General Jackson as president in 1828. I was an ardent Jacksonian, and all through his administrations was a large reader of the current political literature incident to the financial policy he promulgated, and finally established. I hav never lost my interest in financial questions; because, as I hav grown older, I hav seen that the general principles upon which I based myself more than fifty years ago hav proved correct, and must in the end be acknowledged and become the corner stone of the financial system to be adopted by the United States.

I do not propose to discuss the subject at length, only advert to a few points pertinent to a clear understanding of the matter. I propose to write of Fiat and the Functions of Money. For my text I take a paragraph which appeared at the head of the editorial columns of the Providence Daily Journal, a few days ago, as follows: "A standard silver dollar, worth only seventy-nine cents, is as entirely fiat money as the greenback."

Evidently this was intended as a kick to silver and greenbacks, one of those sinuous slurs which are made to answer for argument by the goldites; that is, those who would hinge our financial system on gold, and make everything tributary to it. I admit the statement, and at the same time declare that the gold dollar, worth one hundred cents (more now) "is as essentially fiat money" as the standard dollar or the greenback dollar. Neither would be money without the fiat of the government. This fiat is the essential element or factor which makes gold, silver, or paper money. Take this away and they would cease to be money, value or no value.

This thing or property we call value has nothing whatever to do with the special function which belongs to money. The best possible material for money is a something whose value is as near nothing as possible. The experience of the world is a positiv demonstration of this proposition. It is not possible to demonstrate any proposition in Euclid more clearly. This value notion in connection with money has been, is, and always will be, a most mischievous one. It is a disturbing element, and so long as it obtains in practice will be such, introduce whatever checks we may.

What is money? The bankers, the bullionists, the writers on political economy generally, tell us it is a standard or a measure of value, and they would limit this term money to gold. But can gold be a measure of value for all commodities, inasmuch as it is a commodity itself, varying in value or price as does corn or cotton? The same of silver. Both are commodities, and we might as well use any other commodity, say pork, potatoes, or flour. Does not the reader see the fallacy of this claim for the precious metals, so-called, to be made standard or measures. As well hav a yard stick which can be shortened or lengthened, measuring 36 inches to-day, 40 inches to-morrow, and 30 inches the next day. The truth is—truth rooted in the nature of things—no commodity can be made a standard or measure of value.

What is value? Value is the relation of things, and when you talk of "intrinsic value," a constant something inhering in a commodity, you are talking sheer nonsense. Relations vary and values change. Some forty years ago, then residing in eastern Connecticut, I remember a heavy frost on the morning of June 10th. Corn was well up and began to show in the rows. Within an hour or two after sunrise the rows disappeared, the young corn blades being frozen. Apparently the corn was killed. A panic ensued among the farmers, and there was quite a rush to the trade centers of that locality, Norwich and Providence, to purchase corn. There was a rapid rise. Within twenty-four hours corn had advanced from 87 cents to $1.25 the bushel. In three or four days it was noted that the frost had not injured the roots; the blades began to put forth again, and within ten days corn fell to the ante-frost price of 87 cents a bushel. Suppose corn had been the standard of value, who does not know that the effects would hav been most disastrous? This illustrates the impolicy of a commodity standard of value, for with such a standard there is ever uncertainty and danger, the danger being a constant factor which no economic or political alchemy can eliminate.

I again query, What is money? We hav seen that it cannot be a standard measure, if a commodity, because no commodity, not even gold, possesses a dead-level value. Money is a representativ, not of values, but services rendered, for in the last analysis it must come to this. I work for A to-day, and receive a dollar greenback; to-morrow, for B, and receive a standard dollar; the next day, for C, and receive a gold dollar. I then hav three kinds of money, each dollar representing services rendered. I therefore hav stored up in each a day's labor. If I keep them in my pocket, they are only tokens or reservoirs, one as good as the others. The capacity of the gold dollar is no greater than that of the silver, neither is the silver dollar of greater capacity than the greenback. To be of any practical use to me, I must redeem each of them by making them subserve my wants. I go to a store; with my gold dollar I buy fifteen pounds of sugar, and could hav bought as much with either of the others; with my silver dollar I buy coffee and tea; with my greenback I buy steak and potatoes. Thus I make my labor subserve my wants, redeem each kind of money, as I must always redeem my money to hav it avail me anything. Had all my dollars been gold ones, I should hav been no better off. I should hav been obliged to redeem them in like manner. Thus vanishes another illusion, the supremacy and superiority of gold, for that never can be an unerring standard or measure, and it must always be redeemed as well as silver or paper. Gold therefore possesses no advantages above silver or paper, provided the latter are truly money—that is, bear upon their faces the stamp which registers the fiat of the government. WM. FOSTER, JR.

Providence, R. I.

"The Three Hells."

The Rev. George R. Kramer preached a sermon in the church of the Blessed Hope last Sunday evening, his subject being, "The Three Hells," which hells he denominated respectivly as "The Hell of Universalism," "The Hell of so-called Orthodoxy," and "The Hell of the Bible."

After quoting scripture in regard to hell in the abstract and in the concrete, the reverend gentleman said to his hearers, "We are shut in to the three views of hell as specified in the subject."

"Shut in," eh? It doesn't appear that there is much of a "shut in" here, with three hells in view, the choice of which is open to any and all, and each of which has its advocates and supporters. "Shut in," no, no. Why, instead, we hav a triple panorama of hells rolling out before us, and the view thereof, or the three views, certainly ought to satisfy the longings of the most exacting of Christians who refuse to let hell slide, and stick to it like a sucker-fish to a ship's keel.

With three hell views on exhibition, it would seem that one could pay his money and take his choice, but, unhappily for the truly blue and hide-bound Christians, two of these views, and one the most popular with truly blue Christians, are dissolving views, according to the lights of the Rev. Kramer.

The hell of Universalism, which he says is but a temporary hell at best, from which sinners, after being sufficiently and justly punished, are sent on their way rejoicing to heaven and eternal bliss, the reverend gentleman cavalierly dismisses as a hell in which no fair to middling Christian should take any stock whatever, it being an unsatisfactory hell to the average hell partisan, who would hav no spirits in heaven that were forced to be purified by the hell-fire process!

The reverend gentleman did not say this in so many words, but he is a fair to middling Christian—not a stalwart of stalwarts; and we all know that the F. to M. Christians and stalwarts—Universalists are without the pale—would never consent to the escape of a soul from hell, even though incandescently purified by the fires thereof—no, never!

The "Hell of Orthodoxy" was next taken in hand by the reverend hell expounder, who frankly acknowledged—not being a stalwart on the subject of hell—that this hell was too much of a hell for him to take to his bosom, as it were. He said that "to believe in the orthodox version of hell would bring most minds to the verge of insanity." Why didn't he go a little further, and say, with truth, away over the border of, and quite into the domain of insanity? Then would he hav said the truth and nothing but the truth. And yet how many profess to believe in the orthodox hell! Profess, yes, that's the word. Did they really and truly believe in it, nine-tenths of them would be in insane asylums, the remaining tenth being as cruel-hearted as the God who instituted such a hell, would keep a level head, unless love or losses of lucre in stock speculation broke them up.

The preacher went on to say that "even the most modified view of an orthodox hell was too horrible to contemplate," thus flatfootedly giving himself away as heterodox. It was not the hell of the Bible, he said, and, contrasted with the idea of a just God, absurd in the extreme; besides, it was a base libel on God, whom he thanked for not being able to believe in such a hell, thereby helping on the libel.

Relegating this hell to the pit of non-belief, with the "hell of Universalism," the reverend gentleman took up the third hell, or hell of the Bible. On this hell he took his stand, and might hav exclaimed with the poet, "This rock shall fly from its firm base as soon as I" from this hell. This is the ground-floor of hell-belief with him, and budge he won't and can't.

And what is this hell of his, the "hell of the Bible?" A place of punishment for sinners, but only so long as Satan livs. When Satan dies, sooner or later, then die the sinners, and all is at an end, save with the blest in heaven, who shall liv in bliss forever. This is certainly a far less horrible hell than the orthodox hell; but the trouble with it is that it isn't "orthodox," and the orthodox won't hav it; and they are the large majority, for we all know that professional Christians—practical Christians are rara aves—are nothing if not "orthodox." Inoculate a sinner with the "spirit," and he is orthodox from the word Go. He bolts everything from Genesis to Revelation without a strangle, and takes in hell-fire eternal torments without the least sign of a wry face, and would account it blasphemy in one who doubted that literal brimstone—the brimstone of commerce—was an important factor in hell's fire!

Well, the Rev. Mr. Kramer, having made his choice of the three hells, as set forth by him, it is in order for anyone else to make choice, one having as good a right as another to set up a hell of his own. If neither of these three hells suits—the "Hell of Universalism" ought to find favor with most any one insisting upon having a hell of some kind—it is an easy matter to improvise one, for instance, listening forever to Talmage's bizarre vaporings. Wouldn't that be hell? Picking over pied type for eternity—whew! and so on, and so on.

But let us dismiss hell—the "three hells," all hells—and do what we can to make as much of a heaven as possible of earth, all we are sure of, and of that only for the nonce. SI SLOKUM.

Alive or Dead.

The abuses that grow up in our government of late are enough to utterly demoralize the people, if continued. Who that has resided in closely-contested counties or states does not know that General Black has not disclosed the half of the abuses of the pension office?—applicants and pensioners intimidated or awed by those missionaries called examiners; not directly, but indirectly, through vile agents, the scum of village society, boards appointed to retain German votes or other coherent voters. Of all the abuses the spy and detectiv system is the most abominable. Let gray heads reflect on the effect of letting loose on society swarms of spies prior to 1860. What would people hav said and done? There would hav been some lynching of spies. The people of Northern states hav never been so cursed by this system as those of the South. Spies hav patroled every township and caught up tens of thousands of our people since 1865. Thousands among the best citizens hav been blackmailed or utterly ruined. The full history can never be told. What a horror of suicides, murders, assaults, burnings, revenges, heart-breakings it would be! Allan Pinkerton, at the end of "Claud Melnotte," says, "The detectivs are even worse than the criminals they hunt." Sure that is good authority. A commissioner of internal revenue, Mr. Raum, in his report for November 25, 1881, says: "The amounts of fees of United States district attorneys and marshals depend almost wholly on the suits they prosecute. . . . Instances hav been brought to my attention where numerous prosecutions hav been made and arrested parties carried long distances at their great inconvenience and expense for no other reason than to make costs." Could anything more atrocious be devised? No tyranny on earth has a more damnable enginry of terror and oppression than a system that leaves it to the pleasure of a few officials to drag citizens hundreds of miles at their own expense on mere whispered charges. Tens of thousands of citizens hav been ruined by it who were innocent of wrong in even thought.

But the system and business of spying hav grown and become a state favorit, since near twenty-four years ago, when the writer watched over the deathbed of a noble youth who was shot down by a blundering, pretentious United States detectiv (spy) by a mistake, until to-day, what a stream of good blood has been made to run under the system! A case that not long ago occurred is attached to this article. "Dead or alive!" By what authority do these patrons of the Comstocks issue such proclamations? Where can liberty be if spies from anywhere—the infernals alone know—may enter your house, or stand to waylay your path and order, "Come with us, our prisoner," presenting a pistol? Tried and condemned in your absence! Outlawed! "Take him dead for so much, alive for so much." Why try one again if such a sentence may be issued, even if you are guilty? You are presumed innocent, are you, but on suspicion may be taken "alive or dead?" Cruel and unusual punishments are unlawful by general government constitution, and a citizen has thirty-eight guarantees, in so many states, of his safety as against such; but on even no suspicion may be taken "alive or dead" on mere whim of informers or spies—these ineffable scoundrels buried as men till their hearts rotted and then resurrected, as Curran said. Or after conviction you may be handed over to be lashed, smothered, starved, gagged, and bucked, and otherwise tortured, none of which treatments are "cruel and unusual!" O ye Constitution guaranteed free Americans! Involuntary servitude, etc., shall not be inflicted, but, be ye tramp or stranger, every village boasting its mayor can arrest and put you in the chain-gang where you will work whether or no. But enough. Here is the extract which tells a tale of a tragedy whose like occurs almost daily in some of its features. It is from the New York Tribune:

KILLED IN MISTAKE FOR ANOTHER MAN.

METROPOLIS, ILL., Nov. 29th (Special).—Some time ago a barber, Thurston Pollingsworth, in a quarrel killed George Robinson. Pollingsworth at once fled to Clarksville, Tenn., where, after changing his name, he went into business, and was entirely unsuspected. A few days ago, however, he decided to come back, giv himself up, and stand trial, making the plea of self-defense. This he did, and at a late hour last night the jury in his case returned a verdict of "not guilty." Before he gave himself up, circulars and photographs of Pollingsworth had been sent broadcast over the country, together with offers of a liberal reward for his capture dead or alive. Incited by the promised reward, two Tennessee officers turned detectivs, and after working on the case some time got track of a man who they decided must be the murderer wanted. They immediately gave chase and followed the man through Kentucky, in West Virginia, and back again into Kentucky, at last catching up with him. They told him he was wanted here, and insisted on bringing him by the earliest train. The man protested that his name was not Pollingsworth, that he had never been in this town in his life and was not wanted anywhere, while his business was such that he could not consent to any delay, but would prove his identity if allowed. With this he attempted to go his way, but the officers, considering his action a resistance to their authority, shot him dead. Thus, at just about the time the real Pollingsworth was acquitted by the jury here, the marshal was informed of the killing of the supposed Pollingsworth in Kentucky and a demand made on him for the reward offered.

Oregon, Mo. HOLT.

Miss Gardener Scolded.

In a recent TRUTH SEEKER an article appeared (in reply to some strictures of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch) by one whose particular claim for distinction consists in having been introduced by Colonel Ingersoll as a lecturer at Steinway Hall some time ago, coupled with the fact that our distinguished president has been amiable enough to write a preface to her book. No wonder she should feel grateful for such services, but in showing her gratitude it was scarcely necessary to be unjust to others who hav done valiant service in the cause, by such remarks as:

> To begin with, there is no such organization as the "Liberal League." Robert Ingersoll is not its "presiding genius," and it has not sent a petition to the New York legislature. There was once an organization called by that name. Robert Ingersoll belonged to it, but he withdrew from it because he did not approve of some of its proposed measures. He had been heralded all over this country as a man who "defended the sending of obscene literature through the mails." So far from this being the case, he resigned and withdrew from all connection with the above-named society because he disagreed with some of its officers upon this very point.

The last sentence contains the plain inference that those who remained in the society did "defend sending obscene matter through the mails"—a charge we are accustomed to hear from the enemy, not from our friends. If that imputation remains as a result of this lady's letter-writing, we shall be ready to exclaim, "Save us from the folly of our friends." If Ingersoll disagreed with the society and resigned, that was clearly his right. There were several who thought the matter comparativly irrelevant and remained, as well as those who were in such dead earnest. Notwithstanding the writer speaks with authority, but very obscurely, as "one of the vice-presidents of one of the three organizations" criticised, she probably is so unfamiliar with organized Liberal efforts as to be ignorant of the fact that the Hon. Elizur Wright, "whose praise was sung by papers all over the country when he died two months ago," was then its president, and whose opinion was just as worthy of "respectful hearing." Why did not the writer candidly and fairly state that the Liberal League had changed its name to that of the Secular Union? Many who hav worked just as faithfully under both names—whose time and means hav been freely devoted to the cause—will, with myself, scarcely thank this vice-president for her uncalled for apology. Neither will it help the Secular Union, in my judgment, to pretend that our attitude on complete secularization of the state is indorsed by "many of the most orthodox."

It is the work of the true and steadfast reformer to raise from *in*famous the famous; to make the epithet of reproach of one period the synonym for respect in the next; to reach Distinction through the toiling path of Disfavor; in short, to exchange Odium for Admiration. It may be this will entail adversity, but he or she "who has no stomach for this fight" should read what the "immortal bard" puts in the mouth of Henry V. before the battle of Agincourt, and—"brace up." E. A. STEVENS.

Inconsistent Inconsistency.

Christianity, as formulated, is inconsistent, yet it is consistent with its inconsistency, and it does not inaugurate a consistency or an inconsistency incompatible with its inconsistency. It is much more consistent with its inconsistency in rendering its support to a supreme incomprehensible personal intelligence in whom all things consist, and by whom all things are and were created. Then an infinit, impersonal, unintelligent, unknowable being is an inconsistency inconsistent with its inconsistency. J. H. BURNHAM.

The Museums.

All that the American Secular Union can do at present has been done to induce the managers of the museums to open them to the public on Sundays. It now remains entirely with the trustees, and there is not too much ground to hope that their reply will be favorable. Still, there is a chance of a partial concession from them.

The attitude toward the public of the trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, if we may judge by the tone of the trustees' report at the annual meeting which took place last month, is very similar to the attitude of a noted railroad man, now deceased. When asked what he thought of the public, which had expressed sentiments adverse to his methods, he retorted, "The public be damned." The trustees of the Art Museum did not use these words, but their report was an ill-concealed grumble against the public generally, and the city in particular. Its general tenor cannot be better stated than by quoting the words of the first vice-president, Wm. C. Prime, a bigoted Presbyterian, son of S. Irenæus Prime. To a Herald reporter, on the day of the annual meeting, he said:

"There seems to be a foolish notion abroad that the public has a say in the management of this museum. We want it understood that we're running our own machine here, and don't propose to be interfered with. We havn't given a thought to this opening on Sunday business that the newspapers are harping upon so much. The newspapers can say what they like. The question with us is not whether we'll open on Sunday, but whether we won't get out of this building and out of the park altogether."

The trustees of the American Museum of Natural History were less stiff-necked, and appointed a conference committee to receive the communication of the petitioners, with the result that the document printed last week in these columns and petitions with nearly ten thousand signatures were forwarded, with the request for an early reply.

But, as we said, the outlook is not hopeful. Keeping in sight the "mind-your-own-business" attitude of the trustees of the Metropolitan Museum, and the fact that Mr. Jesup, president of the Natural History Museum, has published a pamphlet argument against Sunday opening, we incline to the opinion that we hav appealed to a too prejudiced court. The case, we think, was decided before being heard. Possibly the array of prominent names upon the petition may effect a change of sentiment, but it is doubtful. The good of the agitation, therefore, will be confined to narrower limits than it ought. However, it has served to show that the public desire the opening, that the press is on the people's side, and that the politicians on some matters are for the public good. It will also place the blame for continued closing where it belongs. And it has done this: It has made certain the fact that when another attempt shall be made—and that another will be we can assure the museum trustees—the result will be a compliance, or a decision in accordance with Mr. Prime's alternativ—the museums will get out of the park.

Another thing. The museums need money for additional buildings. The Metropolitan Museum wants the city to market the bonds already authorized by act of legislature; the Natural History Museum wants the Board of Estimate and Apportionment to ask the legislature to authorize the issue of two hundred thousand dollars to be used for giving it more floor room. Perhaps these grants may be made contingent upon a Sunday opening. Who knows what wise things our city officials may be induced to do? We predict that this prophecy of the Sun will be fulfilled: "Some day, though, the museums will be open on Sunday as well as on other days."

Mud and Water from Boston.

In a recent issue of Liberty, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is again written against in very undignified language. To save the reputation of Mr. Appleton, we copy only those paragraphs which, in a manner—however remote—bear upon the subject we hav been discussing. Mr. Appleton says:

"Macdonald says that when I go from my house to my office and find a sidewalk intervening, it is my duty to either help pay for it or walk in the slush of the street. Yet even after I take to the street I am still a trespasser, for that has been paved for me. My plain duty is to get out of the town. But after I get out of the town I am no better off, for somebody has built the roads for me. The thing very soon reduces itself to the plain proposition that, if I do not like to pay for the traps and trumpery that hav been laid ahead of me in my path in life without my knowledge, request, and consent, it is my duty as a consistent man to get right off of this planet.

Now, Editor Macdonald, I hav just as good a right as you have. You want to drive me off because I demur from paying for things that I hav not ordered. Do you like to pay for what you hav not ordered? You say I should not take advantage of what other people hav done unless I am willing to pay my portion. I cannot help it, unless I commit suicide; but does this fact constitute any valid reason why I am morally bound to help pay for what I had no part in ordering? Upon your sublime reasoning every fat-bellied Catholic priest of whose ecclesiastical paunch you take advantage in getting up your TRUTH SEEKER cartoons ought to tax you to pay for a portion of his big dinners."

The first of these paragraphs narrows the economic question to a contest between the present and the future—between the people who occupy the earth today and those who will occupy it in the days to come. Mr. Appleton virtually says that society must make no improvement—lay no pavements, build no roads—because some babe yet unborn may object to contributing to keep them in repair. Such a principle would breed a malarial stagnation that would forever put an end to that progress of the race which the Anarchists profess to be anxious to further. There is no force in such an "argument," no logic, no common sense, not even wit. If Mr. Appleton remains upon the planet—and far be it from us to insinuate that his departure would be desirable—he must use the improvements the preceding generation has made, and if he is such a constitutional deadbeat that he is unwilling to help repair the damages he is doing, then a government would seem to be necessary to force him to be square.

But Mr. Appleton says he does not wish to take advantage of these public improvements; he is forced to do it. This statement is the strongest argument to show that Anarchy is impracticable that could be adduced. The life of every individual is so interwoven with the life of every other individual that a complete "individual sovereignty," which is the basis of Anarchy, cannot be attained. A lone person in a lone land is the only one who can liv out Anarchy. Add a second person, and new relations spring up, new courses of life must be adopted, and new forces and relations are to be taken into consideration. One man may do as he pleases; two men cannot, because the pleasure of one may conflict with the rights of the other. They voluntarily make rules, which they agree to observe. When the community grows, executiv officers must be chosen, the rules enforced against violators—and that is government. The rules must be enforced, for those who help make them are the ones who break them. If the adoption of a law against stealing should be submitted to people to-day, every one would vote for it, yet to-morrow some one would break it, and, if there were no government, might escape punishment. There must be force used. It is impossible to get along otherwise. This Mr. Appleton admitted when he said at the Liberal Club that if Anarchy were to be proclaimed the next day at 12 o'clock, he would leave the city before 10 o'clock.

We will say nothing about Mr. Appleton's "argument" that we ought to contribute to the rotundity of a priest, because our artist has once or twice made that prominent in his illustrations. We are anxious, as a friend, to save Mr. Appleton's reputation, which is seriously endangered by his last lucubration.

We stated that civil government performs a thousand necessary acts which individuals cannot do. In one of the few lucid paragraphs in the article we are considering Mr. Appleton asks:

"How do you know what individuals can or cannot do when civil government takes their business by force out of their hands?"

We know by the experience of the race. There were individuals before there were governments, and governments were instituted because they were found necessary. There are certain things to be done in every community in which every individual is interested, and to the accomplishment of which he is willing to contribute. By uniting and delegating to individuals the power to do those things the people form a government. This government derives its powers solely from the people, and can be changed or abolished at will. What individual could defend the country against belligerent invasion by a foreign power? Oh, says the Anarchist, the people would unite and do it! Very well. The first thing they would do in uniting would be to elect men to direct their movements, make rules for their guidance, and see to the support of those bearing arms. That is government. No matter where you start, or how you reason, you must come right around to the fact that government is a necessity. You may call it voluntary coöperation, or what you will, but there it is, a factor which can never be eliminated from human society, any more than friction can be done away with in machinery.

Only one or two more points in Mr. Appleton's rejoinder are worth noticing. Such retorts as "ask your taxpayers in New York about that," to the statement that government protects us from outside invasion, is an evasion as silly as weak. The matter is a question of fact, and Mr. Appleton can probably read history. One point he attempts to make is that it is because government conducts our schools that Freethought children are forced to hear religion taught. If government were a force outside of the people there might be some sense in this. But he never will take into consideration the very patent fact that our government is the people, and when an evil creeps into one of our institutions they can remove it as the evil of Bible reading is being removed—gradually. To destroy the government and the schools to get rid of this evil would be like burning the house which shelters you to get rid of a gnawing rat. Both schools and government are necessary, and if both were destroyed to get rid of the imperfections, it would be only to reëstablish them again at once. Another attempted point is similiar to this. We pointed out what everyone knows, that government cares for the poor and the insane. This is evaded by Mr. Appleton in this way:

"But first settle whether it is itself not the chief of wrongdoers. Does it ever punish itself? Is it not the fact of its own existence that primarily creates the poor and the insane?"

To this we say: Men hav abused their trusts, and prostituted governments to their own individual purposes. They were practical Anarchists, "individual sovereigns," with no regard for the rights of society. The first question, Does government ever punish itself? is nonsense. How can a constitution punish itself, or a statute shut itself up in a state prison? To the second question, Is it not the fact of government's existence that primarily creates the poor and the insane? we oppose a distinct No! If Mr. Appleton asserts it, let him prove it. The onus is upon him, unless, like the theologian, he proposes to argue from an unsupported assumption.

The last, and most wonderful, of Mr. Appleton's paragraphs are these:

"But at last civil Deacon Macdonald wheels in his big gun. He says the people can change or abolish the government if they choose, and they are alone to blame if their servants steal from them.

"It is, as it were, as if somebody should roll a big stone before my door. When I protest, the man says that I am to blame if I tolerate it, for there is a constitutional provision by which I can change or abolish this state of things whenever I will. But what is the stone before my door for? I insist. The man then has the effrontery to say that I helped roll it there.

"This is just the position of Brother Macdonald. I ask him by what right this big stone (the state) is rolled before the door of my individual liberty in the first place, that I should be at the pains of abolishing it constitutionally? Macdonald says I helped roll it there. He knows better. But, finding no other way to get out of my house, I climb over it, and thus make use of it. For this forced use of the stone Macdonald says I ought in duty to pay, or else get off the planet. O thou wonderful youth! thou rising prince of truth seekers! thou dost indeed deserve a chromo.

"Once again do I call Brother Macdonald back to the original question of his blank inconsistency. I expect that he will do little more than 'whee up' again, but, as I say, if he continues to show the best end of himself long enough, he will furnish an argument stronger than my philosophy, which, unfortunately, he seems constitutionally incapable of assimilating."

That our readers may see all his "points," we are obliged to let a little of Mr. Appleton's scurrility slip in, for which we beg our readers' pardon. The expressions "whee up," and "show the best end of himself," which he uses are delicate bits of humor indulged in to indicate that individuals who differ from Henry Appleton are four legged. The sarcasm is very fine, and the conception extraordinarily convincing.

Before our Anarchistic philosopher dilates further upon our statement, we wish him to show that it is not true. Let him prove that the people of this country cannot change the government. Unless he does this his attempted reason is not only pointless but is a dishonest attempt to evade the question. There is no use in speculating what government is like when everybody knows what it actually is like.

Mr. Appleton has taken lessons from the churchmen of the fifteenth century, who maintained that the earth was flat though Magellan had sailed around it. He calmly brushes aside a plain statement of a fact as of no consequence, and proceeds to tell what he thinks the government is. If a brick lay upon his desk before him he would look vacantly over it at the wall, and begin to speculate upon what a brick is like. A brick, he would say, is, as it were, forty thousand miles long, sixty thousand miles wide, and one hundred thousand miles high. It is made of feathers; is good to eat, and a sovereign remedy for small-pox. Then, waving his pen in the air, he would ask, What right has this brick which I hav described upon my desk? I did not order it, and I will not pay for it. It is monstrous tyranny for me to hav to tolerate it. This brick, which is in my mind's eye, is the cause of all poverty, of all insanity, of all crime; it is the black beast of society, the impediment to progress, the enslaver of woman, the devil generally. And all the time the real brick would be only six inches long, four inches wide, and two and a half inches high—a very useful article for building purposes. To himself Mr. Appleton's brick might be real, but other people would conclude that it existed only in his hat.

When Mr. Appleton disproves that government in this country is of the people, and can be changed by them, or abolished, if they will, then we may follow him in his speculations. At present it is useless. We cannot assimilate fol-de-rol, though its author may think it philosophy. If, in the explanation of Anarchy, facts are not to be taken into account, then we hav no further interest in the matter.

Editorial Notes.

HELEN H. GARDENER has returned to New York city, and intends to make it her future residence. She should be addressed in care of this office.

SAM JONES offers to convert Indianapolis for five thousand dollars. It would be worth that to the churches if Doctor Monroe of the Iron Clad Age could be included. But we hav our doubts on this point.

WE recommend the right reverend bishop of Niagara to giv his audiences Mr. Huxley's reply to Mr. Gladstone as well as the latter's misleading statements. They would then hav the latest word of science, and if the bishop should adopt Mr. Huxley's views, he would be saved from the painful position he now occupies of a wilful perverter of scientific truth.

YOU can tell by the persistency with which they attack it, what persons think is the chiefest sin, says the Independent. Some think it is Sabbath-breaking, others drunkenness, and others, again, the greed of money. The Freeman's Journal devotes its severest and most frequent censures to the impiety of adulterating with mineral paraffine the wax candles which burn before the "host."

COMPLAINTS having been received of the method of reporting the meetings of the Manhattan Liberal Club, we last week procured the services of a gentleman of more years than the Man With the Badge-Pin numbers in his life, and therefore supposed to possess that sedateness of character necessary to report the doings of Assembled Wisdom. We hope his report will be found satisfactory, if uninteresting, as it is attested to be veracious.

AN account has recently been published of the fact that a large number of manuscript sermons by Robertson, of Brighton, hav been lost. They were mislaid on the platform of a railroad station, and hav never been heard of since. It is said that there were enough to fill two volumes. This, the Advocate says, is an irreparable loss to certain ministers, who hav already preached through all the published volumes of Robertson, and, having been compelled to look elsewhere, exhibit a marked deterioration of style. If an Infidel should thus accuse the ministers of stealing their sermons he would be scouted as a blasphemer.

WE call the attention of the Philadelphia Liberals to the following letter:

DEAR EDITOR: For two years I hav been an almost constant reader of the (I think) grand old TRUTH SEEKER, buying it in single numbers at the League meetings, of which I'm a member, No. 257 of Philadelphia, and I would like now to ask a question. Is there a person, or a body of persons, to your knowledge, in this City of Brotherly Love of whom an Agnostic may, without any hypocrisy, ask aid in the form of employment or the necessaries of life while looking for work? I'm a married man, with wife and three children, the youngest of whom is only one month old. I hav been out of employment for three weeks, and am now penniless. Those of the League had an opportunity of lending me a helping hand last winter, if they felt so disposed. One or two of them did manifest a little interest, and gave me letters to others for employment, but not one asked as to my appetite or how did I exist. Hoping for better times soon, I am Yours most respectfully,

HARRY G. CRISSWELL, Philadelphia, Pa.

IN a country where the church and state are supposed to be separate, the following quoted paragraph in the report of the secretary of schools in the Elmira Reformatory is peculiar reading:

"The church has long and vainly been struggling with its greatest problem—how to reach the low and depraved. The first condition of the problem is to get physical hold of them. Once the church practically did this by her own machinery. Men and women with pious aspirations voluntarily sought the benefits of confinement within prison walls furnished by or in connection with the church organization. Here they lived abstemiously, and worked hard as a religious service. Their righteousness worked its natural profitableness, and the profitableness, coming to be sought for its own sake, wrought the corruption which broke up the system. The church has lost this machinery and never will regain it. But, behold, the state has already done this work better than the church ever could. Here and now, the state has seized these sinners, has cleaned them up, thus giving them the requisit physical diet and disciplin, and is to-day calling to the invisible church: 'We hav cleared away the entrance, come in and feed these famished souls with the bread of life!' The prison should be the paidagogos to the church, the servant furnished by the state to lead the unruly candidates for education and training in righteousness, secured from truancies, to the school of disciplin in which members of the invisible church should be teachers."

That these are the sentiments of the sectarian instructors in our penal institutions there can be no doubt. They furnish an unanswerable reason why the disguised priests should be kicked out. The state the servant of the church! When was this principle engrafted upon an American Constitution, most high and mighty masters?

Literary Notes.

THE Freethinkers' Magazine for March is at hand. It contains a number of excellent essays. It may be purchased at this office; price, 25 cents.

"THE WIFE OF NO. 4,237" is the title of a new serial begun in Liberty. It is from the French of Sophie Kropotkine, translated by Sarah E. Holmes.

W. S. BAILEY'S heirs express the intention of continuing the publication of the Nashville Liberal. Mrs. R. B. Wolfe appears to be the head and front of the heirs.

THE Headlight, of Northwood, Dakota, is another local paper with Freethought principles. The editor, E. C. Kiley, is not afraid to print his honest sentiments on matters of religion.

THE London Secular Review having finished the reprinting of J. E. Remsburg's "Sabbath-Breaking," is now laying before its readers McArthur's "Examination of Church History." Saladin has a keen sight for good things.

J. K. P. BAKER writes of Miss Wixon's "All in a Lifetime:" "The more I think about it the more I think 'All in a Lifetime' is certainly something to be proud of. It is not a whit behind Mrs. Stowe's 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' Success is not the measure of merit. 'Uncle Tom's Cabin's' success was due—much of it—to the excitement about slavery."

"CONTAINS much useful religious and secular information. Its statistics are very valuable, and its contributed articles well written. It can be read with profit by everybody." This was said by the Hebrew Standard of this city, not of the Pentateuch, but of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, a very much superior production of the printing-press, whose authors are all known.

BESIDES publishing one new book last week—the Gladstone-Huxley controversy—we republished several others, and would call the attention of our book-buying friends to new editions of the following: "The Holy Bible Abridged," 30 cents; Mr. Babcock's "Religion of Humanity," 10 cents; J. E. Remsburg's "False Claims of the Church" (sixth thousand), 10 cents; S. P. Putnam's "Problem of the Universe," 25 cents; "St. Matthew Before the Court," 10 cents; "The Besant-Hatchard Debate," 25 cents; "Maria Monk," paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents; "The Pyramid of Gizeh," 25 cents; J. E. Remsburg's "Bible Morals" (third thousand), 25 cents; "Ecce Diabolus," 25 cents; "Will the Coming Man Worship God?" 10 cents; "Scientific Materialism," 10 cents. We hav in press also new editions of "The Age of Reason," Froude's "Science and Theology," Huxley's lectures on "Evolution," and Mr. Remsburg's "Image-Breakers," which will be ready in a few days.

A CHILDREN'S lyceum has been organized by the Liberals of Waco, Texas. Mr. Shaw's Independent Pulpit, of the same place, comes to us this month with twenty-four pages filled with the best of Infidel reading matter. One editorial for which we feel very grateful is a defense of D. M. Bennett against the attacks of the Methodist journal of Texas of which Mr. Shaw was once an editor.

THE Nonconformist prints the poem, "Our Father in Heaven," on its first page with a border around it. The poem is one of the best and most convincing documents ever printed, and we hope the Vincents will scatter copies of it all around. It has been widely reprinted, in secular as well as Freethought journals, in England, on the Continent, and in the Orient, but the Nonconformist is the first paper we hav seen that has given proper credit to the author, Charles Stephenson, and the original publisher, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG speaks at Perrysburg, Ohio, March 20th; Tontogany, Ohio, the 21st; Carey, Ohio, the 22d; Bradford, Ohio, the 23d and 24th.

CHARLES WATTS lectures before Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, at its hall, Broad and Wood streets, next Sunday, the 21st. Afternoon lecture at 2:30, subject, "Freethought: Its Struggles and Triumphs;" at 7:30, subject, "The New Testament: Its History and Its Teachings." Seats free. The public cordially invited.

THE Spiritualists of Cleveland and vicinity celebrate the thirty-eighth anniversary of modern Spiritualism on Wednesday, March 31st, at Weisgerber's hall. Mrs. H. S. Lake and Professor Peck are the chief speakers. The celebration will close with a ball in the evening, and the children of the Lyceum will hav an exhibition on Sunday, April 4th.

W. F. JAMIESON has lecture engagements in Alexandria, Sterling Center, Mapleton, Minn.; in Spring Valley, Wis.; and is invited back to Wentworth, Dakota, for the fourth time, where he has created greater interest in Freethought at each visit. But, as he is engaged in completing a literary work, he will remain at home in Lake City, Minn., for a few weeks before filling them. He will travel eastward and lecture all summer, and would like to visit Canada. Address at Lake City, Minn.

F. F. FOLLET writes: "Prof. W. S. Bell has just got home from a nearly two and a half months' lecturing tour over central and southern Illinois. He has traveled five hundred miles and delivered thirty-three lectures during his trip to generally good audiences. And he returns hale and hearty, and full of enthusiasm for future work in the Liberal lecture field. Those wishing to engage his services anywhere in Illinois, Iowa, Indiana, Wisconsin, or Michigan, will please to address him in the care of F. F. Follet, No. 302 State st., Chicago, Ill."

WILLIAM SEYMOUR, president of the Pennsylvania State Union, writes from Scranton, Pa.: "On Sunday last, the 7th inst., we held three meetings in the interest of the Pennsylvania State Secular Union. In the morning C. B. Reynolds delivered an able address upon the subject, 'Honest Answers to Honest Objections.' The afternoon was spent in presenting to the public the objects of the Union, and the necessity of organic and united effort in the cause of Secularism. In the evening Mrs. F. C. Reynolds spoke with great earnestness and eloquence upon 'Woman's Reasons for the Religion of Humanity,' and so interested were those who heard her that an earnest request has been made for a repetition of the lecture. After Mrs. Reynolds's lecture an address was given by the writer on the 'Principles of Secularism.' Everybody seemed pleased, and though the congregation had been listening attentivly for more than two hours, at the close of the meeting they lingered in the hall, as though they were still thirsting for more. On Monday evening, 8th inst., I spoke to a large audience on the 'Moral and Social Relations of Mankind,' which was followed by Mr. Reynolds on the subject, 'The Sabbath and the Bible.' On Tuesday night Mr. Reynolds spoke on the subject, 'Why I Left the Pulpit.'" C. B. Reynolds adds: "Under the urgent solicitations of the friends, we remained over at this place to lecture again on Sunday, the 14th inst., and to aid in perfecting the organization of the Scranton Secular Society. We had good attendance. After a lecture by Mrs. Reynolds on the Religion of Humanity, and C. B. Reynolds giving the Bible declarations of what constitutes the Christian heaven, the audience was dismissed, and those interested in organization of a Secular Society with science school on Sunday were called to order, and the following officers were elected: president, B. B. Wells; vice-president, Mrs. Anna Starkey; secretary, E. A. Jacquinot; treasurer, Alfred Harvey; vigilance committee, Anna Starkey, Oscar F. Freeman, and Alfred Harvey; educational committee, George Starkey, Margaret C. Jones, and Thomas C. Jones; social committee: J. E. Whitbeck, Maria Whitbeck, and Edward Farr. Mr. Edward Farr, an earnest, zealous Liberal, givs the free use of his new hall for the meetings of the Society. Their meetings will be held at 2:30 P.M. every Sunday. Initial subject for study by all the members during ensuing week and lesson for science school Sunday the 21st: "The Nine Demands of Liberalism."

Letters from Friends.

BUFFALO, N. Y., March 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your illustrations are doing an excellent work, and carry conviction where all that might be written upon the subject would fall far short of the mark. One column alone of your valuable paper, that of "Gems of Thought," is well worth the subscription price. The excellences of all departments make up a grand whole surmounted by a noble desire to be lenient to all who persist in freeing their minds whether in or out of place.

May you ever be successful in the battle against the "creed curse" and ignorance, is the desire of,

Yours for universal mental liberty, L. E. JORDAN.

YOUNGSVILLE, N. Y., March 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find my remittance of $3, to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like your valuable paper very much. The pictures speak volumes, and the paper should be read by all, old and young. The church thinks it is an unpardonable sin for me to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, then giv it to others to read, but I shall continue to do so, and will not seek the church's pardon for it. There are two churches in this place, Presbyterian and Methodist. The Americans and Germans of the Presbyterian denomination both hold their meetings in the Presbyterian church —Americans in the forenoon and Germans in the afternoon. Whether the Dutch God cannot understand the Yankee God, or what the trouble is, I cannot tell, but they hav been in a constant quarrel for two years, and the end is not yet.

Yours respectfully, T. S. QUICK, M.D.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., March 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me a copy of Mr. Putnam's poem, "Adami and Heva," for which I inclose price.

The illustrations are splendid, and bound to win converts. As I looked at last TRUTH SEEKER I thought: "How pleased Uncle Bennett would be to see the dear old TRUTH SEEKER illustrated."

Well, I suppose, if Spiritualism is true, he knows all about it, and I hope it is true. If not, I want to know what is going to become of the mind that actuates this body. They say there is no annihilation. We all know that there is none of the body, but what becomes of the invisible elements? Brother Winter, please rise and explain this point.

Ugh! what a happy (?) thought that these hands, this face, and all of me shall be naught but food for worms, unless I be incinerated. What is the good of education and all that sort of thing if it is to end in that narrow pit in the earth or a handful of ashes?

I am not yet a Spiritualist—only seeking the light, the truth. "To be or not to be," that's the question that agitates me. W. V. ASPINWALL.

HAVEN, KAN., Feb. 23, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed herewith find $5.25, for which please send me the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1886, and continue sending the paper till May 1, 1888. I hope you will be able to continue the illustrations. If the pictures should continue to be as good during the entire year as they hav been thus far, what an interesting picture book they would make all bound in one volume!

Something that happened here this winter should be a terrible warning to those that are in the habit of attending church Sunday nights, and that is this: A gentleman started with his family to attend church, and they were riding in a farm wagon and sitting in chairs, and, as one of the wagon-wheels passed over an obstruction, the chair in which the gentleman sat tilted to one side and he fell to the ground, his injuries being such that in eight days he died.

This has been the coldest winter ever known here, and great numbers of stock and several persons hav been frozen to death. During one of our coldest days I had several callers, and one of them told the following that happened to some of our neighbors during the cold winter of 1874-75, and which I had never heard before: I was in Michigan to spend that winter. Times were hard, and people had to rustle to get enough to eat, and among other means resorted to was to go on the range and kill buffalo. Three of my neighbors, on such a hunting expedition, were caught in a blizzard and started for home. When about twelve miles from there they became nearly exhausted, and one of them, who is a church-member, proposed that they pray; but instead of agreeing to that one of them commenced cursing and wanted him to keep going, but he was bound to pray, so he knelt down in the snow and commenced praying. The one cursing continued to "cuss," while the third one reached into the wagon (they had to walk to keep from freezing), and got a blacksnake whip and commenced to apply that to the man engaged in prayer, at first lightly, but after more vigorously, until the latter became angry, got up, and began chasing the man with the whip, and thus got warmed up. After that they reached home without further mishap.

I remarked at the time I heard the story, as I looked out the window, "What a bright idea it would be for some one to go out and kneel down on the porch, and pray for this storm to cease!" He would hav frozen to death in a very short time. G. S. BISHOP.

ELKTON, D. T. Feb. 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find three dollars to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. My time was out Jan. 1st, I think, but you, by mistake, put it June. You corrected a mistake to favor me in 1879, and now you may correct this to be just to yourself. I like the illustrations much. The paper illustrates the development theory, for it has steadily grown from good to better all these years, of which I may judge, for I hav taken it from almost its first issue. Then there is a nice mutual property about it—it develops its readers. When I find an old TRUTH SEEKER reader I see at once that he is happy to liv and not afraid to die. An old truth seeker is the happiest being alive—Mrs. Slenker, T. Winter, and the whole TRUTH SEEKER family. This land of homesteads and timber claims is too thinly settled to be worked by Liberal lecturers, and the people too sensible to be caught by the preachers who "tell the old story, ah!"

The sinner harvest in the villages is about over for the season; havn't heard of a catch, though one local editor said "much good was done." Two years ago, in a neighboring village, they "saved" one little girl whose mother had recently died. Too bad, isn't it, that to save a sinner its mother, or husband, or child must be taken away? I read one of Moody's sermons in which seven death-bed scenes were described. I like that better. One can cry, and come to Jesus, and speak in meeting all the same, but, as a matter of fact, there was no orphan, or widow, or childless mother; that was all talk, you know. We who liv out on homesteads hav a more tangible fear of getting "lost" if we go to town to evening meeting than we hav of being "lost" if we stay at home. Elkton has a rink, which means concerts, balls, etc.; a good literary society, a G. A. R. post; so the people get along well without "that consolation naturally arising from a belief in eternal fire."

Well, if Congress won't admit us into the Union, I fear St. Peter won't admit us into heaven, for we are not saved by good works according to Calvin or the Democratic party. Yet I would like to get into the Union by 1888, if so be that Mr. Ingersoll, or Putnam, or Wakeman could be nominated for president. Yours truly, DENNIS JACOBS.

NAPLES, N. Y., March 3, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Abler artists hav attempted to draw Remsburg and failed. I shall not try. He has come and gone, and the people will long hav something to talk and think about.

The Bible, the bed-rock of the old superstition, was fairly left in tatters. The Christian mask which the old idol had so long worn was torn off in the presence of a respectable audience, and, what was worse than all, the Christians cannot talk back. Every nail was driven home and clinched. There is no getting behind his position; it is actually unassailable.

Mr. Remsburg is a great success. He is of good fiber and will last long, and there is a world of work in him, and the Liberals of the country can do no better than to keep him constantly engaged in the work for which he is so admirably adapted. His sturdy blows will ultimately knock superstition into its corner.

I said I would not draw Remsburg. I hav not and I can not; he must be heard to be appreciated. He is gentle and kind in his manner, and though he mangles with unsparing hand the absurdities and barbarisms of the Bible, like a wise physician, he cuts and cauterizes only for the patient's good.

All praise to Remsburg. Friends and brethren, the most acceptable way to do him homage is to keep him constantly engaged in his chosen field, and reward him far more liberally than I was able to do when he was here.

Although the mercury was down to zero, and a howling wind was hurling clouds of snow into the faces of the people, there was a goodly number out, some coming many miles, in spite of the storm.

Let the Liberals turn out whenever Mr. Remsburg moves the sickle in the standing grain. The harvest is abundant, and we shall hav more such workers when they are better rewarded. JOHN PECK.

TROY, N. Y., March 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: If you had been to Troy two weeks ago, you would hav had an opportunity to sail along the streets of that beautiful city.

I expect the Lord thought he would try the faith of his chosen people, and so he sent forth a flood, which entered the cellars, basements, yea, even the second and first stories of several houses, causing the people to flee to the upper chambers, and there to wait for the waters to abate at the word of the Lord. One of the Lord Jehovah's "black-beetles," as Saladin names the ministers, was in the sanctuary of the Lord, probably praying the ruler of all things to spare wicked Troy from a second deluge for the sake of his people. But the Lord heard him not, and the black-beetle was fain to trust his safety in the hands of the brave of his congregation, and be rescued in a boat.

The flood not turning the hearts of the wicked Trojans, as they continued to advertise a lecture by John E. Remsburg, of Kansas, the great Infidel in the Griswold Opera House, the Lord sent fire upon the city. He did not rain down fire from heaven, as of old, but sent his mighty, wind, while the thermometer was below zero, to blow fire from the furnace of a carpenter's shop among some shavings, which soon grew to such an extent that the whole of the northern part of the city was threatened with destruction.

This occurred on February 26th, and had not the brave firemen worked with might and main, instead of praying, the poor city of Troy would hav had much to mourn.

However, there is more trust to be put in the strong and willing hand and heart of a fireman than in all the god almighty's that ever were, are, or ever will be. And so Troy was saved, but not by the God of the black-beetles.

Sunday, February 28th, came, and the winds had abated to such an extent that the Infidels of Troy were able to turn out in good numbers and welcome the "Ingersoll of the West," John E. Remsburg, who lectured on "Bible Morals," in the afternoon, at Keenan Hall, and in the evening, at the Griswold Opera House, on "Sabbath-Breaking."

At the latter place people of all denominations turned out to see and hear what the Infidel had to say. You will be pleased to learn that the Infidels hav some influence in wicked Troy; so much that Mr. Maschke gave a full band free for an hour's concert before the lecture, Mr. Maschke attending himself.

The concert was greatly enjoyed by all present, and the Infidels of Troy fully appreciate the kindness of Mr. Maschke and his whole band for their services. They played as if they were paid, and well paid at that.

When Mr. Remsburg appeared on the stage he was greeted with applause, and held the strictest attention of his audience, although the cold was severe.

Cold as it was, however, the Baptists thought it not too cold to immerse a young lady at their church. When we arrived home, we found a little boy who had been a spectator of this immersion, pale and trembling, afraid to go home, for, said he, "They put her in the water clothes and all, and won't some one please to go home with me?" Of course, his fears were calmed, and he was taken home.

Oh, what a religion, to strike terror to the heart of a young child! How different would the feelings of that young boy hav been had he been listening to the strains of Maschke's band, and heard instead of the minister's plea, "Flee from the wrath to come," the soul-stirring words of John E. Remsburg, of Kansas. JEANNIE ARMSTRONG, Corresponding Secretary of Troy Secular Society.

GARDNER, ILL., March 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find money order to pay on my subscription for the next six months.

After a pretty long interval Gardner had, this week again, the benefit of a (free) Liberal lecture on "Liberty and Morality," delivered by Mr. W. Bell from Chicago. Although Mr. Bell arrived here quite unadvertised, the necessary preliminaries, as hall, defraying of expenses, were quickly settled, and this mainly through the efforts and generosity of two or three friends of the Liberal cause, and the lecturer had the satisfaction to enjoy a full house; and the satisfaction was mutual, as the attention the auditory paid the lecturer from beginning to end clearly proved. A fragmentary excerpt from the lecture would not do it justice, and a more extended one space forbids. May it suffice here to state that Mr. Bell is an effectiv orator, and, although not indulging in high-flying, philosophical phraseology that oftentimes more obscures than enlightens a plain mind, knows how to strike the popular key-note that makes ears and common sense equally vibrate. To infer from the one given to us, a lecture by Mr. Bell cannot but leave a good impression behind. After the close of his lecture Mr. Bell invited ministers or their aunts and cousins to ask questions, raise objections, or take exceptions; and "mum was the order of the day"—probably they "wasn't" there. Guess this is the trouble with our so-called but misnamed ministers of the Lord; though they are always meddling where they are not wanted, like their boss beyond the clouds, they never can be found when they are needed. J. N. STEIMLE.

SAN DIEGO CITY, CAL., Feb. 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The breath of priest is a upas that poisons the whole atmosphere. Where God is liberty is not. For these long years I never hav been able to get a subscriber to your paper that belonged to any secret organization, and hav often been cursed for soliciting it. You must know that Masonry and Odd Fellowship are Siamese twins, begotten by monarchy and nursed in the lap of a priest; that they claim to be divine institutions and the Bible their great light; that the members are creed-fixed and oath-bound; that we often read obituaries of these pious saints that they were devout members of the church, devout Christians and bright examplary Masons, and hoped to meet in the grand lodge above. How then can you expect me (believing the whole thing to be a fraud) to affiliate with such dumb nonsense? I admit there may be Masons better than their oaths and creeds, and that there are thousands of Christians far better than their gods; but I must consider in lump all heathenism.

The grand climax was reached when the Liberals were so bamboozled as to call their organization Secular Union, which means almost anything or nothing, and opened a door broad enough for every nefarious secular priest to enter, and I must believe this was done so that every member of a secret affiliation could claim some self-respect to stand on. Do the owners and controlers of THE TRUTH SEEKER suppose that there are none but fools on this coast? Do you expect me to ligate my tongue, close my eyes, and seal my lips to known iniquity? Do you expect me to go down on my knees at the fulminations of a priest and abjure my individuality? Do you think that one who has studied symptoms for fifty years knows nothing of diagnosis? Do you flatter yourselvs that no one but the sworn initiated knows anything about this modern priestly popery? Do you for a moment conclude that you can destroy all individuality? Do you ask me to affiliate with the huggers and kissers of Bibles when I believe the whole damned thing a heathen fraud to get something for nothing, and further believe that these orders are the makers and supporters of all monopolies, and a general curse to any people? Surely the world is very wicked and foolish yet—on every corner an owl and in every street a priest. Over every temple arch should be written "Slave-pen," and over every church-door engraved "Lunatic Asylum."

I hope you will not consider me a Secularist or a Christian, or a Christian Secularist, or in any way connected with the evident frauds who are fighting for mammon. Out of self-respect I must call myself a Radical, and I must certainly think that every truthful thinker will think and act the same. To me it matters little, to the world much. I am through with gods and popes, but I cannot believe it right to do wrong or refuse to express my honest convictions when called by circumstances to do so, and I grant the same to others. Neither can I consider it necessary for the support of a republic or democracy to veil it in secrecy. I may presume you understand me without more emphasis.

It is to be regretted that religion has ever so disrupted society, that hypocrisy is a birthright and falsehood a peerage. In looking back on my past I must believe that I hav made more enemies in the last year by speaking truthfully of the truth than by all the lies I hav ever told, while on every hand I see canonized fraud deified and truth crucified. Secularists on your side of the divide are making great complaint against non-taxation of church, while the Secularists on this side are making donations to themselvs. One year ago our governor advised a grant of twenty-five thousand dollars, and the legislature voted it to the g—s of the republic to splurge on. Such is Secularism on this coast, and I am forced to believe that government is a fraud, the officials a set of sworn thieves, and the common citizen a fool, dominated by that great monarchical fiend, Masonry, where prayers are a requisit and a priest a necessity; such I consider Secularism. It will now be in place for your popes to read me that merciful prayer in their holy book from off your holy altar, contained in the fifty-ninth psalm, and then to proceed to the maranathema ab aqua et ignis.

ABRAM BRONSON.

MILWAUKEE, OR., Feb. 21, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I do not wish friend Hindman to pay my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I prefer to pay my own. But surely I did prove by geometrical calculation, based upon known facts, that the sun is more than twelve thousand miles from the earth. It is not necessary, to make computations geometrical, that they should be illustrated by diagrams. Diagrams are mere conveniences to assist the memory. The real lines and angles must exist in the mind before they can be represented upon paper.

Mr. Hindman says: "I hav not yet said what I thought was the distance from the earth to the sun." But in his first letter he says: "I claim it can be proved by geometrical calculation that the sun is not over twelve thousand miles from the earth."

The earth is a fact. Its form and size are simple matters of fact and calculation. They are not matters of opinion among intelligent people, but of demonstrated knowledge. No man has a right to call himself a surveyor who does not know approximately the shape and size of the earth. That is all I asked him to admit. I took his claim that the sun was not over twelve thousand miles away, and proved that the statement led to the contradiction of the most obvious facts.

Mr. Hindman objects to the undulatory theory of light. He says: "My philosophy is that light and sight travel at the same speed." He seems to think that, in observing a planet or a star, light starts out from an object and sight from the eye at the same time, and meet each other exactly half-way in the intermediate space.

But his most wonderful piece of information is that "the Pole Star is not visible at a point farther south than forty degrees south latitude," and from that fact (?) he tells us it is easy to compute the distance of the North Star. When Mr. Hindman gets up his diagram, will he please to illustrate how it is that people manage to see the Pole Star through nearly five thousand miles of solid earth when they get to the fortieth parallel south, and how at that point it becomes suddenly invisible? How it is that, as he admits the Pole Star goes down one degree for every degree he goes south, he yet passes over eighty degrees of the earth's surface to bring the Pole Star down forty? Is Mr. Hindman going to repudiate primary arithmetic? Is he trying to fool a simple fellow like me, or does he not really know that the Pole Star is in the horizon at the Equator and not visible south of it? Or, to be more exact, the Pole Star is not exactly at the Pole, but appears to revolve around it at a distance of about a degree and a half, as is explained in every treatis on surveying (in giving instructions how to find the true meridian), and consequently the Pole Star cannot be seen more than a degree and a half south of the Equator.

I assure Mr. Hindman that I hav not aimed any personal irony at him, but almost suspect that he is trying to fool me and some others of your humble readers who are not surveyors and civil engineers, and his proposition to bring out his diagram on the 1st of April rather tends to strengthen the suspicion.

D. PRIESTLEY.

MIDDLEBURY, IND., Feb. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Error is not always crime, for errors in chronology are found in the works of Shakspere, contradictions in Pope and Milton, bad grammar in Byron, and palpable blunders in the writings of almost every classic celebrity, but very seldom do we find anything that bears a comparison with the writings of John Hindman, surveyor and civil engineer, of Elmo, Arkansas. Being a regular reader of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, I cannot refrain from saying a few words to him through its columns. Last December Mr. Hindman requested anyone to show by diagram that the sun is more than 12,000 miles from the earth. He now seems to think that there is no such diagram extant, and he of course regards the figures on the sun's distance as mere guess-work. That there are plenty of diagrams, etc., on the subject we simply refer him to Loomis's Astronomy, pp. 219–221, or Steele's Astronomy, pp. 302–307, where diagrams with complete descriptions of the method of calculating the sun's distance during the transit of Venus may be found. These diagrams, with explanations, would be too lengthy for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER without permission, at least, from its editor. But reference to any of the works of our late astronomers will convince him that there are diagrams that show the method of finding the sun's distance, approximately correct (and he will please remember that that $6 he offers will buy a good work on the subject).

He also claims astronomy to be "guess-work in part," when in fact it is one of the most certain nnd best established of the sciences. Speaking on this point, Steele says: "All its theories and distances are based on the most rigorous mathematical demonstrations." That there are theories not fully established all will admit, but we cannot all admit that "it is reasonable to suppose that the earth would be void of an atmosphere, moving, as it does, at the rate of over 68,000 miles per hour." Can it be possible that friend Hindman does not know that the air has weight? Would not the ocean or the earth itself be as liable to "be left in the wake" as would the atmosphere? It would be easy traveling to go up in a balloon and wait until the earth turned the proper place under us; but the air having weight, it of course revolves with the earth, and no such cyclone as he speaks of is produced. Again, knowing that the atmosphere has the same motion now, around the sun, that the earth has, the earth would be as liable to stop as would the atmosphere. This would be in accordance with Newton's great law of motion that "if a body be in motion it will continue in motion if it be not disturbed by the action of some external force."

Mr. Hindman also says, "My philosophy is that light and sight travel at the same speed." What is sight but the sense of seeing which is produced by the light striking the retina of the eye, the optic nerve then transmitting the vibration to the brain? We really never see an object, but simply see the reflection that the object produces on the retina of the eye. Indeed, the optic nerve itself is insensible to light, so sight exists only in the brain, and does not travel at all. Or, if we call it sensation, it would only travel about 100 feet per second, while light goes about 186,000 miles in the same time. But Mr. Hindman evidently does not believe that light travels, although the discovery was made 269 years ago. Before 1617 it was considered instantaneous, but Roemer, an eminent Danish astronomer, accidentally made the discovery, when engaged in a series of observations on one of the moons of Jupiter. This moon in a certain part of its path becomes eclipsed to an observer on the earth, in consequence of passing behind its planet. Knowing that the revolution of the moon must be performed in the same time, Roemer supposed that the intervals between these invisible periods would, of course, be uniform. To his surprise he found that they differed a little every time, increasing for six months (at the expiration of which the eclipse was 16 minutes later than at first), and then decreasing at the same rate for a similar period, till at the end of a year he found the interval the same as at first. The conclusion was inevitable. The discrepancy was caused by the difference in the earth's distance. If the first observation was made when the earth was at that point of her orbit which was nearest to Jupiter, six months afterward she would be at the most distant point; and the light from Jupiter's moon would hav to travel the whole distance across the orbit (about 186,000,000 miles) farther than before. Here was the key to a grand discovery which immortalizes the name of Roemer. If light was 16 minutes, or 960 seconds, in traveling 186,000,000 miles, it was easy to find how far it travels in 1 second.

Our friend also says that the North Star is not seen south of 40° south latitude. He admits the fact that when we travel north one degree the North Star seems to rise one degree. Now, the North Pole points within $1\frac{1}{2}$ degrees of Polaris, and if we were at the North Pole the North Star would be nearly directly overhead. Starting from the pole and going 90 degrees south, we would, of course, be at the equator, while the North Star would always appear in the horizon. Hence, as he claims it can be seen 40° south of the equator, he is just 40°, or 2,780 miles, from "the facts." Or if he is right, the equator is 48° south latitude; and 40° plus 90° = 130° = 1 quadrant or 520° in one circle, instead of 360°, which is always used.

Indeed, "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing," and we can but think that Mr. Hindman's opinions are mostly formed from some of the musty old compositions of man, and not from the grand and endless book of Nature, whose contents were written by Nature herself in indelible characters which no man can forge or obliterate, and the pages of which are equally open and free to all. Referring to one more "point" in Mr. Hindman's last letter, we will close by first asking the editor to pardon the length of this communication. Among the things that he "is loth" to believe, we find that light requires 60,000 years to reach us from some of the distant stars, when in all probability there are stars or suns in the far-off regions of space whose light has not yet reached our planet, although they may hav existed countless millions of years; and may there not be others so distant that their light can never reach our earth on account of intervening globes or the resistance of that subtil ether, of the existence of which we are certain, although its immeasurable tenuity precludes all possibility of discovery? Indeed, would not this all be in harmony with the fact that the only limits to the grand and magnificent operations of nature are endless eternity and unbounded space?

M. R. TEESDALE.

WAYNESBURG, March 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: My uncle, Henry Luse, died of pneumonia at his house near Clarkesville, Pa., Jan. 27, 1886, being nearly fifty-six years old. He was an honest, intelligent man, well respected by those who knew him. He was the dupe of no superstition, but tested whatever presented itself to his mind in the crucible of reason. His father was a Freethinker, and impressed upon his mind the importance of honest investigation as a means of intelligent belief. This early privilege of using his reason as the best guide, along with an inherited spirit of independence, soon led him to reject the popular faith, and defy the contumely of fanatical believers. He battled for more than a quarter of a century in the cause of mental emancipation. How thoroughly he was imbued with the importance of untrammeled investigation may be seen in a provision of his will which directs that his children shall hav free access to the important works on both sides of all social, political, scientific, and religious problems. He knew that there was a possibility of his being wrong, and he was anxious that his children should not follow in his footsteps until convinced that they led in the right direction. He had no evidence of a future life, and believed in none; yet he passed calmly and peacefully into the unknown realm without fear, enjoying the conscious satisfaction of having acted, while living, according to his highest conception of right. His death was a calm, quiet, powerful refutation of the priestly wail, "It will do to liv by, but it won't do to die by." It will do to die by. The Christian's whole life is a direct preparation for death, but, alas! when he comes to die he realizes the vagueness and uncertainty of the faith which he has fostered so long, and gleans but little satisfaction from reflecting that the chief aim of his life has been to gain a happy death. The Secularist livs to make himself and others happy while here, and thus indirectly prepares himself for a peaceful ending. An unclouded conscience is the healing balm of death.

H. CLAY LUSE.

QUITMAN, Mo., Jan. 27, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Last night I attended church. Now, don't infer from this that I don't attend church, for I attend quite frequently. But, as a revival is in progress at this place, and a few sinners hav begun to think they are in need of salvation, I thought I would write of my last night's experience. Perhaps it might be well enough to say that I hav had considerable experience since I hav been the principal of the public schools here.

At the time Mr. Jamieson and Miss Gardener were here there were many people much grieved to know that their "professor was a wicked Infidel," and very recently our experience with the school board was that Infidels could no longer teach school in Quitman. But to my experience last night.

The preacher took his text from Gal. vi, 7–8, "What a man soweth, that shall he also reap," etc. I knew what was coming, and I was in no way disappointed. After discoursing on Infidelity in general and to their humble servant in particular for about an hour, the man of God called for sinners to come to the sinners' bench and mourn. Although feeling myself somewhat of a sinner, I had not lost anything to mourn over, so I did not mourn.

They succeeded in getting a couple of "mourners;" then, after considerable singing and praying, the preacher asked for those to stand to their feet who wished the prayers of the Christians. There were only two forsaken-looking males arose, and one of these had whipped his wife that morning. Then all those in the congregation were requested to stand who would pray for the penitents at seven o'clock the next morning. A few of the saints arose. The minister then made the startling announcement that God had been with us. You may imagin that I felt somewhat queer, as I never expected to sit in the same audience with Jehovah.

I looked about me to see if I could get sight of the God who authorized slavery, waged wars of conquest, and commanded the slaughter of women and children, but, not seeing any one whom I could think would resemble that old worthy, and remembering that "had been" was in the past perfect tense, I just took his word for it that he "had been there," knowing from the sermon that had been preached that the good pastor would make no misstatements. Upon the whole, I thought the entertainment very good, considering that, for once, no collection was taken up, making salvation free. But, I thought, if people acted in Paul's time as they do now, it was no wonder the old saint was constrained to say: "We are fools for Christ's sake."

NEW LONDON, CONN., Feb. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Find $1, for which please send me one copy each of the "Christian Religion," by Ingersoll, and "Men, Women, and Gods," by Helen Gardener. I wish everybody on earth would read Helen Gardener's book. If that could be done you would see superstition leaving. The only objection I hav ever heard to her book was by a good, pious soul that my wife loaned it to. She soon returned it and said she did not think that woman was very smart to try to tell older people than herself what to believe. My wife is in a fair way to recover from the shock.

J. W. STORRS.

SOIO, O., March 6, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Charles Watts delivered two lectures in this place on Thursday and Friday evenings, March 4th and 5th. The subjects on which he spoke were "Secularism: Destructiv and Constructiv," and "Unbelief: Its Nature and Service to Mankind." Mr. Watts had a large and appreciativ audience to hear him on both evenings. As an evidence of his success, I might state that everybody who heard him the first night came back the second, and many brought their friends along. Mr. Watts's lectures are on a high plane of morality. They are extremely logical, delivered in an eloquent manner, and his friends and foes alike praise him for the spirit of fairness which is manifest in everything he utters. The Liberals of this locality may fairly claim as a result of these lectures that they now occupy higher ground in public favor, and the orthodox portion of our community will respect us and our opinions more than they hav heretofore been in the habit of doing. The appearance of some of the church-members while listening to the fair and unanswerable argument of Mr. Watts reminded us of a very young boy smoking a very strong cigar.

Let us hope that such lectures will soon cease to shock their nerves, and that they will eventually take to Secularism as kindly as they now accept the results of the antislavery movement, which they even more vehemently denounced. Man speed the day when the new philosophy will reach the understanding of the priest-ridden people of our land. If we had enough men like Mr. Watts to teach Secularism we might soon clean up the fading shadows of Christian theology and carry the war into Africa.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Nutting.

Dear Memory, swing thy censer now,
Let purple incense rise;
The desert sands hav ceased to flow,
Time's heavy hand has left my brow,
The present from me flies.

Back, back to childhood's happy years,
So full of joys, so free from fears
I stand a child to-day;
Sweet, sunny visions, simple, fair,
Touching as some old cradle air,
Hav swept all care away.

The hill tops wear a hazy look;
The Indian summer's here,
The voices of the crystal brook,
Creeping along each pebbly nook,
Are chiming softly clear.

On everything a dreamy haze
Is resting like a veil;
The idle oxen cease to graze,
And, in a lazy sort of maze,
They roam the pasture dale.

My mother says, "Your tasks perform
With careful hands and fast,
The day is very fine and warm,
We'll go beyond the upper farm
To get our winter's mast."

O joy! the nimble fingers fly,
The work is all complete;
We call to her with gladsome cry
To see and praise our industry,
That wrought the toil so fleet.

We climb the stony brookside path
With footsteps tripping light,
We pass the hermit's lonely hearth,
To where the noisy stream in wrath
Falls like a torrent quite.

Across the pretty forest glade
We hasten on our way,
To find the beech-trees' thicker shade
Beyond the talked of railroad grade,
Where sunbeams scarcely play.

Oh, see! here on the leafy floor
The wealth of nuts so brown,
Yet still, to hav a richer store,
My brother climbs to harvest more,
And shakes them tumbling down.

The squirrels chatter saucily,
And scamper right and left;
A gray one talks with sanctity
About the sin of robbery,
And charges us with theft.

At last we're tired; a pleasant sound
Falls restful on our ears;
It is the cry of "Homeward bound."
We leave the charming nutting-ground,
And leave the charming years.

Denver, Col. MRS. BUCKNER-JOHNSON.

A Ride Over the Rocky Mountains.

Being out of employment, I, in company with a friend (a conductor), secured passage and started for the far West, to find work and to "grow up with the country." On the mountain division of one of the Pacific railroads we found what we were seeking, and reported for duty. We were sent a trip over the mountains to learn the road before being entrusted with a train. From where we got on board to the summit, a distance of thirty miles, the grade is so heavy that the huge engins that could on ordinary lines draw 150 cars can only take from four to seven cars. Every few miles there are safety switches, to catch runaway cars, or those that may break from a train and go plunging down the mountain side.

On mounting the engin, I was surprised to find it in charge of an old friend, who remarked, when he learned the object of my trip, that he could show me more road in less time than I had ever seen before. This remark did in no wise tend to make me more comfortable, for, although he was a good man and an able driver, he had lost his position where I had first known him for doing some very reckless work, and among his friends (the engineers) it was said that his home was in the ditch.

The road winds along the side of the mountain under overhanging ledges of rock, across trestles which span the ravines; then along the edge of some dark dismal gorge, where, hundreds of feet below, the bottom is strewn and piled with masses of rocks, and where no flower ever blooms, no ray of sunlight ever penetrates. I had had experience on rough roads; had sat on my engin and it almost on its end; had been mixed up with box cars, floating ice, and bridge timbers; had been on colliding steamboats, and stood by and worked the engins with the water waist-deep on the deck, and I will say that I had never been so filled with awe as on this morning of my first ride over the Rocky Mountains. When we arrived at the summit we took on several more cars, and commenced the descent with quite a long train. The conductor, three brakemen, the mountain brakeman,* and my friend were on the top, clinging to the brakes, the engineer working steam every foot of the way.

I expected him to shut off the steam and put the reverse lever in the back motion, or, by using the powerful air-brake with which these engins are fitted, try to control its speed. But no, there he sat as unconcerned as though at home in the midst of his family, while his fireman, an Irish boy with a brogue that would hang a man, was singing "Sewal and McClosky," while I—well, I was lost; and when, a few minutes later, we went rushing out upon the highest trestle in the United States (that across the O'Kief Canyon, which is about three hundred feet high, is built on a curve, and in which the largest timber is but eight inches square) at the rate of thirty-five miles per hour, I felt homesick. When we reached the division station I had a talk with my friend (the conductor), the result of which was that he telegraphed over the hill for two passes, and when the express pulled out of that station that evening it carried as passengers what the mountain men were pleased to call two first-class prairie men. Reverie.

The morning hours of cheerful light
Of all the day are best,
And as we speed our hasty flight,
If every hour be spent aright,
We sweetly sink to sleep at night,
And pleasant is our rest.

And life is like a summer's day,
It seems so quickly past;
Youth is the morning bright and gay,
And if 'tis spent in wisdom's way,
We meet old age without dismay,
And death is sweet at last. —Selected.

There are some people who believe
That all mankind are sprung from Eve,
And some may think our Palindrome
Requires just one in Eden's home;
But fables false can scarce excuse
The posers who such fictions use.
From whom then came these various races,
Diverse in form, hue, mind, and faces?
The truth and Palindrome require
That we should mark the number higher,
Say, two, three, four, five, six, or seven;
Nor mind "the book that came from heaven."

Correspondence.

ARLINGTON, NEB., March 2, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines. My pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Children's Corner very much. I am ten years old. I go to school and read in the Fourth Reader. Mamma bought the "Story Hour" for me. The stories in it are all nice, and I like to read them very much. It is time for me to close.

Yours truly, JUSTIN J. HAMMER.

LOGANSPORT, IND., Feb. 29, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I would like to take my seat in the Children's Corner again. I begin to feel at home there. My mamma says that there is a great fuss made about the new pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but they say nothing about the Children's Corner, and she thinks it is doing more good than the pictures, for it is making the children feel as if they had something to say in the paper, too. I am ten years old and I read the Children's Corner. With best regards, I remain Your little friend, DELIA STOLL.

LINDSAY, ONT., Feb, 16, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As it is about three months since I wrote to you, I thought I would write again, as my last letter appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I received the Calendar, for which accept my thanks. It is quite a curiosity. I liv on a farm, about three miles out of Lindsay, which is a town of about six thousand inhabitants. Pa exchanges THE TRUTH SEEKER with Mr. Goodwin, of Lindsay, for the Investigator. Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I can remember. I am fourteen years old to-day, and a stormy day it is. I am in the Fourth Reader, and study geography, grammar, history, drawing, arithmetic. I hav two miles to go to school. I hav a nice teacher. I obtained the highest number of marks in my class last month. GEO. M. BATESON.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., March 6, 286.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you, because you said that every one was welcome to the Children's Corner. I do not know what I should do if we did not take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think the illustrations are grand. The Jonah pictures are very funny. Those on the front side are splendid; right to the point.

I think our grown up folks "sass" each other quite too much through THE TRUTH SEEKER. As M. S. Gowin says, in a recent letter to it: "We hav enough to do to fight the enemy—superstition." I hav one of your books, "The Story Hour," and am very much pleased with it, and a little Liberal friend of mine (Nellie Bedel) had the other, "Apples of Gold," and we exchanged books, and each of us was very much pleased with the other's. Inclosed find a puzzle. I did it myself.

I think the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC, is good—better than the one before. "The Curate of Churnside" is a splendid story. But I guess I will close now, as my letter is getting rather long. I am keeping this letter a secret. No one, father or mother, will know of it till they see it in the paper.

Yours for liberty, science, and humanity in the place of slavery, theology, and God.

LYLE GAULT.

[We are glad to hear from Lyle. He is a boy of the right stamp.—ED. C. C.]

UNION STAR, MO., Feb. 28, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and like it very much. Papa has taken it ever since I can remember. I read the Children's Corner with pleasure. I thought I would try and write you a letter, if I can interest you, as I don't see many little boys in the Correspondence. I liv on a farm one mile from Union Star (a little town situated on the C. B. & Q. R. R.). I hav one sister and one brother, older than I am; we all go to school in town. We do not farm any. Papa is a lawyer, has his office in town, so we rent the farm. I hav never tried plowing yet as I hav not been old enough. I must tell you about a little religious disturbance which occurred in our village last week. There came along a minister who professed to be sanctified. This did not suit the religion of the trustees' so they locked the doors of the church on him (although the people were eager to hear him). It raised a dispute between the people, and made hard feelings all around. Of course he is a "crank," but I think he should hav had his rights. Well, I will close, as I am afraid of wearying you with such a long letter. If this is printed I will try and write a more interesting letter next time. I remain, Yours truly,

CHARLEY BOONE.

P.S.—I would like to correspond with some of the little boys and girls. C. B.

WESTFORD, CONN., Feb. 12, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I see so many little correspondents in the Children's Corner, I thought I would write a few lines to you. I liv on a farm in Westford near the town of Ashford, Conn. I am ten years old and this is my first letter. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I love to read the Children's Corner. If you think this worth publishing I will try and write again.

Yours respectfully, NETTIE CADY.

MEMPHIS, N. Y., Feb. 21, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My grandfather takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read the Children's Corner every week. Grandfather said he would like me to write a letter for the paper. I am eight years old, but thought I would try and do as well as the other children.

I go to school, and will tell you what I study. I study geography, spelling, arithmetic, and read in a Fourth Reader and Monteith's "Popular Science Reader." We liv beside grandfather. Father works his land. We liv on one farm, and grandfather and grandmother on the other. I think a great deal of them, and hav good times with them. We all hav very pleasant homes, near the cars, and we are situated pleasantly. I hav a nice organ, and enjoy playing on it. I am learning to work, so I can help grandmother sometime. I am the only child in the family, but I do wish I had a little brother or sister. But I hav to take up with my doll. It is as big as a little baby I saw the other day.

Good-bye. I wonder how this will look printed. Grandfather will laugh. From Poetry.

Our Minister's Sermon.

The minister said last night, says he,
"Don't be afraid of givin';
If your life ain't worth nothin' to other folks,
Why, what's the use of livin'?"
And that's what I say to my wife, says I,
There's Brown, the miserable sinner,
He'd sooner a begger would starve than giv
A cent toward buyin' a dinner.

I tell you our minister's prime, he is.
But I couldn't quite determin,
When I heard him givin' it right and left,
Just who was hit by his sermon.
Of course, there couldn't be no mistake
When he talked of long-winded prayin',
For Peters and Johnson they sot and scowled
At ever word he was sayin'.

And the minister went on to say,
"There's various kinds of cheatin',
And religion's as good for every day
As it is to bring to a meetin'.
I don't think much of that man that givs
The loud Amens to my preachin',
And spends his time the followin' week
In cheatin' and overreachin'."

I guess that dose was bitter enough
For a man like Jones to swallow;
But I noticed he didn't open his mouth,
Not once, after that, to holler;
Hurrah, says I, for the minister—
Of course I said it quiet—
Giv us some more of this open talk,
It's very refreshin' diet.

The minister hit 'em every time;
And when he spoke of fashion,
And riggin's out in bows and things,
As woman's rulin' passion,
And comin' to church to see the styles,
I couldn't help a winkin'
And a-nudgin' my wife, and says I, "That's you."
And I guess it sot her thinkin'.

Says I to myself that sermon's pat,
But man is a queer creation,
And I'm much afraid that most of the folks
Won't take the application.
Now, if he had said a word about
My personal mode of sinnin',
I'd hav gone to work to right myself,
And not set there a grinnin'.

Just then the minister, says he,
"And now I've come to the fellers
Who've lost this shower by usin' their friends
As a sort of moral umbrellas.
Go home," says he, "and find your faults,
Instead of huntin' your brothers',
Go home," says he, "and wear the coats
You tried to fit for others."

My wife she nudged, and Brown he winked,
And there were lots o' smilin',
And lots o' lookin' at our pew—
It sot my blood a-bilin'.
Says I, to myself, our minister
Is gettin' a little bitter;
I'll tell him, when the meetin's out, that I
Ain't at all that kind of a critter!

Book Notices.

BACON AND SHAKSPERE. Proof that William Shakspere could not write. The Sonnets written by Francis Bacon to the Earl of Essex and his Bride, A.D. 1590. Bacon identified as the Concealed Poet, Ignoto, A.D. 1589–1600. By W. H. Burr. Price 25 cents. For sale by the Truth Seeker Co.

With the world in general we hav admired and revered William Shakspere as the greatest and most wonderful writer that ever lived. We hav bowed before the shrine of his grand intellect—supposed to be his—and been swayed and lifted by the wonderful music of the song of human nature as translated by a genius as great as it is remarkable and glorious. But now Mr. William Henry Burr comes out and says that the one we hav worshiped and glorified "wasn't him at all;" that the real Shakspere could not write, and apparently brings proof enough to substantiate all he says in his bright little pamphlet of 48 pages. Of course, if Shakspere could not write, he did not write the sonnets or the plays either that are attributed to him.

Now, it is dreadful to hav our idol popped off his pedestal at one fell blow, and we do not like to hav it done. But still, if he does not belong on that particular post, he ought to go.

Mr. Burr does not speak without conviction and positiv proof supporting all he says. He brings the proofs of Shakspere's apparent inability as a writer, and in his place he sets Francis Bacon. His arguments on Bacon's side are very ingenious, and bear the stamp of truth and correctness, but at the same time we must say that Bacon's essays and other writings are different. They lack the glory of Shakspere's productions. We believe in William Henry Burr emphatically and always, but we are hardly willing, even in face of the facts that Mr. Burr brings, to giv up our Shakspere yet, and shall look forward to the coming book of Mr. Burr with great interest, with its other facts and details of the case under consideration. Everybody should get the pamphlet (only 25 cents) and read and understand for themselvs. Mr. Burr is a thorough worker and accomplished scholar and historian, and all that he writes is valuable and instructiv reading.

SOCIAL WEALTH: The Sole Factors and Exact Ratios in Its Acquirement and Apportionment. By J. K. Ingalls. 12mo, cloth, pp. 320. New York: The Truth Seeker Co., 33 Clinton Place.

"Social Wealth," by J. K. Ingalls, is evidently the result of profound investigation, careful reading, and deep thought. It embodies the most advanced ideas in economics that hav yet developed in orderly and accredited form. The theories of Mr. Ingalls's predecessors in the science of which he is the latest exponent are discussed severally, emphatically, and at tolerable length. Chief among these are Henry George, Ricardo, McLeod, and Mallock; but scores of allusions to the writings of authors less prominent than these show Mr. Ingalls's perfect familiarity with the literature of his subject.

Of course "capitalistic aggrandizement" forms the keynote of the book. Equally of course its motiv is the denouncing of the special legislation and class rule under which such aggrandizement steadily increases, and the remedy proposed for all the evil that arises from it is the redistribution of land. Not the laborer's lack of success, but his lack of opportunity to be successful, is the burden of Mr. Ingalls's protest against the existing state of things. Nor is this the only position he holds in common with Mr. George. The latter's theory that "occupying ownership" should be the only synonym for possession meets with unqualified approval from Mr. Ingalls. He would make possession in the sense of occupany ten points of the law instead of nine, the form in which that proverb is considered by most people radical enough. To bring this Utopian state of things about, in which every man should till his own allotment of the soil, and an Arcadian abundance and simplicity should reign over the United States of America, Mr. Ingalls would repeal at once all laws relating to the tenure of land, to take effect at the expiration of a term of years, or of the lives of the present holders, when Mr. Ingalls would make all land not actually occupied and used by its owner forfeit to the people. In addition this author favors the repeal of all laws discriminating against the worker, so that his "actual ownership" in that which he has produced may be allowed to come into operation.

Of an entirely different nature from "Social Wealth" is "Rational Communism," by "A Capitalist," though looking to the same end of beneficence to humanity. This author is strongly of the opinion that Communism is the rational, practical, and probable form of future social life. His book opens with a detailed account of a vision in which the New York of the future was revealed to the "Capitalist," who was suspended during the revolution somewhere above it. The transformation is graphically and enthusiastically recounted. Not only Gotham but the Gothamites are transfigured in the vision, and the happiness and content that reign over the scene where misery and vice so successfully contend for present supremacy is presented with the vivid pen of an idealist reveling joyously through his castles in the air. Silvery lakes bear the usual precious happy human freight, woodland echoes wake to the customary joyous laugh of youth and gladness, and the golden sunlight slants down upon the simple scene as it is invariably known to do.

There are no churches in this new Eden, even as there were none in the old. They are shown to be not only superfluous but somewhat injurious to public morality. The highways and byways are constructed on broad and liberal principles. Shade-trees deck them all, and everywhere blooms a profusion of flowers. The wharves are newly built and the government newly regulated. Here and there are noted the ancient sites of the nineteenth-century "schools of spoliation," chiefly situate, it may be gathered, upon Wall street, where men were wont to ruin their neighbors under the curious "private property" system.

The vision extends to Long Island and thence over the whole continent. Everywhere the results of Communistic living are the same. Everywhere utility and beauty and the common interest are supreme.

The author draws some startling contrasts between the actual and the possible in the chapter devoted to the "Present External Appearance of Our Republic," and discusses within certain limitations Mr. Spencer's views as to individual progress. Here he makes the somewhat needless assertion thas he diverges from this philosopher even as the North Pole from the South. Nobody who is privileged to read his book would for an instant accuse these authors of similarity in their views.—Washington Post.

Obituary.

Mr. Dennis Chidester finished his earth-life at his home in Bangor, Mich., Feb. 19, 1886, at the age of sixty-three years. Mr. C. was widely known among the progressiv minds in this part of the state. He was a Spiritualist, still could tolerate those who lacked the evidence of a continued existence.

An uncompromising foe to superstition, always standing firm for the right, the public has lost an honest member, the wife a kind husband, the children a loving father. The last sad rites were conducted by the Masonic order, of which he was an honored member.

It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

A SEVENTEEN-YEAR-OLD boy at Osage Mission, Kan., last week killed his father, mother, sister, and brother with a hatchet and a knife.

CHIEF MAHEDY, of the Fourth Battalion of the New York fire department, lost his life in a collision while going to a fire on the 12th inst.

THE art collection of the late Mary Jane Morgan, of New York, has just been sold at public auction. The proceeds amounted to $1,207,052.

PAT FORD and John Murphy were hanged for murder at New Orleans on the 12th. They had managed to procure poison from some source, and both were carried to the gallows unconscious.

MR. O. A. BABEL, a wild cowboy from Texas, is surprising New York audiences by his skill as a pianist. He has never received any instruction, but his execution is pronounced marvelous.

TWENTY Methodist missionaries who hav been in training for a few weeks, preparatory to attacking the heathen on the Congo in Africa, are about to start for that land of malaria and cannibals.

MASKED robbers overpowered and killed a messenger and robbed a safe of $20,000 on the express train between Joliet and Morris, Ill. Two men suspected of the crime hav been arrested at Joliet.

THE postmaster-general has received a letter from Cheyenne City, Wyoming, in which the writer confesses to thefts committed by himself twenty years ago. The writer signs himself "A Christian."

THE fund for Mrs. Hancock is about $41,000. It excites some remark that neither Mrs. Grant nor Mrs. Garfield has subscribed to the fund, though both hav been objects of public solicitude and are now wealthy.

THE Willard House in Washington has been connected by a new kind of telephone with an office in New York. The distance between the two cities is 228 miles, but conversation can easily be carried on from one to the other.

THE Ministers' Association at Minneapolis, Minn., recently passed resolutions to withdraw their patronage from all newspapers published on Sunday. Their action has not as yet had the effect of stopping the publication of any Sunday papers.

THE Cunard steamer Oregon collided with an unknown schooner near this port last Sunday, and sank in sixty feet of water. All her passengers and crew were saved. The schooner went down with all on board. The Oregon was valued at $1,250,000.

MR. PEOK, commissioner of statistics of labor, says that the street-car drivers hav more grievances to complain of than any other body of workmen, and that the "most illiberal, unjust, and tyrannical" manager in New York state is Deacon Richardson, of Brooklyn.

PASTORS White and Bristor, both under a cloud charged with criminal assault upon young girls, hav retired temporarily from the bright sunlight of publicity. Nine out of twelve of Pastor White's jury took the ground that the relations between him and his victim were reciprocal, and Pastor Bristor is running about loose pending a motion of his counsel for change of venue.

THE evangelical ministers of Boston and vicinity last Monday invited George E. McNeill, district secretary of the Knights of Labor, to address them upon the subject, "The Knights of Labor and the Labor Question." Mr. McNeill told the clergymen in effect that he was glad to see them waking up on this topic of the day, as for the past twenty years they had been dumb on questions touching human welfare.

Odds and Ends.

WHEN dollars and religion are mixed together in business, the dollars always come to the top.

"MY motto is, 'Liv and let liv,'" said the soldier, as he turned his back to the enemy and fled from the battle-field.

AT a recent church entertainment in Surrey, England, the following item was seen on the program: "MISS FISHER—'Put me in my little bed,' accompanied by the cnrate."

A DAILY newspaper has been started in Greenland. During the year when the days are three months long, the editor doesn't get down to the office until three weeks after breakfast, and stops work two months before sundown.

A TEXAS clergyman, about to be appointed chaplain of the penitentiary, preached a farewell sermon to his congregation, who had treated him rather badly. He selected the following text: "I go to prepare a place for you, so that where I am ye may be also."

IN reply to the New England lecturer who asks "What does a man owe his neighbors?" we can say only that it depends on whether his wife is one of those women who are always running over to the next house to borrow a cup of sugar, or an egg, or a wad of lard.

TEACHER: "Miss Sinnico, please parse the sentence, 'Adolphus married Caroline.'" Miss Sinnico: "Well, 'Adolphus' is a noun, because it is the name of a thing; 'married' is a conjunction because it joins Adolphus and Caroline, and 'Caroline' is a verb, 'cause it governs the noun."

IT was a small boy from down in Maine who, visiting his Boston relativs lately, was asked about his school, his progress in his classes, etc. "I can't thpel worth a thent," said the Maine youngster, "and tho I hav to thtay at the foot, but [very proudly] I've got the biggetht feet in the clath!"

SAMPLE STREET GREETINGS.

"Well, how are you?"
"Well. How are you?"
"Well. How are the folks?"
"Well. How are yours?"
"Well. Cold enough?"
"Well, I should smile."
"Well, so long."
"Well, good-by."

ONE of the finest qualities of "Red-Handed Rufe," or any other wild, Western hero who whacks bulls, scalps Indians, writes poetry, and goes play-actin' on the stage, is his ability to drop slang and adopt fine talk when he shifts from the commonplace to the "pothetic." "Waugh!" says the scout, patting old Killsure as he cut another notch in the stock, "thar's another blank blanked greaser wiped out, an' thar's anotherun agoin' to foller him right soon. Dod rot my eternal feelins ef I ain't goin' to foller this hyar trail tell it ends in a pool of blood. Fur I wasn't allus jest this way, stranger; but when the dog-blamed skunks run away weth the gal I cottoned to, the purest, loveliest being that ever robed her womanhood with the beauty of the angels, I wrote her name across me heart, and with a pen of iron burnt R-r-revenge above it! And the sighing night-winds wandering with complaining cadences through the swaying pines, the murmuring streams that go singing down in the sunless shadows of the mighty canyons, and the storms that shriek and roar through forest and ravine, ever and always sing to me the one unchanging theme, Amita and Revenge. Waugh!"

"CAN I tell when the millennium will come," my son? Indeed I can. It won't come at all. You can just stake your happiness on that. The millennium doesn't come to us; we go to the millennium or we don't, as the case may be, but in any event it won't come to us. I think I hav known some people who hav already walked in the first years of it, and I know some men who, if they lived for ten million years, would never catch up with it, or, if they did, they'd dive clear under it.

THE Minneapolis Tribune says: The telegraph recently apprised us of the remarkable fact that a matron in Valladolid had given birth to seven babies—three pairs of twins and one to carry, as it were. Our poet happened to see the article, and burst forth into a verse as follows:

A man down Valladolid,
Longed and yearned for a promising kid,
When his wife gave him seven
He shouted "Great heaven!
Maria, just see what you've did!"

I'm glad it is going, its blowing and snowing,
Its cold waves and blizzards, its ices and frosts;
For it all there's no knowing just what I am owing,
'Tis only a youngster can guess what it costs.
For midwinter sleighing comes higher than Maying,
A sail on the river costs less than a ball.
When the opera's playing the fiddler you're paying,
But a picnic in August costs nothing at all.
I'm tired of its dancing, its lancers and prancing,
Its "Tuesdays," "At homes," and its "Five o'clock teas,"
Its social romancing, its gossip entrancing,
I sigh for the desert, to liv as I please.
And now I affirm it, and time will confirm it,
I'm so tired and poor that my sins I'll repent,
And I'll be, as they term it, a pious old hermit—
The holiest man on the earth—during Lent.

THE following very good story is told as having actually occurred in a Sunday-school on the east side in this village. Of course, as Professor Sheppard would say, the point of the story could not be applied to any good Samaritan in Saratoga. It might do in Schenectady or Amsterdam, or possibly in Albany. The teacher was testing her small pupils as to their understanding of what constituted a good Christian, when one of them, whom we will call Avery, with his face aglow with knowledge struggling for expression, ejaculated: "Say, teacher, I know who is a good Christian." "Well," replied the teacher, "who is a good Christian?" "Caley M——!" he replied with emphasis. "Well, tell us why you think he is a good Christian," said the teacher. "'Cos whenever he has anything he don't want he givs it to me!"

RELIGIONS are dying all around us, but out of their ashes will rise the spirit of brotherhood which shall unlock the shackles of creeds, and unite the people of the earth in a common bond of sympathy and love.—D. M. Bennett.

O DEATH! the poor man's dearest friend,
The kindest and the best!
Welcome the hour my aged limbs
Are laid with thee at rest.
The great, the wealthy fear thy blow
From pomp and pleasure torn,
But oh! a blest relief to those Who, weary-laden, mourn. —Burns.

WHATEVER may be the case respecting the alleged decline of individuality, and the increasing tyranny of custom, there can, at all events, be no doubt that in religious matters public opinion is constantly becoming more liberal. The legal penalties which our ignorant and intolerant ancestors inflicted upon whoever differed from themselvs, are now some of them repealed, and some of them obsolete. Not only hav we ceased to murder or torture those who disagree with us, but, strange to say, we hav even recognized their claim to political rights as well as to civil equality. . . We hav, therefore, every reason to congratulate ourselvs on having outlived the reign of open persecution. We may fairly suppose that the cruelties which our forefathers committed in the name of religion could not now be perpetrated, and that it would be impossible to punish a man merely because he expressed notions which the majority considered to be profane and mischievous.—Buckle's Essays.

WELL, suppose life be a desert? There are halting-places, and shades, and refreshing waters; let us profit by them to-day. We know that we must march on when to-morrow comes, and tramp on our destiny onward.—Thackeray.

TAKE, therefore, no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. —Matt. v, 34.

AND lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, O. V.; and bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one, N. V.—Matt. vi, 13.

SATAN was a personage of supreme importance with the old church fathers, as indeed he still is with no small numbers of modern theologians. They saw him and his bad influence everywhere, as they are still seen by multitudes. Hence the incredibly superstitious notions which the same fathers held respecting the actual present exercise of diabolical agency in their own day, and in some cases, as they believed, under their own eyes. Any one may see the evidence of this by referring to an easily accessible book, Conyers Middleton on the Miraculous Powers, in which is shown, by the citation of their words, that the fathers held the belief in Satan in the most gross and superstitious form. They make statements on the subject which are incredible, and could only proceed from ignorant and inconsiderate men. As a matter of course the Greek fathers read the Lord's Prayer by the lurid light of such ideas. . . But these same fathers were not infallible. They were very much the contrary, and the probablity is, when all the considerations bearing upon the subject are duly weighed, that the fathers were wrong, and that they were simply misled to interpret the words as they did by the superstition of their times, the burden of which weighed so heavily on themselvs. —G. Vance Smith.

[NOTE.—We hav got a little beyond being very curious about the curing of epileptics, demoniacs, lunatics, or about casting devils out of Magdalenes or into swine, but Middleton's works divided public attention with the early volumes of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall," and they are still worth reading by those who hav a taste for antiquarian inquiries. Chambers's Encyclopedia says of them, "All Middleton's pamphlets, treatises, etc., were collected and published under the title of 'Miscellaneous Works' (4 vols, London, 1752-1757), and contain much that is curious and valuable on theological and antiquarian topics."—C.J.

IF thou art worn and hard beset
With sorrow, that thou wouldst forget;
If thou wouldst read a lesson, that will keep
Thy heart from fainting and thy soul from sleep,
Go to the woods and hills! No tears
Dim the sweet look that nature wears.
—Longfellow.

IF we make our belief in the doctrin of the immortality of the soul depend upon assertions contained in books regarded as sacred, it will follow that whenever these books lose their influence, the doctrin will be in peril. The basis being impaired, the superstructure will tumble. It may well be that, in the march of ages, every definit and written creed now existing is destined to die out, and to be succeeded by better ones. The world has seen the beginning of them, and we hav no surety that it will not see the end of them. Everything which is essential to the human mind must survive all the shocks and vicissitudes of time, and dogmas, which the mind once did without, cannot be essential to it.—Buckle's Essays.

Notes and Clippings.

THE city courts of Philadelphia granted 24 divorces one day last week. The Press of that city says this is one branch of trade that enjoys all the exhilarating vivacity of a constant boom.

MORE than fifty years ago the Christians of Connecticut persecuted Prudence Crandall for teaching colored children in Canterbury, and now a strong effort to induce the legislature to indemnify her for damages inflicted then seems likely to fail.

THE season of Lent is being somewhat extensivly observed by those who believe in that sort of fol-de-rol. The custom of keeping Lent arises from the alleged forty days' fast of Christ. The forty-two days' fast of Dr. Tanner has nothing to do with the case.

SOMEBODY has discovered that this is a remarkable year for Fridays. It came in on a Friday, will go out on a Friday, and will hav fifty-three Fridays. There are four months in year that hav five Fridays each; changes of the moon occur five times on a Friday, and the longest and shortest day of the year each falls on a Friday.

A POSTAL clerk who stole $140 twenty years ago has sent $145 to the post-office department. He signs himself "A Christian," and postscribes: "I am sending $5 extra." This excellent Christian, comments the Baltimore American, should know that the ordinary interest for the twenty years he has had that money amounts to $168. At compound interest it would be much more. And yet he sends $5 extra! His conscience needs reconstruction.

THE chief attraction at agricultural fairs where church-members congregate is the trotting race. It is a striking fact that the two largest church contributions, Mr. Vanderbilt's $100,000 to the Moravian church at New Dorp and Mr. Bonner's $125,000 to Dr. John Hall's church on Fifth avenue, should hav been made by the former and late owner of Maud S., neither of whom ever drove out on Sunday.

A PROPOSITION to abolish "Fast Day" is being agitated in Boston. If this fell reform is carried out, the New England boy will no longer hav a fixed date to begin playing ball, and his mother will not know when to look for early shad. Unless this irreverent spirit of iconoclasm is promptly sat down upon, we shall not be surprised to hear that some daring soul has ventured, even in sight of Boston Common and its historic frog pond, to speak disrespectfully of brown bread and baked beans.

DAVID MILLER, of Westville, two miles from New Haven, Conn., committed suicide March 12th in a peculiar manner. At 4:30 P.M. his mother found his dead body in the woods, about three hundred feet back of the house. He had cut a stick, and made a niche in it to fit the trigger of his gun. Then, lying full length on his back, and steadying the gun with his left hand, he pulled the trigger with his right, discharging four fingers of coarse shot into his head, which he had raised on a level with the gun-barrel. The upper part of his head had been shot completely away. Religious excitement was the cause of the suicide. Miller had been a frequent attendant at the Salvation Army meetings, and there experienced religion.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON has written a letter to Rose Elizabeth Cleveland asking her to use her influence as "first lady" of the land to reform the low-necked style of dressing, or undressing, prevalent among society women. Miss Cleveland writes that she is in favor of bare arms and of decolleté dresses, but holds that there is a distinct line between the neck and the "bust," beyond which it is not in good taste to go.

TWELVE years ago Henry J. Durstock, of Covington, Ky., became helpless from a stroke of paralysis, and the doctors said he could not be cured. Several weeks ago his pastor, Father Baumeister, got some of the holy water of Lourdes, France, and Henry began taking it in daily doses of one drop, the priest praying with him daily. Last week Wednesday the invalid said he could get up. A suit of his brother's clothes was brought, and he arose and dressed himself and dined with his family. He will probably survive until the fool-killer makes his next visit.

ONE aspect of some "religious" journalism is thus presented by the Hartford Courant: "The representativ of one of the great so-called religious papers of the country called at the office of one of our large Connecticut factories and offered as a personal favor to write up the whole concern in big shape for $1,000. The offer was declined in the same noble spirit of self-sacrifice with which it was made. Then it was renewed at $500 (under request for secrecy if accepted). This was declined, too, and the religious representativ knocked himself down, step by step, until, while his first demand was for $1,000, his last offer was to do it all for nothing if they would take fifty copies of the paper containing the proposed article. And they wouldn't accept that; they didn't so much object to being written up, but they didn't know what to do, they said, with the fifty papers."

THE fruit production of California is something wonderful. During 1885 she produced in raisins over 9,000,500 pounds, or nearly three times as much as in 1884. She also sent to market last year 1,500,000 pounds of prunes, 1,823,000 pounds of apples, 1,900,000 pounds of peaches, 1,139,000 pounds of plums, 650,000 pounds of apricots, 2,250,000 pounds of honey, 1,250,000 pounds of walnuts, and 1,050,000 pounds of almonds.

ATTENTION is called to the fact that Prohibition has a very serious effect upon the health of the communities in which it is proclaimed. The town of Saco, Me., has a population of only about six thousand, and no liquor can be sold there except for medicinal or mechanical purposes. There is but one supply agency in Saco, and the statistics show that sixteen thousand prescriptions were put up at this shop in about six months. This argues wretched health on the part of Saco.

TALMAGE says that the law of supply and demand is the "most cruel and infernal law with which the human race has ever been afflicted," while the Rev. Mr. Mallory claims that it is an "enactment of the supreme lawgiver," whoever that legislator may be. John Swinton remarks: "The differences of opinion between the two sacred oracles on this subject are extreme and violent; and we wish they would hire a hall and show us which of them can quickest scale the skies to ascertain whether the Brooklyn Presbyterian or the New York Episcopalian has got nearest to the truth."

An Examination of Church History.

BEING LETTERS TO A CATHOLIC.—X.

FRIEND D. C.: I will now call your attention to the sacrament of matrimony. Of course you believe that it was instituted by Jesus, and it is not my purpose to attempt your enlightenment on that point. I merely desire to look at it practically, and see if it will recommend itself to an outsider as of divine origin.

In September, 1885, I cut the following from a New York paper:

The London World says the cost of obtaining the pope's dispensation to the marriage between Prince Waldemar of Denmark and Princess Marie of Orleans was £5,000. Its most important conditions are that the daughters who may be born of the marriage are to be brought up in the Catholic faith, but the sons as Protestants.

Of course the high contracting parties, and their agents, are the only ones who can positivly testify to the truth of the monetary part of the contract, but the rest is history. Charges of like nature hav been brought against your popes on numerous occasions, and your clergy hav always claimed them to be lies, manufactured by Infidels, or instigated by the devil. Ask one of your theologians by what divine right your pope has the power to make conditions which, if your church be true, will consign to hell one portion of a family, and secure the salvation of the balance. If the Holy Ghost has whispered in his ear either that there will be no issue, or that all the children will be females, then the holy father has obtained money under false pretenses. It is not a fair business transaction. The husband is taking chances for male issue, and the pope, knowing there will be none, has taken his money. It is a skin game.

But if the Holy Ghost don't know, or, knowing, has not informed the pope, then it is a gambling compact, and, if there be a book of fate, you will find it recorded thus: "For and in consideration of the sum of £5,000 lawful money of England, to me in hand paid by ——, the receipt of which I hereby acknowledge, I, Leo XIII., sovereign pontiff of the holy Roman and apostolic church, founded by Jesus Christ for the salvation of souls, do hereby, by the power in me invested, consign to your satanic majesty the immortal souls of ——, and ——, and ——," etc.

This is one side of your sacrament, let us look at another. I cannot giv names, you will recognize the initials.

You remember L—— N——, who married S——; she a Catholic, he a Protestant. A dispensation was obtained from Rome, and Archbishop Hughes performed the ceremony. Things went on well for a time, then the husband took to drink and fast women. The wife suffered in silence, and, woman-like, tried to shield her husband, the father of her child, from the sneers of the world. Time and again she threatened to leave him, but the bonds of your sacrament held her tightly, and she was as often driven back to his arms, for your church makes the wife subservient to the husband, and, no matter how brutal he may be, any refusal on her part to satisfy his desires is a mortal sin. A second and, if I mistake not, a third child were born to her. Unable any longer to liv with him, she obtained from the church what is called a separation. Strange as it may appear, she did this at the earnest solicitation of her mother-in-law.

Time passed. She met one whom she could love—one whom she could trust—but she could not marry him. Your sacrament prevented her. It had been instituted by Jesus himself, and although he had advised a divorce only in cases of adultery, yet your infallible popes, with a wisdom superior to the Godhead, had decreed that in thus advising Jesus had erred.

One day, in a conversation with her mother-in-law, she was informed that her husband had never been baptized. This was delightful news. As a good Catholic, she now knew she was free, and hied away to a priest, gave the necessary information, the papers were made out, and, as far as the church was concerned, she was a free woman. The law soon released her from the legal bonds, and she married the man of her choice.

But what does all this prove? say you. It proves that if the husband had had a little water sprinkled over him, no matter what a scoundrel he might be, your church would not hav released the bonds; failing in this sprinkling, the wife was free. But at what a cost! admitting she had lived in adultery with her presumed husband, and that her children were illegitimate.

Is this the ennobling religion you talk so much about? Is this the sacrament instituted by your very God? Faugh! One well-authenticated instance such as this makes that sacrament stink in the nostrils of decent people.

Do you need another instance of how this sacrament worked? It happened, I shame to say, among my own relativs.

One of them had a large family, and among the children was a boy who from birth had been of unsound mind. When he had attained about twenty-five years, the father was advised to hav him sent to an asylum, but, as he was not dangerous, the advice, unfortunately, was not followed.

In this poor lad the animal predominated, and one day a certain clergyman took advantage of it, and married him to a woman of unsavory reputation, the mother of several children, and, as rumor has it (for this, of course, I'll not vouch), one of them resembled the reverend gentleman. The family were stricken with shame on receiving news of this fearful blow, and I, accompanied by the poor boy's brother, called on the reverend scoundrel to find out the particulars. We were assured that the marriage was correct in every detail, and, complacently settling himself in a comfortable arm-chair, he facetiously added, "I did the job, and tied them fast." If I had had my way there would hav been another "winged pauper," but more prudent counsels prevailed, the matter was hushed up, and in a few years the poor imbecil died.

I could giv many instances within my own circle of acquaintances of how this sacrament works, but these two are sufficient to illustrate my point.

Now let us glance at the sacrament of holy orders, which places one class so much in advance of all the others. I will giv you an instance that happened not many years ago, and of which you are well aware. Scene—a church not a hundred miles from the corner of 105th street and Second avenue.

There was a professional gentleman who had occupied a government position. Rumor had it that he had lost his place owing to his strict adherence to your faith. Be that as it may, he lost it, and came to your city to build up a practice, where I was introduced to him by a relativ, who lived in his neighborhood. He located up-town, and went to the church in question, but, as he felt that his means would not warrant the taking of an entire pew, he engaged only one seat. When there was a collection he gave as far as his means would allow, and was to all intents and purposes as good as the best. But the pastor thought otherwise, and stated to certain of his confidants that the doctor was a mean man, and he would drive him out of the parish.

You know one of the rules of your church is that a priest is not obliged to visit a sick person after a certain hour at night unless the demand is accompanied by what is called "doctors' lines," or a statement from the doctor that the patient is seriously ill and in immediate need of spiritual consolation. Well, whenever the lines from this doctor were presented, the messenger was abruptly dismissed, the priest saying: "I do not recognize Dr. ——. He is no doctor. Understand me plainly, I'll not attend any calls signed by this man." Of course, under these circumstances, the practice of the doctor among a certain class visibly diminished, but being a really good physician, and as he was still gaining a living, he concluded to remain.

One Sunday morning at early mass, the congregation were edified by hearing a long tirade against the doctor, and although names were not used, a direct charge was made from the altar that his daughter was illegitimate. Some say the mother alone was present; others that the daughter, a lovely and loveable young lady, was also there. Be that as it may, the shaft struck. The young woman was avoided by her companions, sickness ensued, and the doctor followed her to the grave. The mother did not long survive her daughter.

Staggering under this double blow, he prepared charges, and many affidavits (twelve, I believe) were taken of parties who had been present and heard the pastor make the charge.

He called on the cardinal, was politely referred to his secretary; thence to the various vicars-general, and after thus tossing about for a long time, was advised that nothing could be done, and begged as a good son of the church not to pursue the matter further, but leave it in the hands of Almighty God, who in his own good time would right it. This he was obliged to do. The cardinal either would not or could not help him, and he did not care to bring a scandal on the church by a public trial.

Whether God Almighty had any hand in the sequel I don't know, but the visible agency was rum.

Some months afterward there was a fair at the academy, and among others this pastor came. He was under the influence of liquor and made himself so obnoxious that one of these same vicars-general felt obliged to advise him to go home. What was his answer? "Go to hell." He had been educated, as I understand, at Rome, and was so accustomed to hear the "anathema sit" of the holy father that it came involuntarily to his lips.

His friends took him away. In a few days charges were preferred against him, and an ecclesiastical council sentenced him to be unfrocked.

Served him right, say you. Amen, say I. But what is the moral? Here is a man who outrages all the usages of society; deliberately plans the ruination of a man's business; failing in that, becomes morally responsible for the death of his wife and daughter, and nothing can be done with him because he has received one of your sacraments and been anointed with a little grease. But the moment he insults—mind, only insults—another whose grease is a little more holy than his, then he is punished.

I could multiply instances if I chose, as I hav a rare collection of them, and it might be very edifying for the pious Catholics of your city to know something of the early career of the reverend Jesuit G——, who is now posing as a saint in embryo, and I feel sure they would not consider themselvs perfectly safe in allowing their young daughters to crowd his confessional box.

I tell you, my friend, this country is no place for a privileged class. It would not take many instances such as this to cause even Catholics to rise up and drive them into the sea. You once told me of an instance happening in South America, where you saw a priest, immediately after celebrating mass, with his garments still damp with the aspersions of holy water, and the body and blood of his God undigested, hie himself to a cock-pit, and with a pair of favorit chickens gamble away the pious offerings of the faithful. You deplored it. But the fact remains.

I hav seen chains stretched across the entrance of one of your churches, to prevent those who should go into a side aisle from contaminating their richer and consequently more favored co-religionists of the middle aisle. And quite frequently I hav noticed poor women kneeling outside your churches, telling their beads and saying their prayers. They could not enter, as they did not hav the change, and on one of these occasions I gave a poor old cripple a dime to pay her entrance fee. Just think of it—she could not hav entered the presence of her God if it had not been for the generosity of an Infidel. And this is Christianity.

One of the reforms most urgently demanded by all the Catholic powers at the Council of Trent was that the charges made for the administering of the sacraments should be abolished. Cardinal del Monte, afterward Julius III., advocated it very strongly and presented a bill "that the administration of the sacraments should be gratuitous," basing it on the gospel saying, "Freely ye hav received; freely giv." It is uncertain what caused Del Monte to father this bill while cardinal, for he opposed it when he ascended the papal see. As there was much at stake, the opposition was great, and it was deemed impolitic to press it to a vote. So it remains an unsettled question. However, you know that when you desire a special mass you must pay for it, otherwise the party you wish prayed for will only be mentioned by the priest.

One of my servants lost a little brother, and for the twelve succeeding months she had a mass said for him. They were called, if I mistake not, "months' mind," and each one cost her five dollars. She came regularly to me for a $5 bill, and on questioning her I was told this. So, to test it, on one occasion I gave her a check, and I saw from its indorsement to whom it had been given. This satisfied me.

I know that when a rich man's child is to be purged from original sin, the church is lighted, altar boys are in attendance with candles, and the child receives all the extras, because the money donation is supposed to be in proportion to the holy outlay. And on one occasion I escaped being a godfather only because I was not one of the faithful. I was nearly caught, though, for the priest, thinking because I was well dressed I might do the handsome thing, insisted that as my cousin, the godmother, was a good Catholic, I could serve—but I declined the responsibility.

Now take the same ceremony with a poor child—one candle, words mumbled and hurried pocketing of the fee, and off he goes like a shot. There is only one dollar in it, and time is precious. Mind, I don't mean to say that a priest would absolutely refuse to baptize a child unless a fee were paid, but he would make it so uncomfortable for the parents that they would prefer selling their clothes and raising the money. I could, if I chose, giv an instance to the point, in which a relation of yours figured, where a poor mother, deserted by her husband, and with five children at home, was trusted till she could obtain the money. Of course I should not hav known of this, and I admit I would not hav believed it, if your relativ had not mentioned the transaction to us both.

Among the many acts of rascality committed by your church, none surpassed that of the "Donation of Constantine." For centuries the temporal power was based on a document which your writers now admit to hav been forged, and the papal anathemas were thundered against those who attempted to even question the right of the holy see. Entire countries were donated to favorits, and the slightest attempt at expostulation by the enslaved people was visited with ecclesiastical censure.

You, my friend, the son of an Irishman, should not be ignorant of the history of your own people. Once they were free, happy, prosperous, and their manufactures, world-renowned, made your little island one of the richest on the globe. The arts and sciences flourished, and the many institutions of learning made Ireland the pride of Christendom. But Pope Adrian IV. changed all this, for in 1155 he presented her to Henry II., and one of his successors indorsed the gift by re-deeding her again to Queen Mary, wife of Philip.

For hundreds of years your once happy country was the scene of outrages almost unparalelled in history, and to-day Protestant England lords it over Catholic Ireland and points to your infallible popes as the prime cause.

We hav a case nearer our own times. When Catholic Poland, bleeding at every pore, rose against her Russian tyrant, she naturally looked to Rome for sympathy. But Austria, on one side, and France, on the other, were threatening the Papal States, and Gregory XVI., to save his temporal power, entered into an alliance with Russia, and in 1832 issued his bull recognizing the czar as the legitimate sovereign of Poland; anathematized all Catholic Poles who disputed it; called their leaders "lying prophets whose mischievousness and perfidy ought, in fine, to be exposed," and the various Catholic papers, taking their cue from this, joined in the hue and cry, and branded as noble a band of patriots as the world ever saw with the epithet of "brigands."

My friend, to the dirty, greasy Italians all are pagans except the inhabitants of the Eternal City. They laugh at, sneer, and insult you, and I will show how and where. When Bishop John Conroy, of Albany, was deemed incapable of performing the duties of the episcopate, McNierney, the cardinal's secretary, was sent, ostensibly to assist, in reality to succeed him, and was consecrated bishop in partibus infidelium. The good Catholics of Albany assisted at the ceremony, and the old Knickerbocker families, who are too proud to visit with the common herd, received this new bishop, little thinking that in so doing they accepted the title of pagans, by which they had been dubbed by a parcel of Italian lazzaroni.

I always blamed Cardinal McCloskey for this, as Albany had been the seat of his early labors, and its people, regardless of creed, had helped him build up the diocese. But on the burial of this "lady bishop," as his people loved to call him, I found that he also had been subjected to a like insult, as the pope, although he had 365 churches to select from, could not spare for the first cardinal of America anything but an old pagan temple—"Holy Mary Supra Minerva"—which had been cleansed of its heathenism by the aid of a little holy water. Orate fratres!

(TO BE CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

Mr. Dana, Mr. Slocum.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK SUN, Sir: In a late editorial, entitled, "Three Articles," you say in regard to Professor Huxley, who furnished the Nineteenth Century with one of the "three articles" alluded to by you, "If he is right, our whole religion is based on nothing but superstition;" and you say it as though it never before occurred to you that such was the case, and evidence such as hidebound Christians only will dispute, but cannot refute, staring you in the face from the apex of the time-honored rock of ages away back in the vista of the past. Now, let me respectfully ask you if you think our religion is based on any solider foundation than that of superstition.

The bed-rock of Christian theology (mythology) is the Bible, a book which deals largely in supernaturalism, the belief in which is superstition; and which supernaturalism has not the merit of being original, having been stolen from races of men that were ancient long before Adam, the reputed "first man," began to make a record on the page of biblical history. Crammed with stories of the supernatural order such as put to shame the efforts of Munchausen, yet is the Bible the bed-rock of a religion that has held a portion of the world in chains for eighteen centuries, though the last hundred years—the last twenty of the hundred more particularly—hav done much in the way of striking off the shackles, the next hundred to do much more to relieve a groaning world of a horrible incubus. Can you read this book and say our whole religion is not based on superstition? "If Professor Huxley is right," you say. Now, let me respectfully ask you if you do not believe Professor Huxley is right.

Your editorial concluded with this interrogatory: "Yet will Professor Huxley, the Rev. Mr. Newton, and the Rev. Mr. Savage [the two parsons who furnished two of the "three articles"] say that the world can get along without religious faith and a God to worship?"

It is cock-sure that one of the two parsons, from a desire to hold his fat place, albeit he kicks Christian theology back into the crypt with mythology, with which it belongs, would not say Yes to your query. As to the other parson, he could say Yes if he would, while the professor would certainly say it if directly asked. Let me respectfully ask you if you do not think the world could get along without religious faith and a God to worship. If you do not, there are others who do, they even having the presumption to think that the world would get along a great deal better without religious faith and a God to worship than it does with them—better in every way, shape, and manner, one reason, and a weighty one, being that hypocrisy would hav to retire from the field, horse, foot, and dragoons, leaving but a few stragglers scattered about here and there.

Cold the day for hypocrits when Christian mythology is knocked into the crypt of the past, where lie buried the remains of a thousand religions, more or less, none of them a whit more ridiculous in its palmiest days than the Christian religion of the present day. Yes, a cold day; but as they are numerous, with powerful motivs for keeping the Christian religion to the fore, it will not slip back yet awhile where it belongs, if they can help it. Heaven and earth! what would all the saintly bank presidents and cashiers, trustees, parsons, and others do without the stolen livery of heaven in the prosecution of their nefarious schemes? Why, they couldn't steal a dollar where they now steal thousands; nor could the clerical ones, their occupation gone, lead astray so many confiding ewe lambs as they do now in the livery of an alleged heaven, which they train themselvs to wear as though born to the cloth. Yet it is going, this Christian religion, slowly but surely going, going, going, and the day is coming when it will be gone. Would that day were to-day; but as patience is a virtue, let us be virtuous and wait for the wagon, so to speak; thanking common sense and thought and reason that Christian theology is daily losing its grip, to be numbered later on with the things that were but are not.

And don't let us forget to thank Voltaire and Tom Paine, Darwin and Huxley, Ingersoll and Bradlaugh, and a thousand and one other high lights of free thought and free reason, free speech and free action within bounds of propriety; not omitting to thank THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, if last-mentioned, is not the least by any means in the grand assault on Christian mythology—as our "religion" will one day be called—all along the line, parsons as well as laymen taking a hand in.

Going, going, going; it will be a happy day for the world when it is gone—the Christian religion!

Respectfully yours, SI SLOKUM.

Random Thoughts.

The business of life is conducted on a sliding scale; that is, it slides from fair market values to fancy prices.

The piety of the seller is no safeguard against his rapacity. Caveat emptor was the cautionary proverb of the heathen Roman. Its interpretation, "Keep your eye-teeth skinned," is the legend of the Christian Yankee.

To trust in the assurances of the seller is the poetry of simplicity, or rather the doggerel of self-deception.

"God made of one flesh all the people that dwell upon the face of the earth."

To make Hottentots, calling them men, may be an amusement to the infinit mind; but to finite beings of the higher types the work must ever be regarded as unjustifiable. It has not even the excuse of the practice of the court of Dahomey: his majesty standing the drinks to hav a fellow made tight, so that by his antics he might amuse the ladies and courtiers of the palace.

In the Comte God, however, all varieties of the human may be found, so that the spectacle of Hottentot life may be farcical and funny to one phase of his being, while the grander characteristics of the civilizee may please him in another; recreation in the former, business in the latter. A show of real, live Hottentots would pay well among us.

It would be absurd to suppose that any God would exact the same degree of moral accountability from the Hottentots and other benighted humans whom he created that he demands of the civilized Christians, the pope and his educated masses, for instance.

To impose the recognition of the duties and restraints of the civilized man on a Hottentot would be equal to demanding of him that he shall lay out a plan of a modern city, and build houses equal to the finest mansions of our day. Equally idiotic would the poorly organized Hottentot be in the discharge of moral obligations. And what shall we say of the Digger Indian on the other side of our great mountain range? Pshaw! there are man-monkeys all around us; fellows with Bibles in their hands even. To know that there are such wretched human specimens among us is enough to make one doubt the claims of the modern scientist, accepting the dictum of the humorist: "Better not to know so much than know so much that ain't so."

It is claimed that from the literature of the ancient Greek and Roman are drawn the finest specimens of poetic composition known to our colleges, as well as the most profound dissertations on dialectical philosophy. The sublimest conceptions also of man's relation to the eternal mind are to be found in their writings, while their ideas of immortality are lofty and pure as are those of the greatest names of our age. It would be a curious study—granting the modern theory of the selection of the fittest—what hav been the interfering agents in the evolutionary processes during the passage of so many years which hav denied to our times the evidence of unfoldment of the intellect, claimed by the modern scientist, through natural development. Waiving all advancement in material progress, we inquire, why hav not our later poems, our sculptures, our paintings, our oratory, our philosophy, not taken precedence of the best of the productions of the antique? Or do we grovel to fetiches and kneel at shadow-altars in clinging to the old models? To the inquiring mind a chance would be given for much ground and lofty tumbling in the reach for arguments to satisfy all; much intellectual gymnastics. To the explorer would be found entanglements and complications from which there might appear no chance for extrication. In such chaotic regions he would find Hills peep o'er hills as Alps o'er Alps arise.

Educational preferences, involving and snarling; religious prejudices, endless and confusing; national disputes, with wars devastating and deranging internal disruption, discordant and turbulent; with other ills that life is heir to, making confusion worse con founded.

No doubt, however, but human enterprise will yet accomplish the task of aggregating needed testimony to solve the great Darwinian problem—drawing from the jumbled litter of the past, biological as well as geological, well-attested data; giving a panorama majestic and satisfactory of the cosmos of the scientist, blotting out forever the pueril tableaux of the Mosaic record. Our London Letter.

For the purpose of assisting the very much overworked clergy, and to consult as to what reforms can be made in the church of Christ as by law appointed, a House of Laymen has been formed, and the reports of their meetings are amusing, if not instructiv. It might, perhaps, be thought by the uninitiated that a church for the maintenance of which so much money has been spent and so much blood has been shed must hav reached a state of perfection, being under the direct supervision of Nos. 2 and 3 of the Trinity, and I am assured by those who know that the arguments that can be used to prove this are unanswerable, which may be true; I cannot say, never having heard them. Those I hav heard are not up to very much, so I conclude the unanswerable ones are reserved for special purposes, and not produced for the benefit of Infidels. The majority of the nonconforming sects are, I believe, fairly unanimous that the only effectiv plan of reformation is disestablishment, while the members of the state church are somewhat divided in their opinions on the subject. The abolition of the right of sale to next presentations has been suggested in the House of Laymen, but this, together with the tithe question, having been shown to be impracticable, as it would affect "vested interests," of course, such suggestions could not well be carried out. Indeed, every proposition of reform that has been made appears to pinch the corns of some priest, and so, doubtless, the matter will be left in the present comfortable position for those who are deriving benefit from the legalized robbery, as it is now. The clergy are certainly shrewd men so far that they don't quiet believe in the "blessed promis of the Lord" they recommend for their deluded flocks. "The Lord will provide" may be very well to preach to the unemployed poor, but not quite good enough for a priest to rely upon when it is a question of remitting tithes, or taking only a portion of the rent of glebe lands. Mansions in the skies will do all right enough when you get there, but while you are in the flesh you naturally want something more compatible with this sphere of existence.

It is very wicked indeed for anyone to suggest that parsons should fall short of the luxuries of life, seeing how valuable they are in giving good, sound advice to laymen. Take, for instance, the bishop of London, who said in the pulpit, a few days back, that "the masses must be taught not to bear their privations sulkily, but, by true self-denial, to seek a higher purpose and a nobler life." Surely the man who can utter such a splendid sentiment as that is cheap at £10,000 a year, besides a palace and grounds. If people will not listen to such words of deep and sound wisdom, but prefer hardening their wicked hearts, you surely cannot blame the man of God, who must hav been inspired to make such a speech. I maintain that good and great men like this bishop are cheap at any price, and if they were compelled to work for a bare sustenance, the world would be considerably the loser. I don't exactly know in what way, but some one who does know told me so, and therefore I cannot be far wrong in bearing my informant out to the best of my ability.

The annual meeting of the Congregational Chapel-building Society has just been held, and the report shows that it is doing pretty successfully—cash in hand is almost £600; investments, £5,000; and promissory notes are held to the extent of over £11,000. In my ignorance of spiritual matters, I should hav thought this was a very fair amount to go on with for a year or two, and that the society might hav kept from begging for a time and let some other equally useful society hav a turn, but of course I am wrong, as the chairman states that "the Nonconformists had not yet won the great mass of the people," and as this is bound to be done, more chapels are required, and of course more money to build them—so the hat must still be kept busily moving.

Dr. Parker, of the City Temple, who is a Nonconformist free-lance, has taken the bull by the horns, and while other shepherds are talking he intends acting, and signifies his intention of introducing a military band into his church. If this does not get hold of the masses no doubt his fertil brain will invent something more enticing.

With all the efforts of these good men, "General" Booth leaves them far in the rear. He started the "Salvation Household Troop" off last week. As there are only eighty soldiers in it, however, I presume quality more than quantity has been considered. These are stated to consist of "converted roughs, parsons, coal-miners, gentlemen, costermongers, and poachers, with representativs from various foreign countries." Truly a goodly company! They are divided into a "Flying column," "Flying squadron," "Jaunting-car company," "Cavalry contingent," and "Speaking, Praying, and Singing Brigade," and will doubtless leave their usual traces on the path they take.

I learn with pleasure that you hav beatified a priest who died at Vienna in 1820, two of his alleged miracles having been proved. It must be very gratifying to the deceased when he hears that his merits hav been so speedily discovered and rewarded—as no doubt the news will be communicated to him at his present address through the usual channel, whatever that may be. A Liberal Wedding in Philadelphia.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I send you the details of a Liberal wedding performed under the auspices of the Friendship Liberal League, in the presence of some six hundred chosen friends and invited guests. The contracting parties are both members of the League. The ceremony was as follows:

Piano selections	Miss De Bugh
Soprano solo, operatic selections	Miss Carwell
Wedding march, Strauss	Sig. Fernanzo

The bridal procession entered: Six ushers; bride and her father; bridegroom and bride's mother; four bridesmaids and four groomsmen. Headed by the master of ceremonies, William Bishop, the party approached the president's desk, and Mr. Bishop said:

Mr. President: I hav the honor to present, on this occasion, two moral heroes to this League. In the most momentous and the happiest era of their lives they make you their chosen witness. By this act alone they honor themselvs and you; themselvs, because they are brave enough to defy that superstition which by pretended authority of God seeks to control the conscience and the institutions of society, and declares birth, marriage, and death impious without its priestly seal. Our heroes honor us and our noble cause by coming here to avow their affection for each other, and to assume the grave responsibilities resulting therefrom. It is their testimony of confidence, at the holy altar of mental liberty, to the religion of humanity, whose only creed is love, whose gospel is a blameless life.

The party then arranged themselvs in a row, facing the audience, the bride and groom in the center. J. C. Hannon, the president, said:

Ladies and Gentlemen: The auspicious occasion which has called you forth has no precedent that I am aware of, and those of you who bear witness to this interesting ceremony should engrave it on your memory as one of the radical events of the times. You are called upon to-day to bear witness to the solemnization of a matrimonial alliance between Mr. Edwin Lyson and Miss Augusta Smith. The parties contracting this alliance, which every sensible person will admit is the most important event in the philosophy of life, having rigidly complied with all the legal requirements of this commonwealth, are now prepared to consecrate their pledges of fidelity to each other in the presence of this assembly of chosen friends and invited guests.

In making these premises the altar of their confidence, they hav rent the shackles of social slavery, and to-day they stand upon the broad platform of universal mental freedom as the pioneers of a social revolution; they hav added another gem to the crown of human progress by assuming a moral and intellectual dignity before which the silly conventionalities of the age must eventually yield. It has always been assumed by certain individuals masquerading under the claims of inspiration that they alone possess the undisputed right to consecrate the marriage tie by their sublime and solemn presence. If any such persons, or their representativs, should constitute a unit in this vast assembly, let them bear witness to the fact that all the show with which they embellish their respectiv ceremonies can never make them anything but a legal contract, and they the individual witnesses of the same. Now, in behalf of this League, let me thank you for the manifestation of your individuality, and assure you this association is conscious of the honor you hav bestowed upon it, and we sincerely wish your union may be blessed by endless joy.

If any person in this audience can show reason why this couple should not be united, let them step forward now, or forever after hold their peace.

The master of ceremonies then went through the service, and pronounced them husband and wife. At the close of the ceremony Signor Fernanzo sang "Blending Loves," and a lecture by Professor Atkinson closed the evening's entertainment.

Yours respectfully, James C. Hannon.

The Liberal Club.

The 404th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club was attended mainly by men. The evening was so rainy that few ladies ventured out. Besides, the lecture was on "Hydrophobia," which is not a subject calculated to fire the popular female heart.

In opening the meeting Mr. Wakeman said that The Truth Seeker's contribution to the Irish question should be in the hands of all, and that the interest in the journey of Jonah seemed to deepen with the flight of time.

Dr. Beegle, of Ocean Grove, N. J., was introduced, and, as the secretary will hav it, "delivered his lecture as announced on the program, entitled 'Hydrophobia: An Inquiry and Theory as to its Origin.'" As the word hydrophobia signifies, the disease is supposed to be a fear of water, but such was not always a symptom of its presence. The object of the speaker was to point out what he believed to be the cause of hydrophobia. In the first place, the symptoms of this malady are closely allied with those of blood poisoning. The disease follows the bite of a rabid dog in about forty days, and terminates fatally some five or six days later. A fellow-student of the speaker was inoculated with poisonous fluid from a cadaver, and neglecting to properly cauterize the wound, died in about that length of time, his symptoms being similar to those marked in true hydrophobia. The fluids of putrefied flesh were well-known to be the most deadly of slow poisons. Another fact, the saliva of the mouth may become poisonous when the human being or the animal is excited by anger. The doctor's theory of the origin of hydrophobia was this, that hungry curs fighting over a putrefied bone would unite the poisons of the angry saliva and of putrefaction, and, inoculating the wounds of one another with this virus, hydrophobia might result. Dr. Beegle said that he had made no experiments to test his theory, but he believed that such should be made, and as dogs were the originators of the disease they should come forward and offer themselvs as sacrifices in the interests of science. If it killed them all a desirable end would hav been subserved.

The audience listened with close attention to Dr. Beegle's lecture, which was short, connected, and delivered in a business-like manner. At the termination President Wakeman invited any visiting physician present to address the meeting. There being no response, Dr. Foote, Jr., was appealed to. Dr. Foote said that he saw nothing in the theory of Dr. Beegle that he could not fall in with. There was a good deal of humbug in circulation relativ to hydrophobia and very little accurate information. At a meeting of the French Veterinary Society held the past year there was no one present who would say that he could lay out a line of symptoms so any one could be sure of correctly diagnosing hydrophobia. Dr. Foote thought that the method of inoculating for all diseases would lead to endless and serious complications. At one season we must inoculate for smallpox; at another, for typhoid and other fevers; then for diphtheritic affections, hydrophobia, and so on. The condition of a man's system with all these different microbes cavorting through his blood vessels and gamboling about the by-ways and interstices of his liver would not be such as the ordinary mind could readily comprehend. All dogs that do not know how to liv hygienically should be put out of existence.

Mrs. Leonard did not claim to be a doctor, but she did think she had more or less common sense. The reason dogs go mad is that we abuse them so. Mrs. Leonard spoke of a dog which possessed sufficient intelligence to get out of the way when it was in danger. Thereby, the speaker thought, the dog showed an acumen superior to that of some men. Mrs. Leonard inquired why it was that female dogs never went mad.

Dr. Weeks desired to ask if hydrophobia was known among hyenas, which habitually eat bad meat.

Robert Blissert said that all the evils of the hydrophobia virus and germs, microbes and spores, did not represent a drop in the bucket compared with the evils of the tenement-house system. Having thus thrown the subject into a shape where he could handle it, Mr. Blissert inquired, "Whither are we drifting to?" and make his usual speech in behalf of the workingman. In conclusion he said: "I don't like to pray, but I say, Damn the doctors."

Mr. Wakeman followed by request. The theory of Dr. Beegle as to the origin of hydrophobia looked reasonable to him because it was supported by the microbe theory, which was the most brilliant pathological discovery of the present generation. From this Mr. Wakeman proceeded to a consideration of Blissert. He said that he now learned for the first time that all the questions pertaining to politics, sociology, and other matters of human interest could be thrown together and treated under the general head of Hydrophobia. This had been done by "Dr." Blissert, who, whereas two weeks ago he was opposed to farm-life, was now attaking the custom of living in cities. Mr. Wakeman proceeded to point out the inconsistencies of Mr. Blissert in a very entertaining way. The victim bore it calmly until he was accused of having lived in Ireland, when he jumped to his feet and made a vigorous speech in the thickest of brogues. Then Mr. Wakeman gave it up, and said anyone who had heard Mr. Blissert speak would no longer insist that he was an Irishman.

Dr. Foote, Sr., arose to remark that as the subject of microbes was up for discussion it would be proper to state that their discovery was first announced by a woman some thirty-five years ago. That name was not given them, but nevertheless the discovery was made at that time. Further exercises consisted of a kind of catechism of Dr. Beegle, who said he was somewhat bewildered by the drift the subject had taken in the case of Blissert. Dr. Weeks wanted to know about the hyenas. Dr. Beegle said he never heard of hydrophobia among them. Lawyer Chamberlain inquired why, if putrid meat caused hydrophobia, the dogs of oriental cities, who were numerous and lived altogether on offal, were not afflicted. Dr. Beegle replied that they probably did not fight over their food. Mrs. Leonard called attention back to the question whether female dogs were subject to rabies, and Dr. Beegle said they had their share. Other questions were fired from various directions, so that interest was kept up until the usual hour for adjourning, when all went contentedly and blithely home. The next lecture will be by Mr. Levey on the "Iniquities of Modern Journalism."

The present writer cannot conscientiously close this report without to some extent animadverting upon the report of the last meeting preceding this. An inaccuracy especially prominent appears in the reference to the presiding officer as the "acting president." It would be as correct to refer to the chief intellect of this paper as its acting editor. The Man with the Badge-Pin may occasionally lack that seriousness with which great subjects should be treated, and he is well known to be something of a liar; but it is not on record that he ever failed to adjust a statement to the fact in so conspicuous an instance as that to which attention has been called. Admission to the meetings of the club is but five cents.

Canadian Gossip.

Matters are just a trifle dull in the Secular circle here at present. We expect to take possession of the new rooms some time within the next two weeks, when it is anticipated that things will brighten up. Mr. Watts will be here to assist at the opening. He lectures here Sunday, the 28th, and every Sunday after through April, after which he leaves for England.

The committee are working with a determination to make the opening conversazione the event of the year. There will be a musical and literary entertainment, after which dancing and supper. A program of unusual interest has been prepared. Mr. Algie and other friends from the country are expected to be present, and "we won't go home till morning."

His grace Archbishop Lynch, R.C. (no relation to the judge), last Sunday evening preached a sermon on Agnosticism to a large congregation. He said: "A deluge of Infidelity has inundated France and is rapidly spreading over Europe. A great proportion of the people in all European countries are really drifting into paganism. We in this country are not quite so bad, yet in Canada and the States Infidelity under the name of Agnosticism is cropping up everywhere."

His grace then proceeded to show his congregation the absurdity and fallacy of the Agnostic position, and besought them, young and old, not to be led astray, but to place implicit trust in the grand old truths of the Bible and Christianity, and so they would be happy on earth and blessed in heaven.

His grace John Joseph is doing well. He has been for some months past trying to keep his end up in a triangular fight between himself, on the Catholic side, and the Rev. Colonel Wild and Rev. John Carry on the other or Protestant side, and yet he finds time to go for the Agnostics.

The idea of his explaining the fallacies of Agnosticism to a congregation who on the average know as much about Agnosticism as they do about the conservation of energy, or the precession of the equinoxes, is really too rich. But it is gratifying to hav the good news of the spread of Freethought confirmed by an archbishop of the strongest church in Christendom.

Brother Tiffany, of New York told us a few weeks ago of the miraculous spread of Christianity, of four hundred millions of worshipers in 1885, and now the archbishop (an equally good authority) tells us that "a large proportion of the population in all Christian countries are Infidels, pagans, or Agnostics." Will somebody straighten this matter out and oblige a bewildered outsider?

Referring to the statement made by the Rev. Captain Potts at the public meeting last week that the Land Leaguers were bringing a murderer to Toronto to lecture on St. Patrick's Day, the doctor has made a correction.

He says he made a mistake, but only in regard to locality. The man he referred to, a Mr. Burke, who is to lecture in Montreal and not in Toronto, was condemned some years ago by the British government on a charge of treason-felony, and this is why he spoke of him as a murderer.

If the Rev. Dr. Potts is correct in this definition, there are at the present time two murderers holding seats in the British House of Commons—O'Doherty, of North Meath, and O'Brien, of Mayo, both of whom hav been imprisoned for treason. If the reverend gentleman is correct, George Washington was a murderer, but it might not be well for the doctor to say so—in New York, for instance.

It is hardly a question which is most murderously inclined, the man who takes up arms or enters into a conspiracy against oppression or he who, by exciting religious intolerance and sectarian hate, puts murder into the hearts of one class of the community.

The Tribune, speaking of this matter, says: "The Mr. Burke Dr. Potts spoke of never committed a murder, was never suspected of having committed a murder, and was never charged with anything of the kind. He is a man of ability, holds a respectable position in New York, and is far above the reach of such calumnies as that employed by Dr. Potts to fire his excitable audience."

The writer does not wish to appear to be taking sides in the "Irish stew," but he has an idea—or is it an inspiration?—that if a few of the ranting demagogs of both sides, the Wilds and the Pottses, O'Donovan Rossas and Parnellites, men who are filling their pockets out of the patriotism of servant-girls and idiots, if they could be brought together somewhere and left to fight it out, to exterminate each other, like the famous Kilkenny cats, the world would be the better for it, and the Irish difficulty soon be settled.

I throw this out as a hint to Mr. Gladstone in his present dilemma, and only ask in return that should he act upon it he will giv me credit for having suggested the idea.

News and Notes.

Again in the lively city of Pittsburgh, where even the river is set on fire, so tremendous are the energies at work round about, and so impetuous is the natural gas! It must find vent even through the bosom of the Ohio, and the bubbles flash with flame, and a torchlight procession seems to go with the current. In this marvelous city I again find myself with Harry Hoover, Roman Staley, S. F. De Jones, Frank Bacon, and a goodly company of others. The series of lectures here has been very successful. Full houses were present at each. On Sunday afternoon I lectured in the city on "The Glory of Infidelity." After the address there was a very lively talk and some attempts to defend Christianity and the deity.

In the evening I lectured in Allegheny City, and the hall was full. I gave the "Foundation of Moral Obligation," which I placed the recognition of the unity of life, and that the proper way to develop morality was to develop sociability—get people together and make them better friends and neighbors. I said that a high pulpit, where the minister was afar off from his congregation, was the hight of immorality, while, on the other hand, the church kitchen tended to morals, for it cultivated acquaintance, and even the church soup, although there might be but one oyster in it, tended more to righteousness than their icy prayer-meeting, where people never got near enough together for a handshake.

There was quite a breeze of opposition to many of my statements. One opponent declared that the ministers were a good class, and that they worked "like slaves" for the benefit of the community. To this I replied that my greatest objection to the clergymen was that they did work "like slaves." I said that they should work like freemen, and then their endeavors would be of some value, but they really couldn't hav much moral impulse in the world so long as they had to be intellectual idiots and declare solemnly that they believed the whale did swallow Jonah, and failing to digest him gave him a return trip at cheaper rates.

On Monday evening I lectured at Sharpsburg, and broke new ground. The hall in which I gave my "New Heaven and Earth" is almost constantly occupied by the Salvation Army, and when I cast my eyes around I saw the banners and mottoes of this queer eruption of primitiv Christianity. On the platform were a couple of tambourines. This, I suppose, is what constituted the band and excited pious reflections. I looked at the mottoes in red and white, and how comforting they were! Here are a few: "Reject Christ and Perish;" "Death is at Hand;" "After Death the Judgment;" "Heaven or Hell," and such other delightful and suggestiv insinuations. But greater than all, right before me on the wall, was a flaming announcement as follows:

Salvation Army; Sixth Annual Review; National Rifle Hall; All Night of Prayer; Official Council of War; Great, Grand, Glorious; Baptism of Fire; Mammoth Feast; Heaven upon Earth. Admission, single ticket, 10 cents; banquet, 25 cents; combination ticket, 50 cents.

This was a "combination and a form indeed." Such is the live Christianity of to-day. It has left the head, and the heart too, almost, and is now at the heels. Through the vigorous exertions of Mr. D. M. Miller, of Sharspburg, the meeting was well advertised, and the hall was full. Members of the Salvation Army were present, and a number of boys and girls; but there was not the slightest disturbance throughout the lecture. All paid attention, and this first meeting in one of the most orthodox of communities has done good.

The debate after the lecture was interesting and good-natured. One gentleman wanted to know what good thing there was to-day that was not recorded in the Bible. I answered that one good thing was the equality of woman, of which the Bible made no record. St. Paul didn't seem to know that woman is the equal of man. Nobody in the Bible seems to know this. It has been discovered since, like the telegraph, the railroad, and the sewing-machine, etc. Solomon said there was "nothing new under the sun." If he should wake up to-day he would be surprised at the thousand new things in the modern world. Above all, he would be overcome at the absolutely novel thought that each of his seven hundred wives was just as "good a man" as he; and St. Paul also would be entirely disconcerted to behold so many wives knowing more than their husbands—and some women better informed than himself. I should like to introduce St. Paul to our women lecturers and then see if he would ask woman to "keep still."

I lectured on Tuesday evening at Alliance, Ohio. A good audience was present in the Independent Church. I spoke on "The American Secular Union: Its Aims and Methods," presenting the Nine Demands as the basis for practical Liberal work, including in their scope principles of the highest importance, yet principles upon which Freethinkers of every shade of opinion can unite. The Materialist and the Spiritualist both recognize the preëminent claims of justice and humanity in this world.

The greeting of friends at Alliance was as pleasant as could be. Mr. Thornburgh, Smith and sons, and others well known in our ranks maintain the cause with persistency.

Wednesday morning I left Alliance for Painesville, and at noon found myself at the pleasant residence of Joseph Sedgebeer, a calm philosopher eighty-three years of age. Mr. Sedgebeer has seen much of life, has been a Freethinker for more than half a century, and is as bright and enthusiastic still as any of us.

In his younger days he was a Christian, but doubts came, which he tried to overcome by prayer. Oftentimes while felling trees in Canada he would drop upon his knees and ask God for help. He read the Bible carefully, noted its contradictions, and by the exercise of his own judgment became a Freethinker, and discarded Christianity. It was quite a pleasure to meet him and his wife, and I spent a happy day at Painesville.

I lectured in the evening at the Methodist church. A large audience was present, many of them Christians. I gave "The New Heaven and Earth," in which I showed the true relation of Liberalism to the past, and its hopes and aspirations for the future. I was listened to with the closest attention, and I believe that the spirit of inquiry has been started, and that new thoughts will prevail in that conservativ community. The Young Men's Christian Association was quite scandalized at my being allowed to lecture in the Methodist church, and prayed over it, but for all that the church for once did hav the honor of an Infidel discourse within its walls. So we can put one mark to its credit.

I cannot close these news and notes without giving a specimen of Salvation Army tactics, a reminiscence of my lecture at Sharpsburg, Pa. This is quoted from their own paper, The Little Soldier, which I came across at the hall where I lecture. I giv it word for word, spelling and all. I especially call the attention of the Independent to this latest phase of Christian advertisment. I suppose the next thing will be "Death-bed Scenes, The New Birth, etc., furnished to order. C. O. D." Here it is:

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

What Do All These Insinuations Mean?

From the Philadelphia Evening Item.

The allegations made against Brother George K. Snyder, head man of the Good Templars and tall man of the Law and Order Society, are somewhat serious. Snyder has been posing before the community for the last three or four years as the avenging apostle of Prohibition. He was the great vindicator of Sabbatarianism, the champion of a dry Sunday, and consequently one of those philanthropists who at rare periods come forward to sacrifice themselvs for the good of mankind.

Snyder has in some cases personally exhibited himself as an informer. In others he has been the employer of other informers. Such a pure, good man would not be expected to expose himself, even to the false accusation of having done all this for the purpose of "pinching" tavern-keepers and compelling them to "sock" in order that they may be "let up."

He may be wrongly charged and falsely accused. Still, the charges made against him by some tavern-keepers are so direct and circumstantial that they ought to be investigated. It will not do for the Law and Order Society to mildly express opinions, such as are reported to hav been made by their lawyer, Vail, that if the allegation against Snyder was true, "it was very wrong to do so."

Neither will the Law and Order Society escape upon the assertion of President Burton that "if the report was true it should not reflect upon the society, which is entirely sincere in its work, and all its motivs are of the purest and highest character." It is not a question of motivs, Mr. Burton, so much as of the means by which it is sought that these motivs shall be gratified.

The Holy Humbug's Prayer.

From the Lewiston Labor Advocate.

Cyrus W. Field "thanked God for cheap labor," says John Swinton. President Mitchell, of the St. Paul Railroad, says the almighty "keeps up his dividends." At a meeting of the stock gamblers in this city, a few days ago, they referred to themselvs as "Christian merchants," and the leading speaker quoted scripture against the coinage of the silver dollar. All of which reminds us of the "Holy Humbug's Prayer:"

Bless thou, O Lord, the crooked ways
By which I roll up wealth untold—
By which I fleece the toiling poor
To swell my unearned store of gold.

Bless thou the plans I lay so deep
To hold the workers in my grip,
That I may get their labor cheap
And ever hav them on the hip.

The Boston Anarchists Hard to Please.

From the Winsted (Ct.) Press.

Tucker, the Boston Anarchist, calls Batterson's proposition to divide annually one-third of the net profits of his business among his employés, in addition to their regular wages, "one of the foulest plots against industry ever hatched in the brain of a member of the robber class." It must not be expected that anything on earth or in the heavens above will please an Anarchist. The laws of nature will hav to be entirely abolished before these fellows will see a ray of hope for humanity.

The Truth Seeker Keeps Men Thinking.

From Pomeroy's Democrat.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is very lively reading about these days, with its pictures of biblically-told incidents. One of them represents Jonah, who resembles an agent for Peleg White's Sticking Salve, starting for Tarshish and going aboard a Green Point ferry-boat Another picture represents the boat steaming away toward Buttermilk Channel, while Jonah is entering what appears to be the mouth of an East river sewer, but which is meant for a whale or a balloon. THE TRUTH SEEKER not only sets men to thinking, but keeps them at it.

Our "Dandy" Artist.

From the Denison, Texas, Sunday Gazetteer.

The artist who gets up the religious illustrations for the New York TRUTH SEEKER, which appear weekly, is a dandy in that line. Nothing better ever appeared in Puck. Those who hav not seen the series of pictures entitled, "The Journey of Jonah," never hav got at the pith and true inwardness, as it were, of the narrativ.

Christian Preferences.

From a Sermon by Sam Small.

I prefer a drunkard to an Infidel for a teacher, and would rather my boys grow up hewers of wood rather than they should learn all the sciences and become Infidels.

Christ as a Teacher of Hate.

The Rev. Dr. Rexford has said: "When Ingersoll criticises this doctrin of Jesus, that one must forsake his family, if need be, to follow him, and calls it a doctrin of hate, a doctrin of inhumanity, he is guilty of intellectual dishonesty. Jesus and his religion hav done more for mankind than Ingersoll and all of his fellow-humanitarians ever hav done or ever will do. The religion of Christ is a religion of love. If we wish to see how much this religion of love has done for man, all we hav to do is to compare Christianity and its provisions for the unfortunate with the rest of the globe. The humanities and charities of Christendom are unparalleled anywhere else. Christ's whole teaching was love—love one another; love thy neighbor as thyself; love all mankind. It is dishonest to take this teaching of Christ out of its connection, and declare it a gospel of hate. It was a part of his gospel of love. Jesus was combating the narrow sympathies of Judaism, which was of hatred to all except a narrow circle in Palestine. He taught his disciples that they must leave the old doctrin and separate from its sympathies. Staying with the folks meant clinging to the old gospel of hate. This staying with the folks has always been in the way of new ideas of moral and intellectual progress. It is what made Luther an outcast; what imprisoned Galileo, burnt Bruno. Leaving the folks to follow Christ—that is, to follow the light, the truth—is what has brought us out of the theological mist of the Middle Ages, has brought about all the intellectual and scientific progress of which Mr. Ingersoll and his fellow skeptics boast."

This disciple of the loving Jesus pronounces Mr. Ingersoll guilty of intellectual dishonesty. And why? Because Mr. Ingersoll dared to pronounce this doctrin of desertion of father, mother, wife, and babies for Christ's sake a doctrin of hate. How any sane man can judge it in any other terms is a miracle. A crime like this in a civilized country meets with the severest condemnation. Desertion of this kind among decent people is a crime, and the law of justice demands the punishment of such offenders. This charge, made by the Rev. Mr. Rexford, of the church of the Father, in the city of Detroit, in the state of Michigan, against Mr. Ingersoll or any other man, is a serious one, at any rate. Good reasons should exist in making such a charge as this. Shame sometimes should doom the lips to silence, and this is a case for the exercise of this virtue of silence. When Dr. Rexford made this statement, seemingly he must hav known that he was convicting himself of this very thing in his indictment of Mr. Ingersoll. If the doctor's statement is true as to Mr. Ingersoll, it follows that Mr. Ingersoll was rationally and intellectually convinced at the time he made this utterance that consciously it was false. Yet it had a seeming truth through a disconnection from its environment. This disciple of love, and a disciple of the loving Jesus, knew enough, had seen, read, and heard enough, about Mr. Ingersoll to know that his statement was false. I hav too much respect for the unassisted intellect of Mr. Rexford to believe for a moment that it indorsed the utterances of his lips when they formulated this indictment of intellectual dishonesty against Mr. Ingersoll.

I imagin if this doctor of love is really anxious to find a case of intellectual dishonesty I can render him eminent assistance. He is in accord with Mr. Ingersoll in this, that he (Mr. Ingersoll) is endeavoring to destroy the doctrin of hell and eternal punishment. But is Dr. Rexford ignorant of the fact that if Mr. Ingersoll indorsed the Christian Bible upon which Dr. Rexford builds his "gospel of love," he would be compelled to say to Dr. Rexford, "You are 'intellectually dishonest?'" Dr. Rexford must know that the Christian Bible can be forced into the support of his doctrin only through the most shameful vilification and twisting it out of all its most consistent and reasonable meaning, and at the same time perverting the sense of the Christian world in a most disreputable manner, before he can make it support the doctrin of "a gospel of love." He is compelled to the most vicious twisting of the word of his God before he can make it accommodate his theory. He says that "it is dishonest to take Christ's doctrin out of its connection." Did anyone ever find a gospel of love in the Bible until he did the very thing which the doctor calls dishonest?

Mr. Rexford is now invited to take a look at some of the clear statements in his sacred book. The author of Dr. Rexford's gospel of love enlightens us thus: "He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the son of man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom; but the tares are the children of the wicked one. The enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burnt in the fire, so shall it be in the end of this world. The son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend and them which do iniquity; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." We must remember that this is the explanation of the parable of the sower and the seed which Christ himself gave in answer to the question as to the meaning of this parable. Can anyone not intellectually dishonest read these words of the Christ and believe that he taught "a gospel of love?" And again, this author of this gospel of love says: "The kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea and gathered of every kind, which when it was full they drew to shore and cast down, and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away. So shall it be at the end of the world. The angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire; there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth." This is in exact accord with the preceding parable, and is meaningless only in the light of the same explanation. This same author of the gospel of love goes on to say, "And fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." This is pointed and explicit. "This is the gospel of love." It is observable that the author of this gospel of love speaks in the terms of the people, in a way that seemingly leads one to believe that he was anxious to be understood. Is it possible, if this is true, that "a gospel of love" could, by the most remote implication, be true? Hear this master again: "Enter ye in at the strait gate, for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat, because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." If the gospel of the Christ was a gospel of hate, in what terms could it hav been rendered in conveying this idea more definitly than in the terms which we hav just quoted? Had his gospel been a gospel of love, the terms of this text would hav been changed so they would hav read, "Wide is the gate and broad and inviting is the way that leads unto life, and many there be that go in thereat, while narrow is the way that leads to destruction, and my love has so hedged it in, and has made it so dark and dismal, so infinitly forbidding, that none will ever go in thereat."

A man might be a believer in a "gospel of love" upon this rendering, and maintain his intellectual honesty; but take it as the words of the master evidently intended it should be, and how supremely ridiculous it is to so pervert or change this as to force it out of the field, as well as a hundred other passages of like import, that this "gospel of love" might be voiced in the pulpit! "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell." "And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off and cast it from thee; for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell." What do these scriptures mean in a gospel of love? Love knows no language like this. Reason must pronounce this a dreadful gospel. What an alarming stretch of the imagination one must hav to see in the teachings of the Christ a gospel of love that takes all in at the strait gate, when he positivly says that "there are but few that find it!" We are not left here without more consolations of like character. "When the son of man shall come in his glory, before him shall be gathered all nations; and he shall separate them, one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, and he shall set the sheep on his right, but the goats on his left; then shall the king say unto them on his right hand: Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand: Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. Then these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into eternal life." These are only a few of the many scriptures bearing upon this question of endless punishment in hell which hav, no doubt, engaged the attention of our charitable Christian doctor of divinity. What would be the rational verdict of intellectual honesty in the study of these sacred scriptures? Only one possible verdict without violence to all that is rational in the human mind; that is, if these scriptures mean anything, as they fell from the lips of the master, then that verdict must be that they teach the doctrin of endless punishment. But when Dr. Rexford makes an application of his patent Turning and Twisting Exegetical Machine to these hateful-looking scriptures, it at once turns them into a "part of the gospel of love." These scriptures are not to be taken in the terms in which they came from the Christ, but they are first to be ground through this Turning and Twisting Exegetical Machine, and the result is that hell and eternal punishment are frightened to death. Though these scriptures are all in the doctor's Bible, yet we are not to take them as they read. How unfortunate for the world that Dr. Rexford was not called up from the shadowless world of emptiness for consultation! His timely suggestion would hav called the attention of the Gods to this careless manner in the use of words. He would doubtless hav cautioned them about putting hell and damnation and eternal punishment in the Bible when there are no such things in the universe of God. What an ocean of innocent blood would hav been saved had he been there and told the Gods what they meant, especially when that revelation was meant to carry to the world such important information as the destiny of the race! That Dr. Rexford, like thousands of others, wants a better God than can be found in the Bible is evident. The Bible knows nothing about a God of love. The Bible God is uncertain; he is more likely to be angry than otherwise, he kills people upon very slight provocation, he is angry every day, he takes vengeance of them that knows him not. He in a passion one time drowned the whole earth; only one drunken man and his family were saved. He comes with pestilence, famin, plagues, earthquakes, tornadoes, cyclones, frightful storms, and reveals his Godlike traits in setting up the wholesale business in parasites, vipers, snakes, insects, who hav the ability in a thousand ways to afflict human beings; and then he has a thousand ways of making people sick and killing them finally, and consigning them to an endless hell. I do not wonder in view of these facts that Dr. Rexford feels the need of a better God. I blame him not for this. I confess that the world has so far advanced that it feels the necessity for a better God. Here is where we are compelled to convict Dr. Rexford of intellectual dishonesty. This felt need is founded upon a higher intellectual conception, and formulates a better God in the light of that higher intellectual conception, instead of perversion and twisting of the old Bible in hopes to find this better ideal therein.

Mr. Rexford knows that the Bible contains no such God as he preaches about. Why will he not confess to the world what he knows must be true to his deeper consciousness? To confess this truth would cost him his pulpit, and hence the Bible must be twisted to meet this higher ideal of a God. And with sorrow we are convinced that Dr. Rexford is guilty of intellectual dishonesty. Mr. Rexford says: "If we wish to see how much this religion of love has done for man all we hav to do is to compare Christianity and its provisions for the unfortunates with the rest of the globe. The humanities and charities of Christendom are unparalleled anywhere else." I deny that Dr. Rexford can point to a single Christian gesture through its eighteen hundred years of existence where a benefit has come to any people or nation or any individual without an element essentially unchristian. It is a fact that the Christian religion, its humanities, and its charities, owe all, where in any way it has been a benefit to any people, nation, or individual, to an antichristian potency. Its very existence to-day is a consequence of this antichristian power. There are no humanities or charities in Christianity proper. A divine changeless scheme in the presence of our changing environments is atrophied, and it can hav no conception of good whatever. Humanities and charities are human and not divine, and hav arisen in spite of Christianity. This will appear clearly evident as we take the qualitativ value of Christianity. The claims made for it by its founder must determin this question. A disciple of the Christ necessarily implies obedience to what he taught, doing what he commanded, and not doing what he prohibits, sharing his glory and suffering his disgrace. He must take up his cross and follow his Lord and master. But we will allow the founder of this gospel of love to settle this question himself: "But let your communications be yea, yea, and nay, nay, for whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil. But I say unto you that ye resist not evil, but whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also; and if any man shall sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also; and whosoever shall compel you to go a mile, go with him twain; giv to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away. I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you. If ye love them which love you, what reward hav ye? Do not even the publicans even so? Be ye therefore perfect even as your father which is in heaven is perfect. Take heed that ye do not your alms before men to be seen of them, otherwise ye hav no reward of your father which is in heaven. Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do break through and steal, but lay up for yourselvs treasures in heaven where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal; for where your treasure is there will your heart be also. Therefore I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor for your body, what ye shall put on. Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly father feedeth them. And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field how they grow; they toil not neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothed the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Therefore take no thought saying, What shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed, for after all these things do the gentiles seek. Be ye not like unto them, for your heavenly father knoweth that ye hav need of all these things, but seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for to-morrow, for to-morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Judge not that ye be not judged. Love not the world, nor the things that are in the world, for if any man love the world the love of the father is not in him. He that cometh unto me and hateth not his father and mother cannot be my disciple."

If the words of the Christ hav any meaning, we are now in possession of all the evidence necessary in determining this question—What is Christianity? The law and the testimony settle the question. These we hav given in the words of the master. It may be said that they are inconsistent and foolish. This may be true, but it is no fault of mine. I hav only given you his words, and I deny that I or any other person hav the right to change these words so as to make them reasonable, and bring them into accord with our human ideas. This would answer if we were dealing with human things, but this will not do when we are dealing with divine things; this will not do when we deal with the word of God. Dr. Rexford has no right, then, to change or reject any part of these words of the God Christ, and he is intellectually dishonest when he does this. Christ meant what he said or he did not. Are we justified in taking him at his word or are we not? We must do one or the other. Honesty seemingly demands that he should be taken and understood in the light of the position in which he claimed he stood. I claim that it is intellectually dishonest to cheat the Christ in perverting his words so that they may seem rational to us, and in such an unwarranted assumption as this, which results in the destruction of the whole scheme in its divineness. Dr. Rexford claims Christ as divine, and yet he subjects him to this extreme humiliation of being only a man, and therefore twists his words so as to make them human in sense. This is dishonest. If divine, then interpret them in the light of that divinity. "Take no thought for to-morrow what ye shall eat or drink, or wherewithal ye shall be clothed." "The gentiles do these things, be ye not like unto them." "Consider the fowls of the air, which hav neither storehouses or barns, yet your heavenly father feedeth them. How much better are ye than they!"

These words of the Christ are clear and easy of understanding, but in our divorcement from Christ they will not do. We are compelled to take thought for to-morrow; but not thus with a disciple of his, for he is forbidden strictly thus to do. A Christian cannot take thought for to-morrow without dishonoring Christ and denying him before men. Now, to play this double game of being a gentile and doing the thing which he does, and at the same time hav the benefit of thus doing, and yet be dishonest enough to hold yourself a disciple of his, is an outrage committed in the face of decency. There is only one way of honor in this matter, and that is—If we are disciples, if we call ourselvs Christians, then we ought to take his words without perversion. Not only this, we must thus do: A disciple of the Christ is not like a man of the world, he is not like a gentile; he is laying up his treasures in heaven; he takes no thought for to-morrow, his savior will provide for him. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye hav love one to another." Heavens and earth! What a burlesque to repeat this in the face of Christianity's bloody record. But be this as it may, we hav no authority to change his words.

(CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.)

What Will the Weather Be?

Allow me to present a few thoughts to your intelligent readers on the causes and character of storms, cyclones, earthquakes, auroras, etc. We claim our theory of forecasting the weather is scientific. Theory is not science, but when theory is demonstrated it then is science whether people believe it or not. Galileo proved the globular form of the earth, and that it moved in its orbit around the sun, instead of the sun whirling around the earth in twenty-four hours. His opposers would not look through his telescope to be convinced, and for teaching this astronomical fact he was shut in prison and his property confiscated. Nature holds her secrets well. Only to those who honestly and reverently seek her arcana will she unfold her laws and profound secrets. In order to giv the reader a bird's-eye view of the causes producing the various kinds of weather common to the United States and Canada, I will state they are produced by the reciprocal action of the sun and planets that circle around him. This action is electro-magnetic, and its energy is proportionate to the mass or size, the rapidity of axial and orbital motion, and the combinations of the planets at or about the same time. The sun is in the center of the solar system. He is 886,852 miles in diameter, and revolves on his axis in 25 1-2 days. He is 750 times the mass of all the planets and planetoids that sweep in silent grandeur around him, and by his positiv electric energy he controls and guides all their motions. There are nine primary planets and many secondary. Vulcan, the recently discovered planet, is a magnificent world from 35,000 to 40,000 miles in diameter, and flies around the sun in 23 days. He is about 15,000,000 miles from him and moves 138,000 miles per hour. He is, so far as known, the nearest planet to him. Mercury, the second, goes 112,000 miles per hour. Venus travels 75,000 miles per hour; earth, 68,000; Mars, 55,000; Jupiter, 30,000; Saturn, 22,000; Uranus, 15,000, and Neptune, 10,000. Jupiter is 1,400 times larger than the earth, turns on his axis in 10 hours, and his equatorial diameter is 6,000 miles greater than his polar. Saturn revolves on his axis in 10 1-2 hours, with his two magnificent rings and 7 moons.

The orbits of planets are not true circles, but elongated easterly. Their nearest point to the sun is called perihelion, and the farthest aphelion. The orbits, large and small, for convenience are divided into 360 degrees.

During fifteen years of close and careful observation it has been thoroughly and repeatedly demonstrated that when planets pass 80°, 170°, 260°, and 350°, storms occur. The energy and violence of these storms is proportionate to the numbers, mass, and velocity. In electrical science it has been abundantly proved that in all revolving bodies electricity is generated along the line of axial rotation and evolved upon their equators. So immense an orb as the sun generates inconceivable quantities of electricity, and it is evolved upon his equatorial belt of 16° in width, and from thence hurled upon flying planets as they pass these points of rapport, producing clouds, storms, cyclones, etc. The sun is positiv to his family of worlds, hence they are negativ to him, and as negativs attract the positiv at the points designated, this great celestial battery pours off his tidal electric wave upon each planet as it passes the point of excitement, to its full capacity of receptivity. The magnetic and also the strongest points are at 170° and 350° on the orbit of each planet. The electro-magnetic energy comes from space. Hence there is enough for each, enough for all, enough for evermore. Hence the perpetuity of the solar system. So we need not fear any great cataclysm, "crash of worlds, or crack of doom." Each planet generates electro-magnetic energy while in quadrature—i. e., between the storm points—and with the added force from the sun is rejuvenated and never bankrupt. This period of excitement and electric tension lasts from three to five days. This represents the period of heat, or low barometer in summer and winter, and when the combination is such as to evoke heavy charges it brings us the great thaws and break-ups in the midst of some winters, and the very hot days of some summers. The cool or cold weather that directly follows is called rising or high barometer.

These electro-magnetic vital waves, or charges, are the life of all worlds, of all living beings and things. When they hav swept the circuit of revolving orbs, vitalized, purified, stirred, and motionized all fluids and gases, they become devitalized, hence electro-negativ, and must return to the sun as the electro-positiv center for revitalization, and thence repeat their ceaseless rounds. These are the statics and dynamics, the rest and motion, the ebbs and flows, the perpetual pulsation, of omnipotent nature. This circulation of vital energy through planetary worlds is analogous to the circulation of blood in the human body. The arterial blood flows out from the heart at every pulsation red, vital, electro-positiv, laden with supplies for bodily sustenance, and when these are deposited, and effete and useless elements enter the venous channels, it becomes devitalized (dark venous blood), and hence electro-negativ, and must flow back to the lungs as the permanent positiv battery of the house we liv in. Hence this force is the cause of the circulation of the fluids in the human body. The heart, arteries, veins, and nerves are the tubular routes for its circulating energy. The return charges, from Jupiter, Saturn, and Uranus, energized by Vulcan and Mercury, produce solar explosions, sun spots, and synchronous with these telegraph wires snap and blaze, operators are shocked, etc., proving an electric origin. Our frequent storms are produced by Vulcan, Mercury, and Venus, energized and prolonged by the larger planets. Jupiter passed 170° on 26th of October last. He was the chief cause of heavy fall rains in California and elsewhere, and of potato-rot on tenacious and wet soils. Look for it the ensuing fall. Dig early. Any ordinary person can forecast the weather by having the tabulated position of planets. This is the gist of the whole question. This the "Weather Guide"* givs. The weather can be foretold. All those heavy storms of January and February were written out last year, the days designated, the planets and their combinations specified, as the "Guide" will prove.

If an electric charge is heavy, the cold following is proportionate. How valuable this knowledge to farmers, gardeners, stockmen, etc.! In Kansas alone 100,000 head of stock and 100 men perished by cold! The forecasts indicated intense cold, and a little effort would hav saved this sacrifice of life and property. Compare the dates of the destructiv storms of England, France, Spain, and Portugal, and the United States, and then say it is guesswork if you dare. Private citizens, editors, thinkers, students who had the "Guide," and took pains to observe, report wonderful accuracy from Maine to California. The last heavy snow over New England, New York, Canada, and Michigan were produced by Vulcan and Mercury, the fastest moving planets of the solar system. The wind on February 27th at Mount Washington moved 140 miles per hour; in New York city and coast of New Jersey, eighty miles per hour. Please note from the 9th to the 22d of March some very heavy storms, followed by heavy frosts, even in the Gulf states. See the "Guide" for the days and causes. The old theory of the sun's heat producing storms, cyclones, earthquakes, auroras, electric tidal waves, etc., must go. It cannot stand the test of near approach and close examination. True, the sun produces evaporation during our northern winters from tropical seas and oceans, but how does it develop high and low barometers, organize a great storm and drive it from the Rockies to the Atlantic, and propel it across the Atlantic Ocean, and dash it in terrific fury on the Eastern continent? Does the sun's heat alone do this? The sun helps produce the vapor, but planetary electro-magnetic charges organize and condense the vapors, and drive the storm over continents and around the globe? Heat does not do it. In a former article, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 30th, the salient points of this treatis were omitted, from some cause. If the reader will send and get a "Guide" for 1886, he will find a new light dawn on his pathway.

Notes.

THERE is a bill before the English Parliament granting suffrage to unmarried women. Mr. Bradlaugh has moved to amend the bill by including married women.

THE Andover Review says that the attempt to find a reconciliation between Genesis and science "sufficiently exact to be worth anything for evidential purposes is doomed to failure from the start." Exactly. Mr. Huxley makes this very clear in his answers to Mr. Gladstone.

THE last victim of Harrison, the venerable "boy preacher," is a colored woman who since her conversion is possessed by a hallucination that she must kill her husband and baby as a sacrifice. The trouble with these cranks, says the Omaha Republican, is that their hallucinations are never in the direction of killing themselvs.

MAJOR D. C. WILLIAMS is a new revivalist. He is following the path marked out by Sam Jones, startling the Christians who employ him by telling unpalatable truths. He said to a Stockton, Cal., Presbyterian assemblage that he found a church in Arkansas in which two hundred and ninety out of three hundred members did not believe all the Bible. As for himself, he believed the Bible to be all true or all false. He believed every word within its covers, "fish story and all." Mr. Williams appears to be the regulation fool.

ACCORDING to the Beacon Light, the Spiritualist journal of this city, there are among the Spiritualists of New York those who would borrow ecclesiastical machinery to make the new faith attractiv. Against this the Beacon Light protests. "Superstition and old forms," it says, "become the cowled monk, the swamp exhorter, the dishonest money-making minister, the howling dervishes, and the population of priest-ridden, church-governed countries, of which Mexico and Central America are good examples; but we hav no use for the paraphernalia or sacerdotal furniture of ecclesiasticism, its crosses, robes, holy waters, sacred hosts, incense burners, chalices, bells, printed prayers, Latin chants, masses, incantations, beads, medals, croziers, and amulets." The Beacon Light is right.

CIVIL funerals having become an institution in France, it is considered necessary to provide for the cases in which the Catholic family of a deceased Freethinker might object to compliance with his wishes on this point. A bill sent up to the Senate by the last Chamber and amended by the former was consequently discussed by the new Chamber a short time since. Its chief provision, reports the National Reformer, is that any adult or emancipated minor competent to make a will may regulate the conditions of his funeral, and may depute one or more persons to watch over their execution. Such directions expressed in a will, in a declaration before a notary, or in a memorandum in testamentary form, are to hav the same force as bequests of property, and are to be subject to the the same rules as to revocation. Bishop Freppel advocated a clause enabling the local judge to decide within twenty-four hours as to the character of the funeral, and this was eventually agreed to. Any person violating the new law is to be liable to a fine of from 16f. to 100f., and for a second offense to from two to five years' imprisonment. At the instance of M. de Mortillet, the eminent anthropologist, a clause was added enabling any person to dispose of his body in favor of educational or learned societies.

This Week's Cartoon.

In the break-up now going on in the church creeds, there are but two roads for those of unsettled faith to travel—the one to Rome, the other to Liberty. One of these roads, and the heaven it leads to, is depicted by our artist in this issue. While a few—very few—Episcopalians, like Heber Newton, hav joined the Protestants who are evoluting out of Christianity entirely, the majority are going submissivly back to Rome. Already in this country rectors are introducing Romish rites into their services, and an Episcopal monastic institution is one of the very recent acquisitions to New York piety. Both in England and America Episcopalian parochial schools are being established. Decided intimations of this retrograde movement are the Rev. Dr. Dix's Lenten sermons. Dr. Dix would hav a pope. Private judgment he likens to a lunatic asylum; its only legitimate office being to verify the dogmas of the church—nothing more. It has no right to disprove them. "When Christ came into the world the private judgment of man had no right to discuss, no power to settle questions, such as the priestly office, the promises, the commands. But men had a right to verify the miracles, to compare what he said of himself with what was written in their sacred books, to satisfy themselvs that he did really die on the cross, and, above all, to convince themselvs that he did truly rise from the dead." To those who are disposed to follow Dr. Dix back to Romanism we recommend a thoughtful study of the picture on the first page of this week's issue.

Before the New York Legislature.

While the agitation for the Sunday opening of the Museums has been going on, the graver issue of church taxation has not been lost sight of for an instant. And, unexpectedly, just as the petitions to the legislature for that purpose were ready to be presented, outside aid is offered. Upon Mr. Putnam's recent visit to the state capitol, he found, through consulting various members of the assembly, that a bill had been introduced through the efforts of members of the Constitution Club, of Brooklyn, which would giv us all we asked, and more, and when the secretary of the Union returned to New York he arranged for a meeting between the supporters of the bill and himself, the president of the Liberal Club, and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It was determined by these to support the bill, and Mr. McCabe, secretary of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, was authorized to procure a hearing before the assembly Committee on Ways and Means, to which the bill had been referred, and of which George Z. Erwin is chairman. The hearing was set down for Tuesday, the 16th. The following is the text of the bill:

"An act in relation to the taxation of property.

"The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

"SECTION 1.—The following property shall be exempt from taxation:

"1. All property, real or personal, exempted from taxation by or under the constitution of this state, or the Constitution of the United States.

"2. All property, real or personal, the title to which is, or hereafter will be, in the United States, or in this state, or in any city, county, town, or village within this state, and which is used, or intended to be used, for public purposes.

"3. All property exempted by law from execution.

"SECTION 2.—From and after the date on which this act shall take effect, all lands and all personal estate within this state, whether owned by individuals or corporations, shall be liable to taxation, except as otherwise specifically provided in Section 1 of this act. Provided, however, that the owner or holder of stock in any company liable to taxation on its capital stock or property, shall not be taxed as an individual for such stock.

"SECTION 3.—All property, both real and personal, exempted from taxation, either in whole or in part, by or under any law of this state in force before this act shall take effect (except as provided in sections 1 and 2 of this act), shall, after this act shall take effect, be assessed and valued in the same manner and upon the same basis of valuation as other property subject to taxation, and shall be taxed upon its full assessed valuation, as follows, namely: in the year 1887 at one-tenth of the rate at which other property of the same or a similar description in the same town or ward is taxed; in the year 1889 at three-tenths of such rate; in the year 1891 at five-tenths of such rate; in the year 1892 at six-tenths of such rate; in the year 1893 at eight-tenths of such rate; in the year 1895 at nine-tenths of such rate; in the year 1896, and in all subsequent years, at the full rate at which such other property is taxed, and such taxes shall be levied, collected, and applied in the same manner as taxes on other property subject to taxation.

"SECTION 4.—All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

"SECTION 5.—This act shall take effect immediately."

It is a rule of committees to grant advocates of measures before them only ten minutes, but this rule was waived on the occasion of the advocacy of this bill. The Constitution Club was represented by Samuel B. Duryea, the American Secular Union by T. B. Wakeman, and the Liberal Christians by Gilbert R. Hawes. This bill has the support of a great many unorthodox Christians and a few orthodox ones. One of its activ supporters is a director of the Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn (which association now escapes the annual payment of about $3,000 on its building in Brooklyn), and all of the members of the Constitution Club that we talked with are more or less Christian. But the burden of the argument fell naturally to the representativs of the American Secular Union. Mr. Wakeman spoke for some forty or fifty minutes, and won applause from the listeners, which was promptly checked by the committee. There is no question that the real sentiment of the assembly is in favor of this bill, but legislators hav such a fear of the religious element that we cannot expect it to pass. Public sentiment must be aroused in its favor, and the churches combated with their own weapons. "There is no use of your doing anything more about this bill," said a member of the legislature to Mr. McCabe. "Why?" asked he. "Is it not a good bill?" "Yes, good enough," replied the Solon; "but"—here he executed a complicated wink—"the members will get the tip to defeat it." To Mr. McCabe's endeavors to get him to tell who would giv the "tip," he would say nothing positiv, but intimated that the Catholic priests would be heard from on the subject. That this is so was brought out by one of the senators. A member of the Constitution Club called upon him, read the bill to him, and asked his opinion of its merits. "A good bill," was his comment. "Will you introduce it in the senate?" asked the club man. "H'm; I think you had better try to get Mr. —— to introduce the bill. Perhaps he will do it. You see" —this in a burst of confidence—"there are six Catholic institutions in my district, and if I introduce this bill I shall be killed."

There we hav the reason why the fight we hav entered upon must be a long one, renewed from year to year, and from legislature to legislature. We shall next week print the arguments of Messrs. Wakeman Duryea, and Hawes, before the committee, and we urgently beseech every Liberal in the state to scatter the papers as widely as possible. The real, solid work for this bill has got to be done by the people upon the people. Legislators are weather vanes, turning with the wind, and a hurricane of public sentiment must be aroused that will snap them around to the right position or blow them off their pedestals.

The Museums.

Very opportune for the people of this city is the action on Sunday opening of museums and libraries taken by the English House of Lords—about the only commendable action this fossiliferous body has performed for many a weary month. We print entire the cable despatch to the New York Herald. It is dated London, March 20th, and reads as follows:

"The much-mooted 'Sunday opening question' may be regarded as settled in this country. No one doubts now that soon the Commons will follow the Lords, who last evening, by a majority of fourteen, voted that 'the time has come when, in the interests of religion and education, all national collections should be opened to the public on Sunday as on other days.'

"The Archbishop of Canterbury and seven bishops, of course, voted with the church traditions of the past, in the minority. All the peers of ability voted for the measure. Lord Bramwell, better known as Mr. Justice Bramwell, made a stirring speech in favor of keeping the museums and picture galleries open on Sundays. Turning toward the primate and his fellow-bishops, he said: 'I am perfectly satisfied that it is the religious part of the matter that is at the bottom of the opposition to the motion. We are alone in Christendom in observing Sunday in the way we do.

"'The English view of Sunday is a novelty. I object to the way in which Sunday is observed, because it is a day wasted. It ought to be a day of recreation and enjoyment. There is nothing in a man's nature which tells him that it is wrong for him to enjoy himself on Sunday. The proper interpretation of the supplication, "and lead us not into temptation," is "do not lay down for us a rule for Sunday which we cannot observe."

"'Prince Bismarck has recorded that when he was in England he always had a painful impression of the English Sunday; that he was always glad when it was over, and that he was sure that many Englishmen had the same feeling. That is the condition of things that I ask the House to set about to remedy. The English Sunday is misspent. It is worse than misspent. It leads people into temptation. This is not a question of the working man only, for there are plenty of other people who are entitled to consideration. It is idle and selfish for workingmen to object to being employed on Sunday at places of recreation.'

"Several morning papers are jubilant over this victory of progress over cant, and one paper hails the vote as an evidence that the peers are waking up to the power of popular sentiment when such men as Lords Granville, Coleridge, Roseberry, Spencer, Ripon, Wolseley, Napier, Bute (the Roman Catholic convert and the original of 'Lothair'), and young Lord Houghton—his first vote—join against the archbishop."

In his pamphlet against opening the museums of this city on Sunday, Mr. Morris K. Jesup dwelt with great emphasis upon the opinion of certain Englishmen who dislike to see the people enjoy themselvs on Sundays. In fact, English opinion was the chief of Mr. Jesup's arguments, occupying six of the sixteen pages of his pamphlet. This action of the House of Lords, however, completely disposes of that imported objection, and we hav deemed it of sufficient importance to forward it to General di Cesnola, secretary of the committee of conference of the two museums, as a supplement to the eighth division of the argument sent with the petition, with the request that he submit it to the trustees as a part of that document.

In the legislature we hav found an ally in Mr. Edward P. Hagan, of the sixteenth assembly district of this city. He has introduced the following bill, which was read twice, referred to the committee on affairs of cities, reported favorably from that committee, and committed to the committee of the whole for action:

"An act to authorize further appropriations for the maintenance of the museums in the Central Park, in the city of New York.

"The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

"SECTION 1.—The department of public parks in the city of New York is hereby authorized to apply in each year for the keeping, preservation, and exhibitions of the collections in the buildings in the Central Park, that are now or may hereafter be occupied by the Metropolitan Museum of Art and the American Museum of Natural History, in addition to the sum or sums now authorized by law for such purpose, such further sum as may be appropriated therefor as hereinafter provided, not exceeding twenty thousand dollars; upon condition that, and only so long as, the collections in said museums, or either of them, shall be kept open and accessible to the public on Sundays, free of all charge, within such hours, and subject to such rules and regulations as may be agreed upon between the trustees of said museums and said department.

"SECTION 2.—The board of estimate and apportionment in said city may, in its discretion, annually include in its final estimate of the amounts required to pay the expenses of conducting the public business of the city and county of New York for the then next ensuing financial year, the additional sum specified in the last preceding section, or any smaller sum for the purposes in said section provided.

"SECTION 3.—For the purpose of providing funds to enable said department of public parks to carry out the provisions of Section 1 of this act during the current year, said board of estimate and apportionment is hereby authorized to set apart from any of the moneys appropriated for the uses of said department for the present year such sum or sums not exceeding in all the sum of twenty thousand dollars, as in the judgment of said board the occasion may require.

"SECTION 4.—This act shall take effect immediately."

The trustees will see by the bill that they can obtain five thousand dollars a year extra from the city if they open their doors upon Sundays, and another of Mr. Jesup's chief arguments—additional expense—is therefore of no force. Indeed, if anybody was ever thoroughly answered by facts and logical reasoning, it is the trustees of these museums as represented by Mr. Jesup, president of one of them. We think it will be difficult for them to find reasons for refusing to make the experiment.

In the Senate another ally is found in Senator Daly, chairman of the committee on cities, before which committee is a bill to appropriate money for extending the museum buildings. "The friends of the bill," said Mr. Daly to a reporter, "hav urged upon me the necessity for this improvement. I hav told them all, however, that they can only gain my consent to allowing the bill to go out of the committee by persuading the trustees to open the museum on Sunday Unless the museum is opened on Sunday, I think that bill will never see the light of the Senate."

In a book of mingled myth and history, there is an account of a stiff-necked king who saw, at a feast, mysterious characters upon the wall. They were a prophecy which was fulfilled in the death of the king and the possession of his country by a Median.

There is a lesson in the ancient legend that the trustees of the museums may profit by.

Is a Great Injustice Being Done?

When the American contingent of the Circumpolar Observation party returned there was probably not a man in the civilized world who did not feel for all the members composing the party the profoundest pity. It will be the part of some historian, perhaps now unborn, to fix the responsibility for the misfortunes upon some one or more persons, or it may be upon this nation. On whomsoever it rests that memory will be scarred, and it may be indelibly blackened, while the memory of the events remains with man. Had we navigation laws that make our navy inefficient? Had luxury or greed of gain made us an unmanly nation, that we abandoned brave soldiers of science to perish in the relentless ice? Was the secretary of war inefficient or careless? These are questions that we may in the hurry of business forget; but like the oft-quoted ghost they will not down, and damning to some one or more persons will be the answer. We may ignore them, but years hence, it may be, some German historian, perhaps, with their terrible thoroughness will unravel and uproot till the truth is known.

But though there was probably not a person in the land who knew of it who had not the profoundest and most sorrowful sympathy for them in the indescribable sufferings they underwent, concerning them the truth ought to be told with unpitying justice. As to the charge of cannibalism it might be said that there may be times when the best use a dead body can serve is to be eaten. If true it was a misfortune and a disgrace to us as a nation for allowing the circumstances that required it; the worse because it never occurred in any other Arctic expedition. A man was shot to death, which never occurred in any other expedition. If a struggle of starving men over food caused this, is it not our disgrace or some public servant's?

There was an enthusiastic Arctic explorer in the party, a devotee of science, whose services were confessedly of prime value in keeping the party in health. His body alone, of all who perished, is not brought back. His death occurs on the day the other man is shot to death. We understand that he was compelled by force to giv up to Greely a private journal that he was keeping for his wife; that for his first refusal he was court-martialed, put under arrest. His widow who supported herself by her own labors while her husband was giving his life for science and the glory of this republic, and who is the daughter of a Protestant clergyman, and who has struggled through every adversity to vindicate her dead husband's memory, begins in this (March) number of the North American Review an article on the subject. It will be followed by the Arctic journals, or a part of them, kept by Doctor Pavy. It is a sad, a disagreeable affair; and we approach it in a spirit of fairness to all. But we think it pertinent to ask, What became of the journal taken from Dr. Pavy? Surely there lives not a man who would blot out the just fame of another to exalt himself?

A Worthy Enterprise.

We received not long ago the following card from the well-known philanthropist whose name is attached:

"NEW YORK, Feb. 28, 1886.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you do so much for the interest of the Free Reading Rooms and Library at 141 Eighth street as to send a reporter there to investigate a work that needs and seems to me deserves the attention of a generous public? And oblige thereby,

"ELIZABETH THOMPSON."

The apartment at 141 Eighth street occupied as the Free Reading Room and Library is the one rendered historic by the late D. M. Bennett's labors and his arrest by the infamous Anthony Comstock. Here, before the Liberal publishing business had grown as bulky as it is now, Mr. Bennett had his editorial sanctum and book store. The appearance of the room upon first opening the door brings up recollections of the old days, the walls being lined now as then with books and papers. The room formerly occupied by the printers, together with the one adjoining in the rear, the partition between having been removed, is now used by the Central Labor Union as a meeting place.

The library, founded chiefly through the efforts of Mr. Julius Bordollo, secretary and organizer of Branch V. of the Socialistic Labor Party, contains at present from three hundred to four hundred volumes. Many of the books are not new. They are in English, German, and French, and treat mainly of social and scientific subjects. Marx, Lassalle, Henry George, and Herbert Spencer are well represented. A bright new copy of "Rational Communism," from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, is conspicuous, and more works from the same source will follow. Here is a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason," and there are Ingersoll's "God's," Volney's "Ruins," Meslier's "Superstition in all Ages," and Reade's "Martyrdom of Man." There is also a fair sprinkling of novels. The books are all gifts to the library, and bear the names of the donors. Mrs. Cynthia Leonard, Julius Bordollo, and Mr. Pfeister are prominent contributors.

Among the hundred or more newspapers, labor journals are the most numerous, and Freethought papers are next. THE TRUTH SEEKER's exchange list is almost duplicated. Of course Liberty is there, with the Alarm, La Revolté, the Proletariat, and the Freidenker. Der Arme Teufel is the singular name of a German paper. The Herald of Life and of the Coming Kingdom was the only religious journal noted, though there may be others. Two Bibles were gathering dust on a top shelf.

On the wall is a list of donations to the library, with room for more. Here occur the names of Henry George, who givs $5; Dr. Rylance, $10; the Central Labor Union, $10; and Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, who contributes an even $50. Others swell the sum to the neighborhood of $125.

The Free Reading Room and Library has now been in existence a little more than three months. During that time an average of about thirty visitors for each day hav shared its benefits. The librarian is Miss Anna Johnson, who has thus far attended to the duties of that position without remuneration. This library is the only place of the kind in the city where the working man can feel at home, and where he can find the literature in which he is and ought to be most interested. The managers, of course, are free to confess that they stand in need of more literature, and solicit contributions of books from those able to giv them. Donations in money toward the support of the enterprise are also appreciated. This Free Reading Room and Library should not be permitted to languish.

THE reading-room of the public library in Detroit is now open on Sundays. The experiment promises well, the attendance being large, and consisting of young men who hav heretofore had nowhere to go except to church, and those institutions, a Detroit paper says, never saw their faces. Expressions of satisfaction from the visitors were earnest and general, and when the opening is more widely known the capacity of the room will be severely tried. The quiet and order which prevailed rendered it difficult to distinguish between the reading-room in the public library and the study of any well-regulated house. We recommend these facts to the attention of the trustees of the New York museums and the Mercantile Library.

WE cannot accomplish the objects of the following letter, from the present editor of the Nashville Liberal, better than by printing it:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 12, 1886.

E. M. MACDONALD, Dear Sir: I wish you would say in your next issue that I desire to get a stone for my father's grave. It will cost $50. Tell the friends of the Liberal cause to giv me a helping hand, as I am poor, and father left me without any means to defray the funeral expenses. Please hav all letters directed to W. W. Bailey, 135 South Cherry street, and oblige

Your friend. W. W. BAILEY.

Surely no further words are needed in this case.

JUDGING from the various reports we hav received of Mr. Charles Watts's lectures we should conclude that his recent tour in the states has been most satisfactory to him. While his audiences in small places hav been large, in the principal cities, such as Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, etc., the halls hav been packed. We understand that for the next five Sundays he lectures in Toronto, Ontario, and during each week he speaks in various places throughout the dominion. We congratulate the first vice-president of the American Secular Union on his marked success.

FRIENDS to the number of sixty gathered last Monday evening at the residence of Dr. Foote, of Lexington avenue, to celebrate the seventy-fourth anniversary of the birth of Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews. Speeches were made, and it was a pleasant party. This custom of celebrating the birth of public benefactors while they are yet living and able to appreciate the act is a good one. Mr. Andrews is one of those characters whose contributions to the education of the world hav sent it a long step ahead. It is doubtful if, a thousand years hence, it may not be truthfully said, "And there arose not a prophet since in the universe like unto him."

MR. HERBERT SPENCER has contributed a most important original article to the Popular Science Monthly for April on the limits and interpretation of the doctrin of natural selection, and the position of Mr. Charles Darwin in respect to the theory of evolution. There hav been so much confusion and exaggeration upon this subject as to make desirable an authoritativ statement of Mr. Darwin's just claims in connection with the doctrin of evolution, and no man, says Mr. Youmans, is so capable of making this estimate as Herbert Spencer. The paper will be elaborate and striking, and is certain to be very widely read.

"AGNOSTIOUS" will please accept our thanks for his donation of $5 toward the illustrations; W. Whittick, for an equal amount; E. Chope, for $3.25; Rufus Perkins, for $1; James B. Gay, for 75 cents; W. J. Tobin, for $2.50; Horace L. Fairchild, for $2; Warren M. Beales, for $1; A. J. Bell, for 25 cents; David Fleming, for 50 cents; I. C. Singer, for 90 cents; Darius Harris, for 50 cents; Wm. Courson, for $1; Fred. Garing, for 25 cents; S. T. Williams, for 40 cents; Michael Secrist, for 75 cents; Morris Johnson, for $1; W. W. Treat, for 25 cents; Anti-Bigot, for $5; George Thorne, for $2; A. N. Burgess, for $5; Zenas Kent, for $1; Rufus Middleton, for $1; John D. Powers, for $2; J. M. Hagaman, for $1. So far, those who like the pictures are greatly in majority over the critics.

J. E. REMSBURG spoke in Baltimore on Sunday, the 14th inst., to a large and enthusiastic audience. Lengthy reports of his lecture appeared in both the American and the Sun. From Baltimore Mr. Remsburg went to Washington, where he was the guest of his friend, Senator Ingalls. While there he met President Cleveland. He also attended a session of the Supreme Court, and visited both houses of Congress. He was particularly pleased to hear the chaplain of the House pray God to "deliver us from superstition," and thinks the first step in that direction should be the abolition of chaplaincies. Twenty-two years ago, Mr. Remsburg marched through Baltimore with a musket on his shoulder and a Bible in his pocket. Mr. Remsburg expected to reach home March 27th. Since the beginning of the lecture season last fall he has traveled fourteen thousand miles and delivered one hundred and fifty lectures. He goes to Texas next month.

ARCHBISHOP CORRIGAN has promulgated the following regulations for the observance of Lent by the Catholics in this archdiocese:

1. All the week days of Lent from Ash Wednesday till Easter Sunday are fast days of precept on one meal, with the allowance of a moderate collation in the evening.
2. General usage has made it lawful to drink in the morning some tea or coffee.
3. The precept of fasting implies also that of abstinence from the use of flesh meat, but by dispensation the use of flesh meat is allowed in this diocese at any time on Sundays and at the principal meal on Mondays, Tuesdays, and Thursdays, with the exception of Holy Thursday.
4. It is not allowed to use flesh meat and fish at the same meal.
5. Lard may be used in preparing fish, vegetables, etc.
6. The church excuses from the obligation of fasting (but not of abstinence from flesh meat, except in special cases of sickness or the like) the following persons:

Young persons under the age of twenty-one years, the sick, those whose duties are of an exhausting or laborious character, women in pregnancy or nursing infants, all who through weakness can not fast without great prejudice to their health.

We are a little late in printing this, and some of our readers may hav violated its provisions, but perhaps they can catch up by omitting the moderate collation in the evening. Or they may make affidavit that their labors are of an exhausting nature.

Letters from Friends.

NEW YORK, March 15, 1886.

DEAR EDITOR: I hav received by mail the following notice, and I want you to help me spread it. Obscene literature should be put down:

TAKE NOTICE.

Any person to whose knowledge the dissemination of any kind of obscene matters, circulars, etc., by mail or otherwise may come, will render great assistance to the cause by sending such obscene matter, etc., with all particulars as to where it came from, with the letter or envelope inclosing the same, to

ANTHONY COMSTOCK,
Secretary of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, 150 Nassau street, New York City.

I am glad I got the notice; yea, more than glad, and I invoke good Mr. Comstock's aid right away. Last week when I came home from work—I am employed in compounding vaseline and salicylic acid in a soap-boiling establishment—I found a book on the table, which, in answer to this, I forward to Mr. Comstock. There are no wrappers or envelopes, or I would send them. I asked my wife where the book came from, and she said it was left by a lady. I turned over the leaves and began to read. The first part told about a naked man and woman in a garden who were not ashamed. I skipped that, as my eldest daughter was looking over my shoulder. Then I read, a few pages along, about a man named Joseph being taken to a captain's house and the captain's wife making improper proposals to him. There is a picture of this in the east gallery of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. I lost a day last week, and went up to see the museums. Sunday I was there, but the doors were not open. This picture is just at the entrance of the outer gallery. The woman's clothes are falling off, but she get's Joseph's coat and perhaps puts it on. I turned over the leaves of the book pretty rapidly when I saw my daughter reading this story, and I hit a chapter headed "Sundry Laws for Men-Servants." Thinks I, here's a treatis on domestic, if not political, economy which may be useful. It said that when a servant was purchased, he should serve six years, but the seventh he should go free. This was a new scheme of emancipation, and I was just thinking of sending the book to Dom Pedro, of Brazil, as an aid to him in freeing the slaves, but I read further that if a servant survives a flogging for a day or two, the master shall not be punished, and I thought, perhaps, Dom Pedro might get cruel ideas from the book, so I didn't send it. Then I read, further along, about somebody the writer—his name is not given—called the Lord burning up two men because they put cologne on a fire. I didn't think that was right, and turned down some more leaves. My daughter read, "And the man that lieth with——" I saw the verse, and you bet I skipped along. I found a chapter about the Midianites being defeated. Oh, thinks I, this is a description of some battle, so I paused. The story is of some general named Moses, who killed all the tribes he warred against. Then he made the conditions of peace. I read the stipulations: "But all the women children that hav not known a man——" Again I turned over the leaves. My daughter's eyes were bulging, and I said to her to go and help her mother with the dinner. She went, and I continued to read. I found a story of a king who saw a woman in her bathroom naked, and he sent for her and took her because her form pleased him. Another was about a young man and a girl named Tamar. Another was about a Mormon with seven hundred wives and three hundred mistresses. Jingo! thought I, he must be as rich as a Washington Senator—only they don't hav but one wife, and I don't know how many mistresses. There were a lot more of just such stories, and I got tired of reading. The book was in two parts, and I thought perhaps the second part might be different. But the first story I read, after a lot of names from some Jewish "Burke's Peerage," was about a young woman being enceinte without the knowledge of her husband, and I threw the book down, breaking one of the covers right in two.

Just then my daughter came to say dinner was ready, and, seeing the book on the floor, stooped and picked it up. I took it away from her, and locked it up in the bureau drawer. "Wife," I asked, when we sat down to dinner, "Who brought that book here?" "A lady," she replied, "who said she was a city missionary." "That can't be true," I said; "she was playing it on you. It must be some advertising scheme. Missionaries go out to do good." "That's what she said, at any rate, and she talked just like a Sunday-school teacher I heard when I was a girl. She asked me if we had a Bible in the house, if we went to church, if the children went to Sunday-school, and if we loved Jesus. She must be a missionary." "Well," I said, "I'll see who prints the book," and I unlocked the drawer and looked at the title-page of the book. This is the imprint, I think you publishers call it:

NEW YORK
AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY.
Instituted MDCCCXVI.

I was astonished. We took up a collection down in the shop a while ago to help the Bible society to send books to the heathen, and as our boss recommended it—indeed, we had to do it, or he would hav discharged us—I thought it must be a good thing. It couldn't be possible, I exclaimed, that Mr. Tollgate sent this book to anybody. Why, it's abominable!

The next morning I started early, so as to find out where the Bible House is. I found it. It is a large brick building near Cooper Institute (where they teach shorthand and drawing free), and takes up the whole square between Third and Fourth avenues and Eighth and Ninth streets. Mr. Comstock can easily find the place. The office was not open, and the watchman told me the clerks didn't get down till 10 o'clock. But I got our foreman to let me off an hour earlier, and I went there on my way home, and asked to see a Bible. A man with a white necktie handed me one, and said he hoped I would read it. I opened it at the beginning, and there was the same story about a man and a woman in a garden, and about the captain's wife, just as the picture in the museum shows it. It was the same book, and I told the man with the white necktie that I guessed I didn't want the book. "Do you hav people circulating these books," I asked, "who call themselvs city missionaries?" "Yes," he said, "we employ a good many missionaries to canvass the city and leave the Bible in families who hav not got them." "Well," I said, for I was mad, "if you leave another one at my house I'll bring it here and stuff it down your throat. I want my wife to be a good woman, and my children to grow up virtuous."

When I got home I told my wife that she was right. The woman was a missionary. Then I unlocked the bureau drawer again, took the book out, and was going to the kitchen to put it in the stove, when my wife handed me Mr. Comstock's notice. So I hav sent it to him, and told him just where to find the publishing house. If I knew where the woman livs who sent it, I would tell him, so he could arrest her. If he could get her in Mr. Benedict's court, I know he would imprison her, and, as Mr. Comstock says, the world is better off without such people as distribute obscene literature.

I giv you all these particulars so if some fellow in the post-office should steal my letter to him Mr. Comstock can know just where to find the fellows who sent the book. I hope he will get Mr. Ducret to write for a copy, and then imprison the Bible Society agent.

Yours against obscene literature, MOX.

BOONTON, N. J., March 9, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The first meeting of the Boonton Secular Union was on the 9th of March. Hubert Booth gave an essay on the "Nine Demands of Liberalism," which gave great satisfaction. We hav fifteen members, and hope to hav more in a short time. Mr. Reynolds is a fine speaker, and Mrs. Reynolds is splendid. They are liked very much in Boonton. Yours truly, A. M. B.

PARSONS, KAN., Feb. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: For the first time in many years we hav been fortunate enough to hav three lectures by Mr. J. L. Andrews on "Modern Infidelity," for which our people giv him credit, and will make arrangements to hav him come again before long. We hav many Liberals, as in many other places, who are quiet for fear of their business, but at some future day they may come to the conclusion that it is their duty to come forward and help keep church and state separate.

Mr. Andrews secured you several subscribers for your paper. W. M. BLAU.

CATHLAMET, W. T., Feb. 21, 286.

MR. EDITOR: At last I can report from our League. We had a lecture Friday evening, the 19th, at the hall, delivered by Mr. Bruce Polworth, one of our League brothers, entitled, "Infidelity—Its Aims and Uses," and a very enjoyable evening was spent. Mr. Polworth is a young man of rare promis as a lecturer, and intends devoting his life to the cause he so ably advocates; and Freethought gains an enthusiastic recruit. May we obtain many more of the same kind. After the lecture the secretary obtained the names of three more for membership, making a total of twenty-eight members, with prospects of still more.

I hope Mr. Putnam will come as far West as Portland, Oregon, this fall, at least; also Mr. Remsburg. Hoping that you will succeed in your task of freeing the minds of people from superstition, I am

Yours for love of truth, LIDA I. ALBERT,
Secretary Walikeakum County, W. T., Liberal League.

GENESEO, ILL., March 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: J. E. Remsburg has come and gone. He delivered three lectures, "Sabbath-Breaking," "Bible Morals," and "False Claims." In spite of the very muddy roads and the large orthodox element, he had good audiences. A large hall (the best in the city) was nearly full, and they all seemed well satisfied. Geneseo is full of churches and church-goers, there being only two outspoken Freethinkers in the place that I know of, and a population of nearly four thousand. Yet, with all the ministers on the alert to keep the crowd away, even instituting prayer-meetings on Sunday afternoons while the second lecture was being delivered, the crowd came and listened with rapt attention while Mr. Remsburg in his earnest, candid way presented truths to them new and strange. A Mr. Ostrum and wife, living near Galoa, some thirty miles away, seeing a notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Mr. Remsburg's lecture, came on the cars to hear him, they and myself being the only ones that met Mr. Remsburg at the depot. Sorry there are no Liberals living in Geneseo to welcome them to their homes.

Right here I wish to say, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 20th Mrs. Sarah Metzger writes, among other good things she says, "And here let me say any Liberals traveling this way or in this vicinity will be welcome guests at our house." I wish to thank her for such sentiments, and say further, to her in particular, and all good Liberals, I and wife extend the same invitation. We liv five miles northwest of Geneseo, Ill., north side of Green river, where we will be pleased to see our Liberal friends at any time.

Taking it all in all, Mr. Remsburg made a good impression in our town, and his candid, gentlemanly bearing won him many friends, and many express a desire to hear him again in the near future. I hear the Episcopal minister has delivered a sermon in his church demolishing Mr. Remsburg and his logic, and fully, in his own estimation at least, settled the divine claims of his God-inspired book. I think he was hit, else he would not flutter. With many good wishes, I remain, Yours, etc., L. G. BARNES.

HOMER, N. Y., Jan. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please giv me a small space in your more than valuable paper, as I hav taken your valuable sheet for seven or eight years and hav never asked the favor before? I will say on the start that I am a Spiritualist of the first water, having been converted to it while I was a member of a close Baptist church; not going after it, for it came to me in my own home, and through the mediumship of a daughter of mine, then eight or nine years old. She was a rapping medium, and also writing tests of all kinds were given through her to strangers and all that called at our home, and for years people came from ten to thirty miles around to get communications from their friends on the other side. Through her I received all the tests I ever desired, and of course I did not keep my standing in the church, as I could not and be a Spiritualist; and as I could not go back on my own senses and knowledge of what I knew to be truth, I left the church. They called it heresy. Now I wish to say here that I hav had all and every test that I hav ever desired, and through my own organism, for I am mediumistic myself. I hav attended spiritual gatherings and materializations, and hav had the opportunity to detect fraud if it was practiced; and only in two cases hav I detected fraud. These pretended mediums are more properly tricksters, and as Miss Ella E. Gibson has spoken of one of them as being connected with "Bottom Facts," I will say here that I am acquainted with John Truesdell, and know that he is a medium and a trickster both; hav known him for twenty years and over, and I would like to ask why she and also Elmina are willing to take his statement that he does it and not put him to the test. There was just such a man came here two years ago and advertised himself as going to knock Spiritualism all endways. He and his wife were both mediums, and they gave out that they would demonstrate to the audience that all was a mere trick, and he would show how it was done. He had a cabinet in our Opera House and all our clergymen came. The hall was filled, but he kept putting them off as to showing them how some of his phenomena were done until the last night, but failed to show them. This Professor Star wanted to buy a horse and buggy, and I had a horse and buggy to sell, and I told him I would make a proposition, and made it to him before the audience. It was this: I had seen a medium, Horatio Eddy, go into a cabinet with his coat sewed up in front to his chin, and bound with cords tightly bound all over; saw him go into a cabinet, and in less than fifteen seconds the cabinet door opened and his coat came out on the floor, and he was bound with cords as when he went in, and his coat also sewed up as before. Now this was the offer I made Professor Star: That if he would go into the cabinet in the same condition that H. Eddy did and produce the same trick, as he called it—and I said I don't know but you may do it in the cabinet—but if you will take your chair out and place it before the audience and do the same thing and show it all to be a trick, then I will at once hitch up my horse and buggy and you can take it as a trophy of your exploits. I hav promised myself a great many times within the past year that I would say a few words as regards Spiritualism and Materialism, but of course I hav no sympathy with Materialism.

But we are all seeking for another end, that is, the liberation of this country from the thraldom of superstition, and are seeking to place in power men who will all see that those Nine Demands are accomplished, call for and giv to woman the ballot, and stay Catholicism where it is and destroy its power in toto. Mr. Editor, as I am an unlettered man I want you to correct all my mistakes, and, if you can get my meaning, giv me this privilege in your paper, and I wish to say here that I will accept your kind offer on the paper from another year on, and before my subscription is out I will send you the five dollars, and would order some pamphlets if I had your catalog. Please send it now. As I hav said, look this over and write it up in shape so it will read more intelligently. I will be glad. I am much pleased with the pictures on the outside of your paper. I think the "Spider and the Fly" is just the best thing I ever saw, and to Miss Susan H. Wixon I hav a thousand thanks for what she is doing for the children. May THE TRUTH SEEKER liv to overthrow superstition. A. BATES.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., March 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It is not very often we see in your "Letters from Friends" a communication from Syracuse, and then from Mrs. Colman or John Truesdell. The former I hav never met, but Truesdell I am slightly acquainted with, and know him to be one of the leading men of this city, and especially in all that pertains to charity, and know that he givs to the poor of this city more than all the profits he ever realized from the sale of his book, "Bottom Facts." I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for four years, and I am more than pleased with its illustrations, and think your experiment in that line a success. I wish we had more men of the stamp of T. Winter and John Truesdell to tear away from the skirts of Liberalism such hangers-on as Spiritualists. Liberalism can never be a success until it cuts itself loose from and ignores all superstitious "isms." This city is full of Freethinkers, but has no organized body, and we hav very few lectures. Yours as a truth seeker, H. M. C.

IOWA CITY, IA., Feb. 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of January 2, 1886, you ask: Where was God at the time of the Nanticoke mine disaster in Pennsylvania, when so many of the inhabitants of this planet were suffocated with the foul air that their God had prepared for that purpose? In answering that question I am a little perplexed, as I sometimes think there must be several gods who are watching over the affairs of this earth. I am sure one of the gods is here in Iowa this winter. I will tell you why: Some two years ago the people of Iowa passed a law prohibiting the sale of liquor in this state. Since then the Prohibition people hav been praying to their God to come down and enforce it. They do not try to enforce it themselvs, as they say it will ruin their business. The devil has retained all of the lawyers of any note, and the most of the judges. Now their only recourse is to get God to come down from his home in heaven and go to work and whip out the devil and his army of followers in Iowa.

I am informed by as good authority as there is in this city —men who claim to hav been captains and recruiting officers for some years—that God has actually gone to work to remove the curse from the state. I see that the devil is likewise hard at work recruiting his army for the battle that is momentarily expected to come off. The devil has sent Beelzebub to Iowa City to look after the recruiting officers. They hav already opened forty-two places, which are kept open from six o'clock in the morning until twelve at night. His headquarters are at Des Moines, and will be until after the legislature adjourns.

The Prohibition army hav opened some twelve recruiting offices, where they are hard at work recruiting their ranks; some three or four keep their offices open through the week, but the balance only open about once a week. They are very particular whom they enlist, as the uniforms must be kept very clean and neat. Should a recruit come in who cannot purchase a good uniform, and cannot contribute pretty well to pay the expenses of the officers God has sent here to run these recruiting offices, they do not encourage him to come around very often. They usually take a recruit on six months' trial. During that time should he learn the tactics so he can repeat them over in response to the drill sergeants, and keeps his uniform neatly cleaned, respond to roll-call every week, pay the amount required to keep up the headquarters, mess, and regimental band, then they muster him in and enter him on the muster rolls of the army of God. If he is unable to perform these duties he is requested to keep out of the camp or go back and be trained awhile longer in the awkward squad. Some time ago they were not so particular as to whom they recruited. They took all good, ablebodied men, regardless of their financial condition. But now they are compelled to take only people who can keep up with the times. As soon as the army is properly recruited they will make an attack upon the camp of the enemy (provided their God will lead them in person) and drive the devil and his gang clean out of the state. They never will stop this side of Chicago—the last ditch.

The department commander has detailed St. John, the Prohibitionist, to go to hell for the purpose of trying to induce the brimstone makers to strike for more wages. If it can be effected, the new recruits from Wall street and the Chicago Board of Trade will put up a corner on sulphur which will bull the market and compel the devil to leave Des Moines and go back to look after the market. In that way the Prohibition army will surround the capitol. The noise they will make by the blowing of their horns will cause the walls to tumble, leaving them free to murder every man in the camp, and every male child, and save the women for the wives of their young men. The soldiers of the devil caught one of their lawyers in the ranks of the enemy, blowing his bugle for Prohibition. The prisoner was captured, court-martialed, and sentenced to be tarred all over, decorated with three goose quills in honor of his profession. The temperance people are looking on with a great deal of interest to see the outcome of the battle. Should the outposts report anything serious, the temperance people will declare an armistice, stop the fighting, place a heavy revenue on all liquors sold in the state, and in that way once more restore peace and harmony.

OLD SOLDIER.

NEWPORT, ME., March 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Of the very many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER I doubt if any one has thought more intensely than I hav on those truly cheering words of Frederic Harrison in his paper on "The Religion of Humanity," printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 23d. Alone with myself I reviewed my life, and asked myself, Hav I lived for others? What a grand theme for contemplation! and how shall we "liv for others?" I venture to say that if even one-half of the human family unselfishly lived for others, not a pauper-house or a prison, nor a house of prostitution, nor a disgraceful army or navy, no crime or intemperance, no sickness or sorrow, would be in all this wide world.

Again I ask, What is it to liv for others? Did Mr. Harri- think deep when he .penned those mighty meaning words? Now let us honestly see what we must do to liv for others. Those who unselfishly liv for others cannot bind by law anyone in any of the business transactions of life. All business must be carried on on the principle of love instead of for gain. Taking pay for the use of money, no matter how small the compensation, will not be thought of for a moment. Those who liv for others cannot take pay for preaching truth. Those who liv for others will not be bound by, or conform to, man-made laws, but will be a "law unto themselvs." Those who liv for others will come out from this mad, insane world, and devote every moment of their lives for the good of others.

No person who livs for others will engage in any business the effect of which is injurious to anyone. Could this grand principle be put into practice to-day, not a bar-room would open to-morrow, not an ounce of tobacco would be touched at all, and every stalk would be left standing in the field.

To liv for others would require everyone to hav clean stomachs, and cease to keep and eat earth's abomination—filthy swine.

To liv for others, not a manufactory in the world would run over six hours a day. To liv for others is to inaugurate the reign of human brotherhood here on this earth, and when human brotherhood is lived out practically, coöperation and community life will be in practice elsewhere. When people come to community life, buying and selling, weighing and measuring, relics of barbarism, will be unknown, and money, the world's great curse, will be abolished forever. (In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 6th is a poem entitled "Gold." Its importance can never be told. At least twenty-five years ago my eyes began to be opened to see what is now perfectly clear, that "the one devil to be destroyed is money." And that poem proves the truth of what I hav many times said, that I never advanced an important truth, no matter how "crazy" it might be called, but I hav lived to see it indorsed by others. Now this poem, by J. H. Hollins, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, fully confirms it.)

When this glad day dawns on this earth, cities, those great cesspools of corruption, will be depopulated. When men universally liv for others, all night travel on land will cease, and tired man and beast will rest, as nature designed. The wise will understand.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

P.S.—Since writing the above, the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is at hand, and what a splendid treat for the low price of twenty-five cents! And as I read the story of "The Curate of Churnside," and came to the words, "But he had forgotten to reckon with himself," I felt that in that one sentence I had ample remuneration for the cost of the book. If all children were taught that some time in their lives they must "reckon with themselvs," instead of having to giv an account to an unknown God, whom they will never meet, not a disgraceful prison in all the land would long be seen, and gradually poverty and crime would disappear. And those beautiful words to the children in the Westminster Secular School, printed under the heading of "Editorial Notes" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 23d, "Be good, be honorable, be true, and let your speech be pure," ought to be printed in golden letters and hung on the walls of every school-room and private dwelling in the world. How many children taught such elevating words would ever become inmates of a prison? I venture to say not one in many thousands.

I hav read with great interest the account in the ANNUAL of the arrest of the saviors of the world, especially that of D. M. Bennett, nature's grandest production, but fail to see the names of E. H. Heywood and Seward Mitchell. The two most honored names that will be remembered in history are D. M. Bennett and E. H. Heywood, and while the former cannot be mentioned too often, the latter must never be forgotten, for his services for humanity are too great to be carelessly passed by as long as tyranny sits enthroned in church and state.

S. M.

YUBA CITY, CAL., Feb. 18, 286.

DEAR FRIEND AND EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I will acknowledge the receipt of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, also a few words to be placed in the columns of Letters from Friends, should it escape the waste basket. I hav read a good deal in the last fifteen years, but I must confess that I never was so interested by simply the reading of a book until two years ago last January, when I got hold of and read two books written by Thomas Paine, the "Age of Reason" and "Rights of Man." I had my doubts several years ago. I joined the Christian or Campbellite church. After that I read for myself, and the more I read the less I believed the minister that preached to us. I don't believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God Almighty, no more than it is my word. What is good and edifying I accept, but what is obscene and hurtful to the minds of our children, I say, Away with it.

The preachers are preaching against crime and vice, using the Bible as their bludgeon to annihilate Satan and all crime. The preachers are the greatest blasphemers and criminals in our fair land. They accuse and proclaim from the pulpit to their congregation that God through the Holy Ghost came to this earth and betrayed a virgin. I am not very good, but I never accuse or blaspheme the name of the deity in any such language as that. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER so well that I cannot do without it. When the papers come Saturday THE TRUTH SEEKER is the first. I want to see the illustrations of Watson Heston; they speak louder and with more force than words.

I hav not read the ANNUAL all through yet. I see some items of historic fame that I never saw before. I want so much to be among that goodly number who are trying to break down the walls of superstition; but all that I can do at present is to take your paper, for I am a poor man. The people are indifferent to any reform. Not one-fourth of the people go to church in this neighborhood? They seem to hav a prejudice against Col. R. G. Ingersoll and Thomas Paine. Ask them if they ever read any of their works, they will tell you, No, and don't want to. They will also say there is too much spiritual reading to suit them. I wish your paper and all other Secular reforms prosperity and success.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $8.50, and apply as directed. It is the hardest thing imaginable to get subscribers for a Liberal paper. Though you may find people to agree with you that Mohammedanism is a bubble, Christianity a false light, and Judaism full of miracles that could not be explained and a million to one that they are all falsehoods, yet the truth is an unwelcome visitor to them all. We had this winter two revival meetings here. The first was an English lady's. She held a revival here before Christmas, and I attended to learn if there was anything new about it. I found the same old stock in trade, frightening the people with death-bed scenes and telling them of the endless tortures of hell, but the converts they gained by it were a remarkable lot. Boys and girls between the ages of ten and fifteen years were in the majority: the rest were intellectually bankrupt. I hav been very much pleased to read the many letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, but above all come Mrs. Slenker's. Did we hav many of her stamp, priestly superstition and spiritual humbug would be of short duration. The TRUTH SEEKER pictures are admired by all Liberals, but I showed "The Spider and the Fly" to a church-member, and he pronounced it more truth than poetry. Hoping you will continue them, I remain, Yours respectfully, C. L. SILVERMAN.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., March 14, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Tally one for H. Clay Luse. The ninety and nine had expressed their approbation, and the monotony was becoming painful. In the nature of things somebody ought to kick. Who should the kicker be? The finger of fate soon solves the problem, and points to H. Clay Luse as the "chosen vessel."

And so H. Clay Luse don't like the pictures! And he thinks it the greatest mistake THE TRUTH SEEKER ever made. Not so, my brother; it was the greatest hit THE TRUTH SEEKER ever made, and it is the sharpest arrow in her well-filled quiver.

The idea of cartooning the enemy was an "inspiration" from "on high," and I almost cried for joy when I saw the grand, heroic old TRUTH SEEKER stock her arsenal with this, the most effectual weapon of modern warfare.

What if the colors are vivid? The truth demands and poetic license sanctions it. Heston is a brick, and will yet "down" Nast as a cartoonist. The "Clerical Surprise Party" was the best thing of the season. Giv 'em sheol!

CHARLOTTE HARBOR, FLA., Feb. 27, 1886.

MY DEAR EDITOR: In the letter I wrote you, published Feb. 20th, "8th Iowa" should have been ninth. I think the 8th was with General Canby. I am sure they were not with the 15th army corps. As some might doubt all I had to say (which was not much) on account of this error, I wish you would rectify it. My little Negro School is out to-day, and I shall start Monday to find the county superintendent. It is no small job in this country, for our counties are large. If I succeed and can get a bill I will send you $1. I am sorry my contributions to so valuable a paper hav to be so small. If I succeed in getting my pension I will do better. I am, as ever, Yours for Freewill, Freethought, and Free Religion.

REV. SAMUEL B. HURLBUT.

NOGAL, NEW MEXICO, Feb. 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I remit $10, for which amount please giv me credit. I hav had the benefit of your valuable paper for a long time free, but am at last able to contribute something toward the spread of Liberal ideas.

I am a miner and hav been struggling against "hard luck," sustained by hope and rough fare, for several years. Something to eat and how to get it has claimed my attention to the exclusion of everything else; but I feel that I should either stop my paper or pay up, and as I don't want to do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, I choose the latter course. I prize your journal because it is the most fearless champion of liberty, and the most enterprising opponent of prevalent fanaticism that I hav ever seen. I hope to soon be able to order some of your publications, especially Bennett's "Around the World."

NATHANIEL MOORE.

OKETO, KAN., March 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber to your paper for but a short time, although an occasional reader, as Brother Howell, of Nebraska, furnished me with copies from time to time, and I hav derived a great deal of pleasure as well as profit from the perusal of your paper, and as long as THE TRUTH SEEKER can claim such a corps of able, fearless, and fair-minded contributors it is bound to win the esteem and support of all liberty-loving people who hav at heart the progress of humanity.

I find especial pleasure in reading the contributions of "Holt," and although some of his ideas may be branded as European, they contain a bitter truth that we of the West and South can testify to. Nor hav I been a disinterested reader of your contributions on the educational problem. This is the most important and at the same time the most difficult problem that Liberals are called upon to solve. The snaky hand of superstition is upon the throat of our little ones, nor will it loose its hold till the monster itself is throttled. That the Bible, with its stultifying doctrins, be kept from the public schools, is not sufficient. In all my experience as a teacher, which is quite extensiv, I cannot call to mind a single series of books that hav not reproduced most of the pernicious dogmas of the Bible, and in most of the primary books gods, devils, and angels are paraded in such a manner as to leave them in the minds of the children living realities. Here is sown the seed that afterward ripens into religious fanaticism, that causes the demented devotee to thrust the murderous knife into the quivering flesh of his own offspring, or nerves the hand of the assassin to remove the chief magistrate of a great nation.

Nor is this the only difficulty. Infidelity is unpopular; there are few, if any, districts that would employ an avowed Infidel without meeting opposition from some of the patrons. I know whereof I speak; the teachers know this. When we consider these facts we see at once that a premium is placed upon hypocrisy, and I will add that the clerical cloak does not cover all the hypocrisy in the world.

I might illustrate. Some years ago Professor ——, while conducting the Normal Institute for this county, read the Mosaic account of creation, and after the conclusion requested all those who believed that to be literally true to rise to their feet. A large majority rose at once. He then said, "If there are any in the room that hold different views, I should like to see them rise also." Two young men arose, only two, and they were brothers. The crestfallen appearance of the professor, who was himself an Infidel, may be better imagined than described.

Inclosed you will please find $7.50, for the renewal of my own subscription and for two new subscribers—one of whom is a former pupil of mine, which givs me especial pleasure.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Heifer and the Bottle.

A TEMPERANCE FABLE.

A fine red heifer graced my stall,
Ever obedient to my call;
Frisky and gentle, kind and wild,
As wayward as a petted child.
The neighbors said, with cool surprise,
"Just see the mischief in her eyes!"
As round the barn-yard free she ran;
"She knows as much as any man."
Daily I gave a warm bran mash;
Not that deceitful, hurtful trash
That first is "soured" and then distilled,
Whose spirit has its thousands killed;
But clean and wholesome from the wheat,
And fit for man or beast to eat.

One day, when she had licked her pail
As though her rations seemed to fail,
Then turned and licked it o'er and o'er,
And looked at me to ask for more;
By chance I saw my neighbor's man,
A poor old tipsy toper, Dan.
His rags would all the crows affright;
His "blossom" nose a sorry sight;
Though hungry he'd too much to eat,
Whisky his bread and rum his meat.
I knew his pockets would contain
The filthy master of his brain,
And called, "Come in and let me take
Your bottle, Dan." "For mercy's sake
Don't ever think of such a thing,"
Said Dan; "avoid the serpent's sting,
Its wound is worse than death and hell."
"Oh, yes," I cried, "I see it well,
I want to giv Red Bess a taste."
"Well, take the bottle, do not waste.
The very smell will drive her hence;
To taste it she has too much sense."

I poured about a tippler's dram,
And, rushing, Bess looked, "Here I am,"
Thrusting her nose among the mess;
Then madness seized the gentle Bess.
Snorting, she turned and kicked the pail;
With head erect and switching tail
Around the yard in rage she ran,
And looked with strange disgust at man.
Old Dan exclaimed, "I told you so;
A man as much as beasts should know."
I tried to soothe with soft caress,
"Co-boss, co-boss, come, bonny Bess."
She shook her head and ran away.

When with the mash I came next day,
She stood aloof and at me looked,
And sniffed the mess so nicely cooked;
Her doubt expressed, "I've had enough,
I will not taste the horrid stuff."
Nor would she touch it, till I took
The pail and hand by handful shook
Around her nose that she might see.
Then Bess again was friends with me.

A week went by, when, o'er the fence
Old Dan exclaims, "How's Common Sense?
Here, take the bottle in and show;
Let's see if Common Sense will know."
No sooner had it reached my hand
Than bonny Bessie took a stand,
With head held down and horns turned out,
Quite ready to defend her doubt.
And when I shook it near her face
She charged on me, to my disgrace,
And drove me headlong from the ground;
"Well," shouted Dan, "now ain't she sound?
You can't fool her with 'tangle-foot,'
And man is meaner than the brute!"

I gave old Dan his bottle back.
And zigzag ran his clumsy track,
As down the road he passed from sight;
But what think you he did that night?
"No doubt he went and signed the pledge."

Alas! next day beneath the hedge
We found his body stark and stiff,
While bonny Bess, with snort and sniff,
And shaking head, stood near to say
In language plain, "Behold the way
That horrid stuff to me you gave Prepares a subject for the grave.
When deep philosophy can't teach
You nobler creatures born to speech,
And graver morals will not suit,
Then take instruction from the brute."

A Big Joke.

A TRUE STORY FOR THE CHILDREN.

When I take a seat by the fire, in the evening, and light my cigar, it is the signal for my little seven-year-old girl, named Merta, to climb into my lap and say,

"Now, papa, tell me some more stories about the war."

I hav told her a great many, for you must know, children, that I was in the army over four years, and at the front all the time.

Last night I told the following true story, and as it pleased Merta I thought it might please the other little Liberals. I call it, "A Big Joke," and a big one it was, I tell you, in more senses than one.

It was in the winter of 1864, and our regiment, as well as our brigade, lay at Nashville, Tennessee, where we were in what is called "winter quarters." Troops generally stay some time in the same place when they go into winter quarters; so we took great pains to build us neat little houses about, like your play-houses. And, indeed, children, I do think if you could hav seen the rows and rows of little buildings, with little chimneys sticking out of them, and none of the houses over seven feet high, and covered with cloth, and with little doors on the ends and little 8x10 windows in the sides, you would hav laughed, and thought you had found a city of little folks, like our old friend Gulliver. And our houses were "play-houses" to a certain extent, for in nearly every one you could hear such remarks as:

"My deal, Bill."

"Crown my man there."

"Bob, it's your play."

"Confound the luck! Nothing but eight and nine spots."

"I pass."

"That makes us six to your four."

"Muggins, Jim, Muggins!"

"I'm game to your high, low."

"Check!"

"I order it up."

Mind you, children, this was not from one tent or house, but from different ones, for the walls are so thin that you can hear what is going on in each tent all over the company camp-ground. Yes, we used to hav some high old times in camp, to make up for the hardships of marches, battles, and picket duty.

It was the last of February, and we had had a very cold winter, and even as late as it was, we had more or less snow every night. That is, light snow, for they do not hav such snow-storms as we hav in Michigan, by any means. About one o'clock in the afternoon we drew five days' rations, as we had been doing all winter—what is that, dear? You don't know what "rations" are? Why, rations are the food—the "hardtack," coffee, sugar, and other things—the government givs the soldier to eat. They giv him just so much for a day's eating, so if the soldier eats it all at one meal, he has to go without the next two, except under certain circumstances I will tell you about some other time. No! we did not draw rations on a hand-cart, nor with a piece of chalk, little one. I will explain that some other time, too, for I must get along to tell you about the joke.

Well, on the day I was telling you about, an orderly—that is, a soldier that stops at the big general's headquarters, or office, as you might say—came riding up to our colonel's tent and said, "Colonel, prepare for thirty days' march at midnight to-night, by order of the general commanding." "Hav you a written order?" asked the colonel, excitedly. "No, sir," replied the orderly; "this is informal merely. You will receive written orders before the time." Away rode the orderly, in great haste, to the other regiments lying about Nashville.

But how can I tell you the effect of this sudden charge on our boys? Orderly sergeants rushed to the companies with the news, and such a swearing and grumbling as the boys set up was awful to hear. "Cuss the luck!" exclaimed Jim Leonard, as he gathered up a pack of cards to put away; "the idea of leaving our nice, comfortable houses this cold weather to tramp off on a month's march! It would make the chaplain swear!"

"Darn it all!" cried Warren Hall, my chum, "all my shirts and socks are at the washerwoman's down on Smoky Row."

"Where can we be ordered to, anyhow?" asked Madison Wade of me.

"Don't know, I'm sure," said I, "but it can't be to any place near here."

"Perhaps we are going to be transferred to the Army of the Potomac," said Bill Thayer, another of my chums, as he chucked a big chunk of pork into a camp-kettle over the fire.

"Be jabers!" exclaimed Uncle McGee, who sat pounding coffee in an old iron kettle, "be jabers, byes, I'll bet yez a dozen hardtack, so I will, that we are going down to capsure New Or-lins."

No one took the bet, however, but some small bets were made that evening as to our probable destination.

I remember that I made a small bet that we were going to march down into Georgia. Ah! little did I realize then that when we did really do that we should hav to fight every step of our way for over two hundred miles.

By this time we were all cooking up all our five days' rations, for we knew that on a forced march, as we inferred this to be, we would not hav much time to cook meat, beans, split peas, etc.

Night came and the men were busy around great camp-fires, packing blankets and all sorts of camp equipage. All of us took the canvas tops off of our houses and packed the tents ready to move.

"Whoop!" yelled a big chap in our company (A) named Bob Sutton; "let's hav a fire to dry our clothes," and he began to tear out his bunks and the sides of his house. Several others followed Bob's example, for it began to rain by this time, and our open-topped houses were poor protection.

"Hold on, boys," said several of us; "that is mean, to burn up your boards that way. Some other troops will come in here to take our place, and these houses will do them good."

"Don't care a snap," yelled one of the board-burners; we don't need 'em any more, and there shan't any other traveler hav the boards I helped to forage and carry on my back a mile or so, not by a good deal!"

"Pile 'em on, boys!" cried another; and sure enough they did. In spite of all a few in each company could say, about half the houses, bunks, and straw-beds throughout the regiment were burnt that night.

My mates and myself sat on our bunks and would not let any of the wild fellows destroy our property.

At about eleven o'clock at night everything was ready for the march, even to the headquarter tents, which were all taken down and packed on mules ready to move.

Just then a man rode up to the colonel with a letter and gave it to him, wheeled his horse and rode away.

"Marching orders!" said some one.

The colonel read it and began to laugh. The major read it and began to swear. The quartermaster read it and said, "Well, I will be ——!"

We found out the contents of the note afterward. It was:

DEAR COLONEL: I see you are all ready for March, which comes at midnight, and lasts thirty-one days. But you need not set up for it any later. Yours for the champagne,

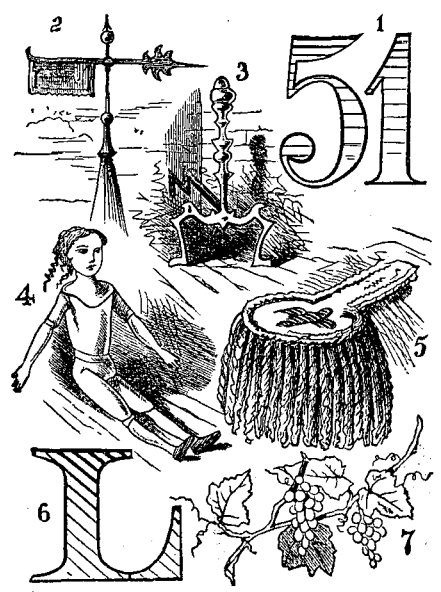
S—— I——, A.A.G.

Such a time as we had then! Some laughed and some swore, and I think you can guess who did the swearing.

Our squad very quickly fastened the tent back on our house, and we were as well off as before, except our meat was all boiled, so we could hav no more fried meat for five days. But we did not care much for that.

But just think of the rash fellows who had burnt up all their boards, used to make bunks, tables, stools, and houses, and not a board to be begged, borrowed, or stolen within four miles of Nashville!

I tell you it was a lesson to them that lasted to the end of the war, for I do not remember of seeing a man in our regiment ever destroy the camp stuff collected by him on leaving camp.



In fact, we all learned the lesson that it is good policy to "Do by others as we expect others to do by us under like circumstances."

If I find the children of the Corner are pleased with this story of the war, I may get time to tell them some more of our memorable adventures during that bloody four years.

Correspondence.

DELAVAN, ILL., Feb. 28, 1886.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I see so many little girls writing, I thought I would try.

I am almost eleven years old, and I am in the fourth room. I go to a graded school. There are eight teachers and one principal. I like my teachers very much.

It is very cold, and snowing now very hard. I guess, if it keeps on snowing, it will be good coasting by to-morrow.

Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like the Children's Corner very much. I think the story of "Little Lena" is very nice, also about "The Captiv Bird."

I hav a large black and tan dog. He is very fat. He is 10½ inches across the shoulders. If he wasn't so fat he would be very small. His name is Bangs. We hav two pet birds. They are both yellow. Ma's bird's name is Fay, and my bird's name is Fayette. My father is a butcher; that is the reason Bangs is so fat, I think.

I guess I will stop now, and try to do better next time, as this is the first letter I hav ever written for a paper.

Ever your true friend, ANNIE T. STONE.

[Very good for a first letter.—ED. C. C.]

CANON CITY, COL., Feb. 28, E.M. 286.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER four years, and this is the first time I hav written for it. I hav three sisters and two brothers. When my little sister is at play she calls herself Mrs. Rosebud; she is four years old, I am thirteen. I go to school and literary meeting. I hav to write an essay for next literary evening.

The other day one of my school-mates and I went for a walk, and she said when she was grown she was going to be a missionary and go around the world. I told her that was the worst thing she could do, that the Bible was the most unreasonable book ever printed. She said everything in it was true. I told her about Samson's fox story, and she declared it was not in the Bible. I told her it was and could be found in the fourth and fifth verses of the fifteenth chapter of Judges. She said it was not in their Bible, and that ours must be an Infidel Bible. I told her Infidels did not hav any such book—that it was a Christian Bible, and that pa bought it of a Baptist preacher. She said a great many preachers did not believe what they preached. I asked her where God is. She said he is everywhere. I asked her if he is in the devil. She first said he is, then she said he is not. I asked her if God made him. She said he did. I asked her what use he had for such a bad being (although I never heard of anything mean he did). She said he had plenty of uses for him. I told her I could not believe the Bible, and if I went to the bad world it would be his fault; that he should hav either made the Bible so I could believe it, or me so I could believe the Bible.

I told her that he never answered a prayer, and I did not see any use in praying. She said he answered her prayers, and that sometimes she prayed and asked him if he thought it best to let her go some place, then she would ask her mother if she could go, and if she said No, God did not think it best, and if she said Yes, he thought it best.

I told her it was her mother let her instead of God. I asked her if she believed in polygamy; she said she did not. I told her that nearly all of the Bible men were Mormons—that Solomon had seven hundred wives, but she said that God punished them for it.

A few days since she was here, and I showed her the fox story. The first thing she did was to look on the back of the Bible, and saw, "Holy Bible." She has said no more about it, except that she could not find it in their Bible. Your friend, ORALA LOK.

[Ora is a very intelligent girl, as her letter indicates, and she is doing good work by showing her schoolmates the absurdities in the Bible and the Christian teaching. We are pleased to welcome Ora to the Corner.—ED. C. C.]

Poetry.

Cortez Christianizing Mexico.

Low down on the Guadalquiver,
Shining was the ancient river;
Dark fleet on its breast a-shiver—
Borne on to the Mexic sea.

Dim halls of the Montezumas—
First light where the Aztec home was,
Glows yet where the mountain dome* has Flamed out on the Mexic sea.

Proud wave of the proudest waters,
Grand Queen of the Aztec daughters,
Rolls deep with inhuman slaughters,
Rolls on to the Mexic sea.

Spain wrought with her fierce invaders,
Red hands had the bold marauders,
"Spare not!" were the priestly orders;
Blood-red was the Mexic sea.

Envoy for the papal glory
Recked not of the older story;
New leaf from the pages gory
Comes now from the Mexic sea.

Waning slow the old commotion;
True light from the golden ocean
Truth bears with a steady motion,
Swift up from the Mexic sea.

No more shall the priestly slaughters
Flow red on the classic waters,
Fairest of Aztec daughters,
Away down on the Mexic sea.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD FINCH.

*Richardson said in his book, "Beyond the Mississippi," that the few remaining Aztecs still keep their sacred fires burning on the mountains, waiting for the reappearance of their savior.

American Toryism.

Our esteemed Tory contemporary, the Atlanta Constitution, is very much disgusted because Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, whom it is pleased to describe as the Ingersoll of England, has been permitted to take the oath of allegiance to his sovereign as a member of the British Parliament. The Constitution makes no effort to deny that Mr. Bradlaugh was nearly unanimously elected by the people of Northampton to represent them, nor does it assert, as it should hav asserted to make its remarks logical, that Northampton should be disfranchised and denied representation. The fact is that the remarks of the Constitution are hardly calculated to throw luster on American journalism, either for liberality or intelligence. Noting the admission of Bradlaugh to Parliament, the Constitution says:

In their comments upon this remarkable proceeding many of our exchanges speak of it as an indication of progress, and as an evidence of the growing strength of the people's will even in monarchical countries. There are many old-fashioned people in England and in America who will see it in a different light. For many years Bradlaugh has been to England what Ingersoll is to America. He has waged a bitter warfare against the Christian religion. Possessing many of the arts of the demagog he has time and again been elected by his Northampton constituents only to be repeatedly rejected by the House. The members of Parliament felt that it would be a bitter mockery, the very irony of solemnity, to administer the oath to such a man. Session after session the blatant scoffer came to the bar of the House with an insolent leer of triumph to be hurled back, and all but kicked through the outer gates by the insulted and outraged representativs of Christian Britain. In an evil hour, when demoralization followed the bitterness of partisan strife, the arrogant Atheist trod all the ancient principles, traditions, and forms of the Commons under his heel, and was admitted into the proudest of the world's parliaments. Is this progress? If it is, then progress is not an unmixed blessing.

To impartial people, language of this kind sounds very much as if the Georgia paper were trying to fit itself to the worn-out and cast-off shoes of Massachusetts. It would not hav been astonishing to read something like the article quoted above in a Massachusetts paper a hundred years ago, but at the present day no such sentiment of intolerance has either stable footing or respectable audience in the land of Cotton Mather. But, on the whole, the Atlanta Constitution is as sound an organ of Tory principles as modern England can produce. The Constitution favors a high tariff on the necessities of the people, and so do the Tories. The Constitution favors sumptuary ahd prohibitory legislation, and the curtailment of the rights of the individual, and so do the Tories. The Tories cling with the tenacity of barnacles to old ideas, old-fashioned customs, and special class-made and class-favoring laws, and so does the Atlanta Constitution. No wonder, then, that the English Tories and the Georgia organ of alleged public opinion should think the same way about the admission of Charles Bradlaug to the British House of Commons. The Constitution compares Bradlaugh to Ingersoll. This is doing Bradlaugh altogether too much honor. He is much inferior to Ingersoll. Their ideas concerning the Bible, ecclesiastical establishments, and theological tenets are much the same, and their public declarations concerning the rights of man are much the same, but Ingersoll is far ahead of Bradlaugh in general culture and literary attainments.

This does not alter the case of Bradlaugh a whit, however. He has been elected by the voters of Northampton to represent them in the imperial Parliament, and no logical objection can be urged against recognizing him in that capacity. What right hav the representativs of other constituencies to dictate to the people of Northampton as to the beliefs or disbeliefs of their representativ? The Atlanta Constitution talks about the "outraged representativs of Christian Brita n." Somebody should tell the Constitution that the British Parliament is an imperial Parliament, and that the people who are responsiv to its decrees comprise Christians, Jews, Agnostics, Infidels, Mohammedans, Buddhists, Brahmins, Confucians, barbarians, savages, idolators, non-worshipers, and nearly everything else in the religious and non-religious catalogs. Why should "Christian Britain," then, arrogate to itself the right to hav none but orthodox Christians in the imperial Parliament? English Tory papers that take pride in their imperviousness to the spirit of progress no doubt can put forth reasons why Bradlaugh should be excluded from the Commons; but that a prominent journal, supposed to breathe and express the spirit of American democracy, should sturdily plant itself on the ideas of a hundred years ago is one of those marvels that only this country is capable of producing.—Galveston News.

John Toogood.

The stage-driver said to the minister: "I heerd some bad news this morning, elder."

"I am sorry to hear that," replied the minister. "Is it about anyone I know?"

"Oh, no! you never see nor heerd tell on him. Not many people ever did. He was a young minister down in C'netticut, where I was brung up. One o' my schoolmates he was, 'n jest the best boy 't ever lived. Never cut up, John never did; never whispered, whittled the desk, nor flung paper-wads, nor nothin'. Allers had his lessons tip-to. Why, he was so good 'at, actilly, some days the master'd forgit he was ther! jist forgit him, an' seem ter look right through him without seein' him. Think o' that! An, the scholars'd forgit him, too, an' step on him or run agin him, 'fore they noticed him; an' then, stid o' rippin' at ye, or askin' what ye meant he'd beg your pardon."

"Quite angelic," said Mr. Austin, waiting attentivly to hear the conclusion and the moral of this fable.

"Wall," continued Lezer, "he got ter be a minister, an' he was that good—never sayin' nothin'" to hurt nobody's feelin's, an' never preachin' no sermons 'at had sharp pints to 'em, an' never doin' nothin' 'at folks could find fault with, that bimeby it happened jes es it did in school. Folks forgot him! Yer see ther want nothin' about him to talk about. He hadn't no p'ints nor corners, nor nothin' ter git a-holt of, an' no shape an' no color to ketch your eye, an' they jest forgot him. They forgot to go to church, an' forgot to pay his salary, au' finally his boardin'-house keeper forgot to call him to dinuer." Lezer paused.

"What became of him?" asked Mr. Austin, knowing that the question was expected of him.

"Wall, here day 'fore yistdy—lemme see, must a ben nigh on ter twenty-five years arter they'd forgot him—some boys chased a chipmuck into an old, empty, tumble-down buildin', an' lo-an' behold there was pews an' pulpit an' orgin; and a moth-eaten carpet on the floor; and the plaster hangin' in tatters from the ceilin'; an' there, leanin' over the cushin o' the pulpit, was a skellitun with a suit of black cloze on!" The solemn romancer paused again, shaking his head mysteriously.

"Is that all?" asked the minister, politely.

"It's the heft of it," replied Lezer; "but I might as well tell the rest now I'm about it. The hull town come runnin' together, but they couldn't giv no explynation. Nobody rekkignized the skellitun, an' nobody knowed what the old buildin' was. But the boy what chased the chipmuck heerd a little squeakin' in the skellitun's coat-tail pockit, and run his hand in. He drawed it back mighty quick, with three chipmucks a-hangin' by their business-like teeth to his fingers. Wall, arter they got the chipmucks all out, they found in the bottom o' the pockit a chawed-up yaller paper, sayin' in a tremblin' hand, 'n' all kinder blotted an' blurred, 'Oh, thet I hadn't a ben so harmless, so nootral, so transparently seraffick! Oh, thet I hed early learned to rap people over the knuckles, to stir 'em up with a sharp stick, to make 'em mad an' git 'em down on me! Too late I diskuvver what a preshus boon enemies is. How blessed to be abused an' lied about, for then you know that you've did somethin' to make yourself felt 'n' remembered!' They was some other words, but too much gnawed by chipmucks to be made out, an' then come his name. An' who should it be but my old school-feller, John Toogood? Poor John! His own mother hedn't missed him, an' couldn't just rightly remember about him, but sed ther did uster be somethin' settin' round the house, an' gittin' in folks's way, an' she guessed that must 'a' ben John. Wall, it's ben a dreffle sollum lesson to me, an' it's reely gin me a turn o' hypo. Folks don't lie enough about me. I ain't abused as a real live man oughter be. I'm afraid I'm sorter fadin' out an' goin' to be forgot, like poor ole John, ferzino."—Chicago Advance.

Book Notice.

A magnificent Agnostic poem, descriptiv of the ever novel and ever mysterious legend of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, is the latest work of Mr. S. P. Putnam. It treats of the legend from a Brahmistic view, and is entitled "Adami and Heva." In this new version the man is to blame, and not the woman. Instead of their being cursed and sent abroad upon the earth, the Brahma, Adami, and Heva hold converse sweet, and the lady in the case shows such wonderful devotion to her liege lord that Brahma, the eternal and ever-living one, becomes enchanted with her fidelity and avows that all that he is and has would be sacrificed "could I be loved by woman as man is." This is rather flattering to the daughter descendant of Heva. The story is told with a wealth of language, a beauty of diction, and a purity of thought which mark Mr. Putnam as a genuin poet. The poem is for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York city. Price 10 cents.—Universe.

Anecdotes of Religious Folks.

A young lady, living not a thousand miles from Greenville, recently emigrated to Utah to join the Mormons. She was the daughter of a minister, and all his parental influence failed to shake her determination.—Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times.

Joe Cook, of Boston, says: "If I had a dog that was addicted to smoking I would shoot him." If we had a dog that preached we would build him a tabernacle. That is the wide difference between ecclesiastical views frequently occurring on a variety of topics wise and otherwise.—Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette.

At a Lynn church, on Sunday, only the clergyman and sexton appeared, on account of the severe weather. The sexton was complaining at the lack of attendance, when the clergyman remarked: "You and I are the only salaried men in the church, and were it not for that fact, probably we should not hav ventured out."—Lynn (Mass.) Union.

Superintendent: "Children, this is Rev. Dr. McSnorter, from Gowanus, who will address you a few brief remarks. Children, he has come all the way to try and save your souls from hell. You are not paying attention. Now, can any little boy or girl tell me where this gentleman is from." Chorus of children: "From hell."—Chicago Rambler.

"Mamma," said a Philadelphia girl, "I'm not going to sing in our choir any more." "Hav you had any trouble with any of the girls?" "No, ma; but the other three girls hav beaux that sing in the choir, and when they are courting during the sermon it makes me feel lonesome. I'll resign if they don't allow Charlie to sit with me."—Philadelphia Call.

A young lady friend of mine has a mission class in an Episcopal Sunday-school. She has been trying for several Sundays to explain to them the meaning of Lent and the solemnity of its observance. Yesterday she asked: "Now, which of you can tell me what Lent is?" For a while no one replied; then a little girl in the corner answered: "I know." "Well, Maria, what is it?" "Its the time when the ladies ask the gentlemen to marry them."—Louisville Post.

A Methodist preacher in North Louisiana has a horse which possesses either strong reasoning powers or a remarkable memory. On the first and third Sundays of the month Mr. Cadian holds service in a town which is reached by taking the left fork of the road, while on the second and fourth Sundays the town in which he preaches is at the termination of the right fork of the road. The horse, without a word or a touch of the bridle, never fails on the first and third Sundays to take the road on the left and on the second and fourth Sundays that on the right.—New Orleans Picayune.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

THE PRESENT
AND
THE FUTURE REPUBLIC OF NORTH AMERICA.
BY A CAPITALIST.

A Book Advocating Associate Life as a Remedy for Poverty, Vice, and Crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

CONTENTS: The titles of some of the chapters are: Present External Appearance of Our Republic; Government and Laws; Finance; Public Improvements; Production and Distribution; Education; Morality and Religion; Marriage and Divorce; Life in the New Republic; Life in the Existing Republic; Examination of the Objections to Communism; Methods Proposed for the Transition from the System of Individual Property to a System of Collectiv Property; Danger. THURSDAY, March 18th, was Grover Cleveland's birthday. He was forty-nine years old.

W. S. SPROUT is an enterprising lieutenant of the Boston Salvation Army. Just now he is held under $1,000 bonds for having two wives.

ANOTHER blizzard is reported from Maine. As there was already much snow in that locality, it is expected that the spring break-up will produce freshets on the Penobscot.

THE president of Mexico has sent $500 to the Grant memorial fund. The mikado of Japan has signified his intention of contributing an equal sum. The grand total is now $119,588.

THE "Maine law" is still supposed to be in force in Maine, yet of 1,933 arrests reported for last year by the city marshal of Portland, 1,320 were from crimes directly resulting from liquor.

ARRANGEMENTS hav been made for a great Confederate reunion at Montgomery, Ala. Jeff Davis will lecture, and the proceeds will go toward a monument in memory of Confederate soldiers.

THE Rev. "Sam" Jones lectured to four thousand girls in Chicago last Saturday. He took occasion to ridicule the "dude" and denounced many of the most cherished institutions of society.

THE argument on the motion for a change of venue in the case of the People against the Rev. Mr. Bristor, of Spring Valley, N. Y., for rape, was postponed in Brooklyn Saturday to April 5th.

THE schooner that sunk the ocean steamer Oregon has not yet been reported. The belief is held by some that the steamer struck against a sunken wreck instead of colliding with any other vessel.

ABOUT twenty Methodist missionaries sailed from this port for the Congo regions last Saturday. They took with them a good stock of firearms, and a small cargo of Bibles, the latter, presumably, for gun-wads.

BABEL, the Texas cowboy pianist, who has been astonishing New York folks by his skill, is now declared to be a fraud. It is said that his father was a first-class music teacher and that Babel is a professional pianist.

THE Communists of New York celebrated last Sunday night the fifteenth anniversary of the revolution of Paris. A great crowd met in the Germania Assembly Rooms, listened to speeches, recitations, and singing, and then had a dance.

A NEW YORK alderman named Jachne is in jail. He is charged with taking a $20,000 bribe from Sharp, the railroad man, for his vote in favor of the Broadway franchise. It is said that Jachne has made a confession implicating nearly the whole board of aldermen.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY was got along with in this city without any unusual demonstrations. The way the day was celebrated givs rise to the belief that if St. Patrick had driven the snakes out of whisky he would hav conferred a greater favor upon the pope's Irish than he did when he expelled those reptils from Erin.

THE Rev. John B. Horan has sued the Rev. John J. Brady and the Rev. John J. Griffin, all of Jersey City, for libel. One of the defendants has proclaimed that Horan is an immoral man, and the other says he is a drunkard and an adventurer. Mr. Horan places the damage to his reputation at $50,000.

KARL BLIND, the German liberal politician, in a letter to a friend, strongly denounces home rule. He says it would entail upon England constant vigilance and expense and danger of a foreign invasion, would subject the loyal Irish to the yoke of popery, and would imperil religious equality and civil institutions.

THE following is from London, dated the 20th: "Mrs. Adelaide Bartlett and the Rev. Mr. Dyson, a Wesleyan minister, were committed to-day for trial at the Central Criminal Court on the charge of having caused the death of Edward T. Bartlett, the woman's husband, on New Year's Eve. The allegation is that by advice of the clergyman, to whom several years ago Bartlett had surrendered his wife, she killed him with chloroform furnished by the pastor, while she was resisting an attempt on the part of her husband to regain the place he had given the preacher."

Odds and Ends.

A RAB-BIT and a cat were once jour-ney-ing together, when they came to an inn, in front of which was the sign, "Rab-bit Pie for Din-ner To-day." On be-hold-ing this sign the Cat fled in great Ter-ror, while the Rab-bit went on his way a-lone. My lit-tle friends, this Fa-ble that Un-cle Mike is tell-ing you teaches us that Rab-bit Pie is un-health-y Di-et for Cats, and that all is not Gold that Glit-ters.—Chicago Rambler.

"TAKE it away," said the tall solemn passenger to the train-boy. "Take that book away. I want none of Ingersoll's writings near me. That book is an abomination. It is a sacrilege. Its very presence in this car is enough to call upon this train and all of its passengers the vengeance of the almighty. Take it away, I say." "What's the matter with you?" inquired the train-boy, with a scowl. "I'd hav you know," retorted the passenger, "that I hav a right to speak as I do. I am a D. D." "Oh, is that all?" was the response; "I thought you was a D. F."

MINISTER: "I think if a notice of my forthcoming donation were to be placed in the newspapers, deacon, it might tend to the—er—glory of the occasion." Deacon: "I think so myself, Mr. Goodman. I will tend to the matter at once." Minister: "But avoid the Sunday papers as you would a viper, deacon. They are an abomination." Deacon: "Well—er—Mr. Goodman, the Sunday papers hav a much larger circulation than the daily editions through the week, and a notice would be seen by a greater number of readers." Minister: "H'm. You surprise and grieve me, deacon. But I know little of such worldly matters. You must use your own judgment, deacon; and may heaven bless you. Good morning."—N. Y. Sun.

A LONG, lean, lank, cadaverous-looking man, with long gray hair and beard, and very thin clothes, yesterday approached a blind man at the southwest corner of Thirteenth and Market streets, who was peddling lead pencils. The stranger scanned the features of the blind man for some time and at length said: "Brother, art thou totally blind?" "Yes," answered the pencil merchant. "Hast thou never tried to be healed?" "No use," replied the other. "My eyes were burnt out in a powder-mill explosion." "If thou hast faith thou canst be healed," said the stranger. "Let us pray." By this time a crowd had gathered round the pair and a lively interest was manifested in the proceedings. The apostle of faith cure knelt down and offered a long prayer for the blind man, while the crowd kept increasing until it nearly blocked up Thirteenth street. After prayer the ancient arose and went through a series of gyrations similar to a mesmerist. He made all manner of passes in the air with his hands, and finally took hold of the man, rubbed his eyes, slapped his back, pinched his cheeks, and asked him if he could see. To the great disappointment of the audience he replied that he could not. The faith-cure man was about to begin his performances again when a policeman came up and ordered him to move on. The apostle went off bemoaning the lack of faith in Israel, while the crowd took pity on the blind man and purchased his entire stock of pencils. "Cranks are of some use, anyway," muttered the blind man, as he went off to purchase a new stock of merchandise.

A SETTLER in a Welsh colony in South America sends a letter, which has been published in the Manchester City News. It contains one of the best missionary stories we hav read for some time. One of the Indian chiefs was dying, and a Spanish priest was sent for to administer consolation. The writer was asked to interpret between them, and thus describes the conversation: Chief: "To what sort of a country do the Christians go after death?" Priest: "Into a noble country." Chief: "Is there sufficient pasture for all cattle?" Priest: "There is plenty." Chief: "Hav they plenty of guano and of ostriches there?" Priest: "Any amount." Chief: "Are there lions in that place?" "Yes, millions." "Are they able to hunt and catch the lions." "Only those who die good Christians can catch the lions." Chief (stooping down to the visitor, in a very low voice): "Hav they got brandy there?" Priest: "Brandy! yes, without any end." Chief (falling back on his pillow): "I die a Christian."

Gems of Thought.

THE heroic struggle for liberty made for eighty years by the sturdy dwellers in the lowlands of Europe is marred by the persecuting spirit of Christianity, which seems to hav converted its believers into fanatics, bent upon the destruction of everything opposed to them. Since the early Christians wandered through the catacombs of Rome they hav been relentless persecutors. From Constantine to the present day they hav endeavored by one means or another to crush all differences of opinion in matters of faith.—D. M. Bennett.

THE grand inquisitor, like pope and pagan, has in our age lost most of his teeth. There can hardly be a surer way of conferring a benefit on a man of learning and virtue than by persecuting him for his opinions' sake. He gets all the advantage of adversity without disablement, and obloquy without disgrace. He has the opportunity (too rarely occurring in the savant's career) of showing courage, sincerity, and dignity of character. And meantime his influence is not impaired, but increased; his books become more widely known; his personality is invested with greater interest. The time, moreover, is past when anything can be done for opinions counted orthodox by raising them who hold them to posts for which they are otherwise unfit. These are not days when incense can giv influence or official precedence make proselytes.—Fred. W. H. Myers.

MISS CARLYLE talked of her little dog Nero: "He is extravagantly fond of me, but only very moderately of Carlyle. If I am away for a little and come in, Nero bounds and frisks and is delighted. If Carlyle is away then he just yelps a little when he returns, that's all. But he cannot expect otherwise. Carlyle delights in torturing him, which he calls playing with him. He snaps the tongs at him, and Nero does not like that. Carlyle once even tied an empty tin to his tail and sent the poor dog scampering all over the house in great terror. It was cruel in him to do that, absolutely cruel in him, and I told him so. I told him it was an amusement unfit for a philosopher, low and degrading."—Dr. Knighten.

THE heart is hard in nature and unfit
For human fellowship, as being void
Of sympathy, and therefore dead alike
To love and friendship both, that is not pleased
With sight of animals enjoying life,
Nor feels their happiness augment his own.
—Cowper.

I NO more expect to see my countrymen again content with the mere semblance of a representation than to see them again drowning their witches or burning heretics, trying causes by red-hot plowshares or offering up human sacrifices to wooden idols. I no more expect a reaction in favor of Gotten or Old Sarum than a reaction in favor of Thor and Odin. I should think such a reaction almost as much a miracle as that the shadow should go back upon the dial. (Who so readeth, let him understand!) Revolutions produced by violence are often followed by reactions; the victories of reason once gained are gained for eternity.—Macaulay's Speeches on Parliamentary Reform.

DID the book called the Bible excel in purity of ideas and expression all the books now extant in the world, I would not take it for my rule of faith, as being the word of God, because the possibility would nevertheless exist of my being imposed upon. But when I see throughout the greater part of this book scarcely anything but a history of the grossest vices, and a collection of the most paltry and contemptible tales, I cannot dishonor my creator by calling it by his name.—Paine's Age of Reason.

IF others will not deal fairly with their own minds, does that make my errors truth or ought it to make me in love with them and willingly to impose on myself? If others love cataracts on their eyes should that hinder me from couching of mine as soon as I could? Everyone declares against blindness, and yet who almost is not fond of that which dims his sight and keeps the clear light out of his mind, which should lead him into truth and knowledge? Such are usually the prejudices imbibed from education, party, reverence, fashion, interest, etc. This is the mote which everyone sees in his brother's eye, but never regards the beam in his own.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

AND why beholdest the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye. . . . Thou hypocrit, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.—Matt. vii, 3-5. See also Luke vi, 41, 42.

I HAD ridden to Edinburgh, there to consult a doctor, having at last reduced my complexities to a single question: "Is this disease curable by medicin, or is it chronic, incurable except by regimen, if even so?" This question I earnestly put; got response, "It is all tobacco, sir; giv up tobacco." Gave it instantly and strictly up. Found, after long months, that I might hav as well ridden sixty miles in the opposit direction and poured my sorrows into the long, hairy ear of the first jackass I came upon, as into this select medical man's, whose name I will not mention.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

WHEN all things were made, nothing was made better than tobacco; to be a lone man's companion, a batchelor's friend, a hungry man's food, a sad man's cordial, a wakeful man's sleep, and a chilly man's fire. There is no herb like it under the canopy of heaven.—Kingsley's Westward Ho.

MOST earnestly would I urge upon those who cherish the doctrine of immortality, not to defend it, as they too often do, by arguments which hav a basis smaller than the doctrin itself. I long to see this glorious tenet rescued from the jurisdiction of a narrow and sectarian theology, which, foolishly ascribing to a single religion the possession of all truth, proclaims other religions to be false and debases the most magnificent topics by contracting them within the horizon of its own little vision.—Buckle's Essays.

TRUTH FROM A CHURCHMAN ILLUSTRATED.

The devil trembled when God sent a man into the world who knew how to think.—Bishop Spalding.

Notes and Clippings.

PROFESSOR: "My dear sir, you cannot be a subject for the mind-cure unless you hav faith in it." Applicant: "Ah, I see; the mind must be unsound before it can be open to the cure."

A CORRESPONDENT asks us to name the pet sin of the ministerial profession. H-u-s-h, man! Everybody knows it, and how often it breaks out from Brooklyn's ups to Boston's Downs.—Pomeroy's Democrat.

STANLEY, when he started across Africa, took with him sixty-nine books for entertainment on the way, and the only one to survive the trip was the Bible. It is amazing how long the Bible will last some people. In some families the good book, bound in flimsy muslin, will outlast a dozen novels substantially bound in leather.—Norristown Herald.

AN audacious young man put his arm around a young woman who sat in the same pew with him during service in the United Brethren church at Fort Wayne on Sunday night, and kissed her. She was so pleased that she laughed right out in meeting, and others joined with her. These young people are to be indicted for disturbing a religious meeting.

THE Methodists, while "building two a day" and "crossing the million line" for missions, it seems from the conference reports are starving some of their ministers. A prominent minister—a presiding elder, in fact—asserted in the conference the other day that he knew a minister's family who were compelled to subsist upon four cents a day for each member. Of course he didn't refer to "Rev. J. B. McCullough, D.D.," who gets $1500 a year for editing the "rat organ"—the Philadelphia Methodist. Boycott the Methodist!—The Tocsin.

SIGNS are not wanting, says the Pall Mall Gazette, to show that the clerical ascendency over Frenchwomen is on the decline, and will ere long be a thing of the past. Mme. Girault-Lesourd has just given to the city of Angers the magnificent sum of £8,000 to be expended on the foundation of an orphan asylum, with these conditions: that the staff of the orphanage consist in perpetuo solely of laymen and laywomen, and that it shall remain entirely under civil, to the exclusion of all religious, control.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher was telling her children how the devil goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour, and after the lesson was through, she said that those who wished could ask questions. At once a little boy spoke up and asked how fast the devil could run. "Hush, Johnnie," said the teacher, "such questions are very profane." "Well, I don't care," said Johnnie; "he can't outrun my pa, anyhow, 'cause I heard pa tell a man down the street the other day that he caught the devil the night he came home from the lodge."

A MAINE Sunday-school teacher, bent on clearly defining the relation of children to the Episcopal church, was anxious to impress on her extraordinarily dull class the propriety of being confirmed. The age of twelve, following the usage of the ancient Jewish church, was especially emphasized. After a dull discussion of the matter, the teacher tested one of her relativly brightest scholars by suddenly asking: "Now, what is done to children properly instructed, when they reach the age of twelve or thereabouts?" "Lick 'em," was the prompt reply. Confirmation was not further touched upon at that lesson.

M. CHARLES GIRARD, chemist, of Paris, recently amused himself by investigation of the ingredients of a beautitul red-currant jelly, charmingly put up for export to the United States. There was not an atom of fruit in the mass, as was demonstrated by the adding to it of methylated alcohol, which would hav turned it green had it contained any fruit acid. It was found to consist of gelatine, sweetened with glycerine residue, colored with pichsine (a poisonous mineral extract), and flavored with no one knows what. A great many people in this country imagin no currant jelly so good as that which is imported from France.

M. VERESCHAGEN, not content with proving, by copious scripture extracts, that he is fully justified in painting the holy father as one of many members, now turns the tables on his detractors, and, protesting against the epithet "antichristian," which has been applied to his pictures, asks in his turn: "Is it Christian to represent God and the saints sitting on clouds, as though on chairs or armchairs? Is it Christian to make Christ a Roman patrician, and the saints of both sexes slaves of his household? Is it Christian to muffle up the image of Christ with costly dress material, to seat him on a throne of gold or silver, enriched with jewels, and put a crown on his head and a scepter into his hands? All this in the clouds! Is it Christian to dress the Virgin in Pompadour costumes, and to cover her with trinkets weighing pounds? I had occasion to study the cults of different religions, but among the Buddhists and Brahmanists I hav never found stranger idols than the Madonnas in some Christian churches."

THE growing hostility between the church and the state in France has been accentuated by a protest addressed by the three French cardinals, the archishops of Paris, Lyons, and Toulouse, to the president of the republic against M. de Freycinet's criticism of the conduct of the clergy in the last election. As this protest was no doubt approved at Rome before it was published, it is important as indicating the irreconcilable nature of the religious conflict that has been going on in France during the last few years. The recent appointment of M. Paul Bert to an important post is regarded by Catholics much as Englishmen would regard the elevation of Mr. Bradlaugh to a ministerial office. Indeed, it is asserted by French Catholics that the government deliberately tries to antagonize the church. In this way they explain the frequent suspensions of clerical salaries, the reprimands of bishops, the total suppression of some hundred and fifty unattached vicars, and the constant attempts to harass and annoy the religious orders. Church property and even church edifices are frequently seized by the government on the plea that a better use can be made of such property by the state than by the church. Under these circumstances it is not wonderful that an irritating skirmish is constantly going on between the civil and religious authorities. And, unfortunately, the situation promises to become worse before it becomes better.—New York Tribune.

Legislative.

A Plea for Impartial Taxation.

On Tuesday, March 16, 1886, arguments in favor of the following petitions and bill were heard by the Committee of Ways and Means of the New York Assembly. The first petition is from the Constitution Club of Brooklyn:

To the Legislature of the State of New York:

We, citizens under the constitution and bill of rights, claim equality without discrimination or preference in the liberty of our conscience and equality of religious liberty, and remonstrate earnestly against all practices of legislative action which in the past have discriminated as between individuals and corporations by acts of exemption on personal and real property in favor of said institutions and in prejudice of the rights of individuals by an unjust and unequal distribution of the burdens of the support of government.

The exception to a rule by a tax exemption works in the essence of an additional tax.

We are convinced that the principle of "the equality of sacrifice" for the maintenance and support of the state is the rock foundation upon which a free people may maintain their governmental integrity.

It is high time that a halt should be taken by the refusal to pass all acts granting exemption from taxation. In our cities, the municipal corporation, acting as agent for the state, collects and pays over to the state the share of the state tax levy. There is no essential difference in the levy of an assessment for a local improvement and the levy of a tax for the maintenance of local government which provides for the protection and care of property.

Private institutions of a charitable or religious character should not be exempt from the municipal cost of the maintenance of a police and fire department any more than they should be exempt for the construction of a sewer or for the use of water. One step in exemption naturally leads to another. At first it is not felt. It amounts, apparently, to a trifle, but it has grown to a monstrous evil in special legislation, so that millions of property held by rich corporations is increasing in value and has become, on account of its not being taxed, a burden upon the individual tax-payers; and the want of uniformity by legislative and municipal action has transcended the constitutional limitations.

The discrimination between a class or profession and the different kinds of property violates a rule of equity which will endanger the integrity of the commonwealth.

We therefore request that you will pass a bill which provides for a more equal distribution of the burdens of government, and we herewith submit the resolution passed at a meeting of the Constitution Club on January 19, 1886, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Club that no property should be exempt from taxation except such as is the property of the public and is used for public purposes.

Signed by the Executive Committee of the Constitution Club of Brooklyn.

GEORGE B. DOUGLAS. SAMUEL B. DURYEA.
EDMUND P. MARTIN. JOHN HENRY HULL.
J. WARREN GREENE.

The following bill was introduced by Assemblyman Hotchkiss, of Brooklyn, and referred to the Committee by whom the arguments were heard:

An act in relation to the taxation of property.

The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

SECTION 1.—The following property shall be exempt from taxation:

1. All property, real or personal, exempted from taxation by or under the constitution of this state, or the Constitution of the United States.

2. All property, real or personal, the title to which is, or hereafter shall be, in the United States, or in this state, or in any city, county, town, or village within this state, and which is used, or intended to be used, for public purposes.

3. All property exempted by law from execution.

SECTION 2.—From and after the date on which this act shall take effect, all lands and all personal estates within this state, whether owned by individuals or corporations, shall be liable to taxation, except as otherwise specifically provided in Section 1 of this act. Provided, however, that the owner or holder of stock in any company liable to taxation on its capital stock or property, shall not be taxed as an individual for such stock.

SECTION 3.—All property, both real and personal, exempted from taxation, either in whole or in part, by or under any law of this state in force before this act shall take effect (except as provided in sections 1 and 2 of this act), shall, after this act shall take effect, be assessed and valued in the same manner and upon the same basis of valuation as other property subject to taxation, and shall be taxed upon its full assessed valuation, as follows, namely: in the year 1887 at one-tenth of the rate at which other property of the same or a similar description in the same town or ward is taxed; in the year 1888 at two-tenths of such rate; in the year 1889 at three-tenths of such rate; in the year 1890 at four-tenths of such rate; in the year 1891 at five-tenths of such rate; in the year 1892 at six-tenths of such rate; in the year 1893 at seven-tenths of such rate; in the year 1894 at eight-tenths of such rate; in the year 1895 at nine-tenths of such rate; in the year 1896, and in all subsequent years, at the full rate at which such other property is taxed, and such taxes shall be levied, collected, and applied in the same manner as taxes on other property subject to taxation.

SECTION 4.—All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SECTION 5.—This act shall take effect immediately.

The first argument was by Samuel B. Duryea, representing the Constitution Club of Brooklyn. The hearing before the Committee was procured by J. J. McCabe, Secretary of the New York State Freethinkers' Association. Mr. Duryea said:

SPEECH OF SAMUEL B. DURYEA.

MR. CHAIRMAN: In coming before your committee I hope you will bear in mind that we present ourselves as advocates of a measure that looks wholly to the interests of the commonwealth. It is a measure fundamental, based on principles well established upon which writers of wide distinction do not differ.

From the differing schools of philosophy and religion we are unable to find a logician who is willing to base his reputation upon an argument to be made in favor of tax exemption. It is only when individuals representing societies desire money that they make appeal to the legislature with an argument based upon selfishness, as they are often found appealing to the public to sanction a lottery, or raffle, or a grab-bag, and, like these, they are only supported by that specious argument that the end justifies the means.

If this bill becomes a law you will be relieved from a great deal of vexatious special legislation which has in the past cast no honor upon the legislature in the state of New York, and has been the cause of strife among its people.

It is not my intention to delve into the arguments relating to the principles of taxation, but it is enough to say that the system is intimately connected with the growth of government in the human race, and has developed from an arbitrary assertion by power to a reasoning basis. It differs to-day in all the nations upon the face of the earth, according to the form of government and enlightenment of the people. In those nations which are included among the Christian powers, we have an easier chance for perusal. Those which have been influenced by the power of ecclesiastical religion have exerted an influence over the state whereby they have been enabled to levy taxes for the support of a peculiar sect, and the maintenance of a doctrinal theology in the institutions of learning, and exemption from all the costs and maintenance of government. As early as 359 A.D. an attempt was made to have the lands belonging to the churches exempt from all taxation. It was due to the demoralizing influences of the reign of Constantine, when the church united in the political intrigues of a corrupt empire. Throughout all the conflicts among nations to the present day, the evil influences of the uniting of church and state may be traced through every Christian nation on the face of the earth. Happily the development and civilization of the world has been steadily—from the time of the Reformation to the present—in favor of the entire and absolute separation of the spiritual from the secular; yet now, in this country, in the state of New York, we have remaining exemptions from taxation.

Inasmuch as we have no state belief nor national church, why should we have an exemption relating to religious bodies, which is none other than a tax upon the whole community for the support of a doctrine or doctrines from which they may derive no benefit, and in some cases believe to be detrimental to the general welfare? It is by many believed that a republican state should not mix up its civil functions with the belief of any creed, and that all exemptions of property on the ground that it is a religious corporation is a trespass upon the freedom, liberty, and equality of the thought of the people. A charitable institution, which is open to all without restriction, has a claim upon the state. Educational institutions should be founded on the principle of impartial justice. Any institution that is exclusive has no right to claim exemption, and if it is unable to exist without state support, it should be swept away.

Now, let us look at the question as it presents itself to the practical mind. Here in a city is unimproved property situated upon an avenue, which has been graded, paved, sewered, and lighted. In progress of building are houses, banks, libraries, and churches. Here are piles of lumber, and iron, and stone, and brick. These materials are all going into these different structures. On what grounds will you argue that the material that goes into the one is to be taxed; while that which goes into another is to be exempted from taxation? The savings bank or a bank of deposit is not exempt. It is a benefit to the community. The factory, with its thousand spindles, a beehive of industry, giving to the poor employment; the healthy homes for the operatives, which have more to do with the maintenance of family life and the stability of the state than any other known cause, bear their full burden of taxation. The beautiful Gothic church, with its artistic spire, gorgeous interior, enjoying all the protections of state and municipal government—for the pleasure of those who admire the beautiful, and for the use of those who can pay for the luxury of fine music and eloquence—is exempt from all taxation. On what ground? Is it more the house of God than the cottage that incloses love, where childhood is developed under parental instruction into manly and womanly virtues? The one may be open but one day in seven, and then but for a few hours. It may have cost more money than would have builded a thousand houses. It is a luxury; it is to be treated as a luxury, and should be taxed at its full value as such. And what will you do in regard to the religious charitable institutions? So long as they are private institutions they should be taxed. If they are doing a work of charity for the benefit of mankind, they should be required to make returns under oath as to the amount and cost of their work, and should be paid for the work done by a general tax, provided the same is as economically and well managed as it could be under the direct control of the local authorities. The danger accruing to the United States was first officially pointed out in the message of President Grant in 1875, and no one who has watched the vast accumulations of wealth derived by various incorporated institutions can fail to see the danger arising from these soulless institutions, which gather strength like a river that flows to the sea. Already, at Albany, there have been bills introduced to allow one institution to be exempt on property to the enormous value of two and a half millions—or upon incomes amounting to $250,000 per annum.

The farms and homes of the citizens of the United States are to be made tributary to these money-loving institutions!

Already are established more charitable and religious institutions than a thriving, industrious people should be called upon to maintain. The weakness of a community is measured by its need of eleemosynary institutions. By undue and unwise legislation home life is destroyed. The tenement house and the flat are at variance with Saxon liberty, and break down the privacies of life. Those institutions, maintained by religious enthusiasm, which develop artificial conditions and distempered lives not in harmony with the normal condition, should be discountenanced.

It is manifestly unjust that the state should charge directly or indirectly upon the whole people the support, even partial, of any institutions restricted in any measure for private or sectarian uses. In this state the church property exempt from taxation, according to the census of 1850, was $21,132,707, and in the census of 1870 it is reported at $66,055,755. The official report for the commissioners of the city of New York states that, in that city alone, the church property exempted is valued at $42,137,500; and other property held by private institutions, either religious or otherwise, for charitable and other purposes, amounts to $33,994,930. In the city of Brooklyn the exempted property for church and charitable purposes, etc., according to the report of 1880, amounted to $16,271,300. According to the report of the state Board of Assessors, it is estimated that the liberal exemptions of property consecrated to religious worship, to the uses of charity, and educational institutions of a private character, aggregate in value over $500,000,000, and a very large proportion of the property is held for speculative purposes and not directly used for its ostensible object.

This exemption from the burdens of the maintenance of the state by the exemption of many millions results in the increased burden to be borne by the breadwinners. The agricultural interests of the state and laboring classes have to meet a larger share of burden, and the home is taxed unduly for the maintenance of institutions of a private character that do not touch the whole body politic. It is upon the homes and the public schools that American institutions are founded, and the safety of the state is in the entire and absolute separation from the church. The growth of charitable institutions is not indicative of a healthy condition.

In many cases they develop pauperism, and to a very large extent they are the outcome of an immigration which has been forced upon the country by the emptying of the poorhouses of Europe.

In a paper prepared by Dr. Charles S. Hoyt, secretary of the State Board of Charities, and reported to this legislature on January 28, 1886, it is stated: "We are forced to the conclusion, therefore, that this country is being constantly burdened with the insane and paupers of different European countries, or with persons from those countries so enfeebled by privation and hardships through successive generations as to become insane or otherwise dependent under slight exciting causes, deported from their homes for no other purpose than to relieve their several communities of troublesome burdens, and for whose support and care we are no more liable than for the payment of the national debts, or the maintenance of the standing armies of the various countries whence they are sent.

"According to the census of 1880 the native population of New York was 3,871,492, and the foreign population 1,211,379; total, 5,082,871.

"The number of insane of native birth was 7,790, or one to every 497 of the native population; while the number of insane of foreign birth was 6,321, or one to every 192 of the foreign population."

Herbert Spencer has very ably presented the evil effects of compulsory charity, by which many of the natural laws are set aside, and swarms of good-for-nothings are fostered and multiplied by public and private agencies.

Dr. Wayland, in his work on Political Economy, says:

> All that religious societies have a right to ask of the civil government is the same privileges for the transacting their own affairs which societies of every other sort possess. This they have a right to demand, not because they are religious societies, but because the exercise of religion is an innocent mode of pursuing happiness. If it happen accidentally that others are benefited it does not follow that they are obliged to pay for this benefit. It cannot be proved that the Christian religion needs the support of civil government, since it has existed and flourished when entirely deprived of this support.

In a memorial address to the General Court of Massachusetts in 1775, we find the following sentiment tersely expressed:

For a civil legislature to impose religious tax is, we conceive, a power which their constituents never had to give, and therefore going entirely out of their jurisdiction. We are persuaded that an entire freedom from being taxed by civil rulers to religious worship is not a mere favor from any man or men in the world; but a right and property granted us by God, who commands us to stand fast in it. We should wrong our consciences by allowing that power to men which we believe belongs only to God.

An exemption is simply the presentation of a receipted bill for taxes. The Real Estate Record, Brooklyn Eagle, Brooklyn Times, Union, and Standard, have protested against the injustice of this system.

If sectarian institutions are unable to hold their own without the exemption, as provided for in this bill, which only charges at one-tenth of the rate at which other property of a similar description is taxed in the first year, two-tenths in the second, and so on, giving ample time of ten years before they are chargeable at the rate of other property it will be proven that they have not the support of the community One of the evils which is attendant upon the release from taxation of church property, is that it leads to extravagance in the purchase of land and buildings, especially in cities. In New York city churches are located on the finest avenues and not within the reach of the poorer classes. They are aristocratic, and not suited to accommodate the masses, and not more than one-fourth of the population can possibly be accommodated. If in that city the churches were taxed at the same rate as adjoining property it would tend to the building of structures suited to the wants of the people, more commodious and less expensive.

The present system results in the placing of a burden indirectly by exemption, but which, nevertheless, increases the rate of the tax levy upon a large majority who do not believe in sectarian teaching, but, on the contrary, believe that it is unwise and actually detrimental to the best interests of the commonwealth. It is for the interest of the municipality and the state that the church should be as interested as the citizen in providing for an honest moral government. They should be recognized as corporations and bear their share. At present under the laws they are assessed for sewer, water, and street improvements. The municipal tax is made up of items, of expenses for police protection, the maintenance of a fire department, and other items which go for the preservation and protection of property, and there is no adequate reason why churches should not pay for the sustaining of a fire department as well as pay for water. With regard to burial grounds, if taxed they would be assessed at a valuation which would consider the use to which the property is devoted, under the decision in the Court of Appeals reports, People v. the Mayor, 63 N. Y., 291.

To be considered under this subject there is the churchyard, the farm burial grounds, the sectarian cemetery, and the large general cemeteries. None of these are public burial grounds. Many of them bring in large revenues, and the sale of plots is as much a matter of speculation as the transfer of any real property. Those devoted to sectarian use do not tolerate the burial of any one not in communion with the church. In Article I. of the Constitution of this state is the following: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind." In the discussion in regard to exemption, the facts show that they are based upon principles of inequality; that there has been a discrimination which will not bear inspection; that there has been an injustice done to the whole by the granting of favors to the few; that large properties have been accumulated in the hands of private institutions which are run in the interest of a sect; and that this preference is a burdensome discrimination against the free exercise and enjoyment, and against the liberty of conscience which was intended to be secured in the constitution of the state.

Charity founded on the universality of human want and suffering, a gift without restriction or limitation, open to all and for all, should not be taxed. The title to such property cannot and should not be held in any sectarian board of trustees or in a bishop, as a private resource, but should vest in the state. If hospitals, orphan asylums, and other eleemosynary institutions, desire to hold their property for the advantages that shall accrue to any sect, corporation, or person, for reasons of their own, they should make no claim to exemption. The same principle holds good in reference to all private schools, colleges, and other institutions of learning that may prefer to limit themselves to private purposes. Many arguments have been advanced in favor of exemption, but hardly any but would bear with equal, if not stronger, force in relation to the homestead and the farm.

According to the census of 1880, there were more than 219,000 persons over the age of ten years in the state of New York who were unable to write, although we had 26,693 teachers.

The total value of the property belonging to public schools is placed at only $31,235,407, and the annual expense amounts to $11,035,511.

It is quite impossible to enforce compulsory education while the state does not provide ample accommodation.

It is astonishing to find that the total value of all the property invested in school-houses in the United States amounts to only $212,252,491, while the exemptions in the state of New York alone amount to more than double that sum.

I therefore earnestly urge the principle of "equality of sacrifice" for the maintenance of civil government.

Mr. Duryea was followed by T. B. Wakeman, representing the New York State Freethinkers' Association and the American Secular Union. During the past few months the State Association has circulated the following petition, which has received several thousand signatures:

To the Senate and Assembly of the State of New York:

The Constitution of our state guarantees that "the free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed in this state to all mankind." The general principle of American government is equality of all men before the law. This, as your honorable body is aware, involves the principle, already acknowledged in theory, of the total separation of church and state. But church and state are now practically united by the following statutes:

1. The law exempting church property from taxation.
2. The laws appropriating money from the public treasury for the support of institutions founded and managed chiefly by sectarian denominations.
3. The law compelling the observance of Sunday as a religious holy day.

The undersigned, citizens of the state of New York, do therefore respectfully but earnestly petition your honorable body to repeal all the laws or parts of laws of this state which are violations of the above principles. Our reasons for asking this are:

1. The churches are voluntary associations properly to be supported by the voluntary contributions of their members. 2. The state is compulsory. Every citizen must pay taxes. And we submit that it is unjust to a large and growing body of voters to be compelled to pay for the support of churches which they cannot conscientiously attend; for the hire of ministers in our legislature and public institutions, in whose doctrines they are unable to believe; and to observe as holy a day to them no more sacred than any other. We also submit that the exemption of churches from taxation, the appropriation of money for the hire of ministers and the support of sectarian institutions, and the legal observance of Sunday as a holy day, are discriminations in favor of one form of religion, are abridgment of the free exercise of religious preferences, and are therefore unconstitutional.

In support of this petition, and of the foregoing bill, Mr. Wakeman said:

ADDRESS BY T. B. WAKEMAN, OF THE NEW YORK BAR.

MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: We are here to ask your report in favor of impartial taxation. The gentleman to whom you have just listened [Mr. Samuel B. Duryea, of Brooklyn] has explained to you the general purposes of our bill, and enforced them by the general considerations which apply to the interests of the citizens of the state at large.

As the president of the Freethinkers' Association of this state, I have been requested by the American Secular Union, and many other societies which represent the people outside of the churches, to speak on behalf of the great mass of our population who are not church attendants, and who have no, or a very slight, interest in the churches at all. After me Mr. Gilbert R. Hawes will speak on behalf of many churches and church people who believe that the exemption of church property from taxation is no longer desirable, or beneficial to them. Thus we hope to show you that the general interests of the state, the large majority of the people outside of the churches, and a large portion of those still connected with the churches concur in the object which this bill is designed to attain.

First, then, the great mass of the people who have no connection with the churches complain that the exemption of churches and of their institutions from taxation is a gross injustice to them. It is a fact too often forgotten that the mass of our people are no longer church-members or attendants. In the city of New York, with a population of over 1,500,000, the church sittings all told do not exceed 400,000. The church people are not a third of the population. Yet this minority exempts its own property, and practically runs the city as if the majority had and ought to have no voice whatever. In the state the majority are ignored by the church minority in practically the same way, as the census will show.

Now, it is a mistake and an injustice to suppose that the large majority of our people who are not church-attendants have no rights or feelings in this matter which legislators are bound to respect. They have been ignored hitherto simply from want of organization and coöperation, while the churches are solid organizations which hitherto have tacitly coöperated for their common exemption, although otherwise unable to agree as to their own doctrines, or indeed as to anything else.

Year after year this matter has been brought to the attention of the legislature, until now the abuse has grown large enough and the people aroused enough to demand that the great act of justice, the principle of impartial taxation, should be inaugurated.

That the abuse is large enough has been abundantly shown by the general figures already presented to you by my colleague, Mr. Duryea, but fortunately, as a part of the agitation of this subject, in 1884 the legislature, at the instance of your predecessors the Committee on Ways and Means, ordered the state assessor to obtain from the local assessors all of the particulars in regard to this exempted property. The reports of the local assessors have not yet been made public except in a few instances, but fortunately the law has been complied with by the assessors of the city and county of New York. There we are able to see very well illustrated the gross injustice against which we protest. But in addition to this, on the ninth of February last, Messrs. Coleman, Donnelly, and Feitner, the tax commissioners of New York, made a supplemental report on this subject in answer to a resolution of the legislature passed upon the motion of Mr. L. L. Van Allen, of New York, which report gives the latest figures on the subject.

It there appears that the property actually occupied by the churches and exempted from all taxation amounts to $42,137,500; miscellaneous exempted property (not public), $33,994,930; total, $76,132,430. Nearly all of this church and miscellaneous exempted property consists of:

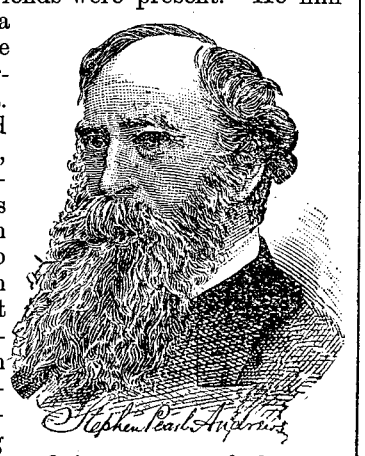
1. Ecclesiastical edifices and lands.
2. Educational institutions.
3. Charitable or eleemosynary institutions.
4. Burial grounds and cemeteries.

Nearly all of this property is under the control and influence of the churches, or exempted on the same principle or pretenses that are alleged as the grounds for church exemption, and therefore should in principle and in fact be counted with those exemptions.

This being so, we have only to recall that the average taxation in the city and county of New York is on the average two and one-half per cent to learn how much the church department of that city costs its people; for two and one-half per cent of $76,132,430 is about $2,000,000. To this add personal property tax, say $500,000. But this is by no means all of this tax. Our city makes very large annual donations under the pretense of charities, etc., to these church institutions. Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins has carefully collected the figures on this subject and published them in a pamphlet,* showing that on the average the Catholics receive $700,000 of this money, and the Protestants $350,000, making a total of $1,050,000. Nor is this all, for the custom of the city is to wholly or largely remit the assessments for local improvements which would fall upon this exempted property. Very much of this property is held in the part of the city where the streets, sewers, and public improvements are being extended. No official figures have been published as to this important item, but they exceed, as I am reliably informed, per year over $500,000. But this is not all, for, as Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins also shows, our religious bodies have only to ask in order to receive gifts of our real estate annually, either by direct or indirect action. Thus the splendid block of ground on which the Catholic cathedral is built was practically a gift of the city. Such gifts are, of course, irregular; but, as Mr. Hawkins shows, they are very substantial.

But without considering or counting assessments remitted or these gifts, we have already shown that the churches and their institutions in New York city receive over $3,000,000 annually, which is a direct appropriation for their benefit. For by this exemption these institutions have, practically, given to them by the city a receipted bill for this amount due from them to the city. In other words every inhabitant of our city is compelled, whether he will or no, to pay to the churches over two dollars a year. Every inhabitant I say, for the taxes are in the long run paid by the consumer. This enormous tax is levied and collected underhandedly, but it is no less a burden grievous to be borne, especially by the non-churchman. If he could see this tax of three millions and over when he pays his taxes, on the back of his tax bill, as he does the other great appropriations he has to pay, the enormity of the burden would be apparent, and he might obtain some relief. But it is all done so silently and in the dark, that no one sees or will believe that the church institutions of New York really receive the largest appropriation of public money made. If, as we read as follows on the back of our tax bills (taking up the tax bill of 1885):

For public charities and corrections	$1,501,058
For health department	469,758
For police department	3,727,350
For street cleaning department	1,200,000
For fire department	1,709,773
For education department	3,859,800
For judiciary department	1,305,150



If, I say, we should find among these great appropriations, as we do not, $3,000,000 for churches and their institutions, we should begin to see the enormity of this exaction. This tax exceeds the tax for any other city purpose, unless it be that for the great departments of the police, and public education; and if the figures could be fully obtained it is very doubtful if this silent tax would not exceed those. It certainly costs more than our park, our health, our street, or

Honor Where Honor is Due.

Brief reference was made last week to the reception given at Dr. E. B. Foote's residence on Lexington avenue on the evening of Monday, March 22d, in commemoration of the seventy-fourth birthday anniversary of Stephen Pearl Andrews. It was an occasion very gratifying to Mr. Andrews, and very creditable to those who arranged for and participated in it. Between fifty and sixty of the great universologist's pupils and personal friends were present. He himself lay at home upon a sick bed, to which he has been confined during the entire year past. The gathering was held in Dr. Foote's parlors, and the guest being absent in the flesh, art was made to represent him for the occasion. To this end was placed in one corner of the front parlor on an easel a half-length life-size crayon portrait of him, handsomely framed and decorated with growing ivies and potted ferns; and in a corner of the back parlor, on a pedestal entwined with smilax, stood a life-size bust taken in 1880 by Pickett, the sculptor who executed the statue of Morse, familiar to visitors to Central Park. An excellent cabinet photograph, of which the picture of the Pantarch given above is a duplicate, rested among the tulips and other flowers on the front mantel.

Dr. Foote's genial countenance was more genial than ever as he looked around upon the gathering, and upon the huge punch-bowl which he had placed upon a broad and convenient table, and filled with lemonade and based with fruits, icecream, and cake. At half-past eight he called the people to order, and made the opening address. He drew attention to the earnestness of Mr. Andrews in his life-work, how he had always elected to be in the midst of every battle for human rights, always in the van, chosing rather to keep fighting while there was aught to contend for rather than win laurels in one engagement and rest upon them. Dr. Foote spoke of Mr. Andrews's antislavery career, and of his service in introducing in this country the art of shorthand writing. Continuing, the doctor said that the Pantarch's works were largely sealed books because of the scientific training necessary to unlock their meaning, but he had no doubt that the seals would one day be broken, and their treasures laid open to the world. In conclusion Dr. Foote said:

Now, a word about our entertainment to-night. I hav here a letter which presents Mr. Andrews's views, and we will probably all feel disposed to acquiesce in his recommendations. I will read the letter:

THE LETTER FROM MR ANDREWS.

My Dear Friends: I hav been kept aware that it is a purpose with some of you to hav a sort of assemblage of my circle of half pupils and half friends, as my reception for them on the occasion of my birthday. The time selected is 8 o'clock P.M., Monday, the 22d inst.; and the place Dr. Foote's hospitable parlors. I hav very definit ideas with regard to the basis of the new sociability, which will be, I think, quite distinct from ordinary habits of thought. I having made an effort to state my views to a few of the leading friends, they, Dr. Foote, Sr., especially, were so impressed by them as to request that I would throw them on paper and hav them read on this occasion as my contribution.

They are to this effect: All our present habits and ideas of sociability are so based upon and ingrained in the old isolated institutions of society that it will cost a generation of regeneration to get them back to their natural basis of daily social intercourse. No sooner is something sociable proposed in radical quarters than every one flies in imagination to a ball-room, a concert-room a lecture-room, or something of the sort, which are merely so many additional methods of keeping people asunder in their several classes instead of uniting them in closer acquaintanceship in the intimate sociability of individuals, families, and habits. A close inspection of motiv would show that the real charm of our public assemblages centers in the half hour while the company are gathering, and the other half hour whilst it is dispersing; during which there is a momentary glimpse of a true, untrammeled sociability; afterward the interest passes from the heads and hearts to the feet and fingers, which are dominant in the old order.

In the new order dancing, music, theatricals, and all the numerous contrivances for amusing the people will giv place and preponderance to a developed skill on the part of the memberhood to amuse each other and themselvs with merely the natural resources of heart and mind. Imagin an assemblage of the great and good, the elite of humanity, having to resort to an orchestra to titillate their ears lest they should not be amused! What the people are really yearning for is the opportunity to come together in their great and useless parlors, and to inaugurate the parlor visit as the basis and type of intimate sociability—visitarium. The full development of this idea would require volumes of written and printed matter and years of experience in the best method of breaking down the old barriers between soul and soul or man and man in the common intercourse of life. To charm in conversation is the greatest and the highest type of social attainment.

S. P. ANDREWS (per A. J. P.).

I am inclined to the opinion that Mr. Andrews's proposition is well suited to a liberal, social assemblage. In fashionable society, where there is little of value to talk about, music, recitations, and other diversions are indispensably necessary to giv variety to the entertainment. We do not wish to giv up these exercises altogether, but, for an evening like this, short speeches of ten minutes, and a little music thrown in, will quite suffice, thereby saving the most of the evening for social intercourse.

Mr. F. F. Cook spoke of the guest as the greatest philosophic intellect of our time, uniting to a mind of extraordinary breadth an incisivness no less extraordinary. Thus there was added to a remarkable universality a no less remarkable personality. The man they had assembled to honor had ever been a generous giver of himself. To instruct others was with him a labor of love. And none knew better how to giv. The mind of their friend was one against whom others freely sharpened their own blunt intellectual tools. In the speaker's opinion Mr. Andrews's philosophy was par excellence the philosophy of the future, and that, too, of the immediate future. It was not a philosophy of compromises, but of balances. It was what its name implied, integral. Spencerianism was but a half truth—it compassed only the half-circle known as Individualism. The philosophy of Mr. Andrews was a whole truth. It took Mr. Spencer's Individual (which had also been the speaker's Individual until quite recently) and added to it the rest of humanity, for which Mr. Spencer, unfortunately, could find no room. Until quite recently Mr. Cook had regarded Mr. Andrews's Pantarchical ideas in the light of a harmless vagary, believing for himself that the social solution lay in quite the opposit direction. But the logic of events had converted him. The Pantarchical idea was actually now in practical operation. What was its central idea but the subordination of self for the good of the whole? In barbarism it was a despotism, in an enlightened age it would prove the most beneficent of régimes, and the grand army of labor to-day instinctivly turned to it as the only social arrangement with which to confront the individualistic Moloch of capital. But a single generation hence, and the name of their friend would be honored of all the world, and be canonized as one of its chief benefactors.

Mr. Wakeman said:

FRIENDS: We cannot but say to the good doctor, our kind host, that this is a pleasant event. Already it has sent a quiet atmosphere of mild and gentle happiness stealing through the hearts of all. Some, one at least, I know, has come here from a day of misery and agony that would seem to crush the very soul to hell with force enough to knock the very bottom out. But the soft murmur of your little assemblage, breathing out the mingling voices of sympathy and hope, courage and new endeavor, are potent to charm the very demons from the souls of the damned! All of the new angels of the world are social, and the first of them is sympathy; and the charm of that blessed spirit is here! We rejoice together over the victory of a mighty mind and heart after seventy-four years of conflict. We share in common the great harvest that life has garnered for us to be the sustenance not only of "the friends" now, but perhaps of distant peoples and ages. We are glad to pass the word from one kindling face to the other that the universal teacher, now the great invalid, is better to-day than he has been for weeks. We cherish still the hope that he may recover, but if not that his career may be transformed into a mightier power than any individuality can be on earth. Thus he seems now to float on the borderland of existence like the distant setting sun on the horizon, illuminating by his departing yet ever newly rising rays the two worlds of existence—the present and the to be. Such a transition of the great in mind, or heart, or deed is ever a sight "full of worship," more glorious than any Elijah translation to any heaven of old.

The voice, too, that has come from this great soul, read to us by the doctor, is one of comfort and good cheer in any event. It is the voice of one at peace and rest with the world, of serene trust in the harmony of things. It is not that the comforter is to be sent, but is here in the higher sympathy and social life which the new Universal Integral view of the world and of man's lot and fate opens to those who catch the meaning of its newer, higher life. He exhorts us to a new sociability, based upon the recognition of all of the facts of the world as they are, as if inevitably and therefore rightfully as they are, but not rightfully ever to continue as they are. It takes all sorts to make the world, and those sorts must be recognized as found, or they can never be reformed into the elements which shall compose the better world. Thus the Universal Philosophy is integral. It only has a scheme of things and a spirit that recognizes the sociability of all things, and makes all appear and feel at home. In its analysis it goes down to the individual and recognizes every thought, feeling, and capacity as having rightful play; in its synthesis it passes out and up from the individual and the now to the distant star worlds. Nay more, to the laws of those worlds, and the conception of the laws of abstract thought, independent even of space and time.

Surely the man in whose conception the universe is one ever freely making toward harmony and righteousness, is the one to admonish his friends to the recognition of a new sociability of worlds, systems, thoughts, feelings, lives, and aspirations. He has found a universe which is large enough for all, for of it all are needful parts.

Here, then, in this evening's group, let us not regret our differences, but see in them the elements of a higher, richer, because a more multifarious unity. Even in our social contact let not the differences be expressiv of more than a desire to find our corresponding elements of sympathy and cooperation. Such contact on the broader sphere to which the harmonial philosopher invites us, means a new place of social life. In our present state of society repression is the basis of society. Even in parlor meetings like these there must be no free nor high conversation. Only a few words of gossip or weather talk are admissible in "good society." To go beyond these would be as much out of place as the omission of the regulation evening dress. So men and women are concealed from each other effectually. Civilization is dwarfed and its higher evolution becomes impossible. This, perhaps, is all right enough as a fact, and a necessity of the older stage of social authoritarianism, but the newer life means that all aspiration is to be set free so as to learn its true sphere and inevitable limitations. There are those now, says our great friend this evening, to whom such a new sociability should be possible. He has paid to us the immense compliment of supposing that we may be of them. The individual is his unit, the whole family of the nations and peoples are his ultimate. The sociability of all is his ideal under the great laws of humanity and coöperation which his philosophy expounds. Yet the highest begins with the unit. Can its complete existence be secured, with healthy play of all its faculties? The great result of the harmony of all will be also secured by natural and artificial selection of the best. From such recognition and sympathy come new hope, courage, and endeavor, with higher and ever-increasing virtue and happiness. That such sociability may commence with us this evening is doubtless his wish, and that it may hav some time to begin my words may very properly end.

Remarks were also made by Hon. W. S. Andrews, Dr. Dwinnell, and Dr. Atkinson, and letters were read from Mrs. Wallace Britton, Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, and Prof. J. H. Cook, of Kansas.

At the close of the exercises, upon motion of Dr. Caleb S. Weeks, a committee was appointed to visit Mr. Andrews at his home on Thirty-fourth street and convey the congratulations and cheer of all his friends represented. The committee consisted of Dr. Foote, Sr., Elder Evans, of the Shaker community, Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, and Mr. John Bently. The patient was found bright and cheery, and exceedingly thankful for this act of remembrance. He begins his seventy-fifth year, if not fortified with good health, at least supported by the best wishes of all who hav enjoyed his acquaintance, and by the kindest offices of those by whom he is surrounded. While with most of us a birthday is but a milestone upon the journey toward the end, with this sage, working in advance of his day and generation, it is a step onward toward that recognition by the future which the present has in a measure denied him. It will not be strange if in time to come people gather together upon each recurring anniversary of his birth to celebrate, perhaps in a language yet unspoken, the memory of this man whose restless brain turned and toiled for them while their own parents slept.

The Liberal Club.

The 405th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club left nothing to be desired. Exercises were well along when the man bearing upon his vest Mr. Wettstein's emblem of intellectual emancipation took his seat at the secretary's table, and yanked his stylographic pen into a condition of utility. The lecturer of the evening proved to be Augustus Levey, Esq., who had chosen "The Iniquities of Modern Journalism" for his subject, and who at the period referred to was making an exhaustiv exposure of the methods of running a newspaper.

Mr. Levey spoke of the press first as to its editorial management, and then as to its value as a gatherer of news, and condemned it in both these capacities. He had reduced his own newspaper reading to a minimum, and anyone who should follow him in such an experiment would be surprised upon finding how small that minimum might profitably be. The editorials of a daily paper, he held, did not express the convictions of the writer, but of the corporation. What we read in the papers as "financial news" is often written by some member of the Merchants' Exchange, who pays for it as an advertisment, and makes the investment profitable by blackmailing his rivals. Great displayed headings in a paper, Mr. Levey said, did not necessarily indicate that anything startling had occurred, but only that newspaper space was cheap. There is no conventional phrase more false, the speaker continued, than the one which refers to the daily journal as a history of the world for a day. The fact is that the most important movements of the world are often entirely overlooked, and columns are devoted to something that may never hav happened at all. Paraphrasing Herbert Spencer, Mr. Levey said that the progress of newspaper lying was from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous. The redeeming members of the press were the musical critics, who were the only writers who appeared to hav been selected with regard to fitness for their position. These men he held to be public educators, because by discussing their subject intelligently they arouse a dormant public to a condition of musical receptivity.

Mr. Levey's address was a well-written and concise statement of his views on the question, and occupied little more than half an hour in its delivery. It was full of sharp points, and kept the large audience in a pleasant state of animation. At its close the chairman invited any newspaper man in the house to come forward and show cause why he should not hav his neck wrung forthwith. Mr. Wakeman remarked casually that THE TRUTH SEEKER was to be found upon the table, and that its report of the last meeting of the Liberal Club was an adequate refutation of what the speaker had said about reporters.

Robert Blissert, or Blizzard, attained the platform ahead of anyone else. This speaker passed first to a criticism of the lecture by Dr. Field to be delivered at the next meeting. He then produced a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing a picture of an Irish cabin, the artistic accuracy of which he proceeded to criticise. It was his opinion that the man wot dhrowed that picture had contorchered the throoth. Here Mr. Blissert, or Blizzard, lost his temper, and broke into a copious flow of profanity and abuse of this paper. He seemed to think that the man with the badge-pin was responsible for the picture. If Mr. Watson Heston had known what trouble he was getting this writer into when he made that contribution to the Irish question, it is doubtful if he ever would hav made it. Just as the speaker began to show symptoms of exploding, his time expired, and that disaster was happily averted. The audience called for the representativ of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and Blissert shouted his defiance at that individual, whom he unkindly referred to as an elephant. Mr. Wakeman assured the audience that the person in question could take care of himself, and asked that the discussion might be confined to the subject, whereupon the audience applauded, and order was restored. The man with the badge-pin thought at the time that he would tell in his report what kind of a man this Blissert is, but to show how charitable it is possible for him to be, he will content himself with procuring a handsaw at some other time, and sawing up the object of wrath into small pieces.

Dr. C. S. Weeks observed that newspapers were like soap—they were not good without some lie. The cartoon which had come so near proving fatal to Blissert was mischievous only on account of its truth, even admitting it to contain mischief. The good work which THE TRUTH SEEKER was doing far overbalanced the bad.

Mrs. Iliohan, of Albany, being present, was invited to the platform by the chairman. Mrs. Iliohan said that she always read with great interest the reports of the Liberal Club meetings. The newspaper was the great public educator. By reading newspapers Mrs. Iliohan, who is from Holland, learned the English language. The English of the press was the English of the people. By reading the Monday morning papers containing reports of sermons, often from the same text, yet always differing, she learned that ministers were sometimes mistaken. She also got her knowledge of the laws of the country from the press. Thus the newspapers had worked out her salvation.

Lawyer Searing said that this had been a better lecture than he ever expected to hear.

Madam Delescluze apologized for the editor by saying he must look out for his living, and that in this age of greed he sometimes lost sight of the truth in the pursuit of gain.

Mr. Redpath, of the North American Review, said:

There is no man for whom I hav a higher respect personally than for Mr. Levey, yet if he is proud of his profession I am proud of mine. If I had to liv my life over again I would be a journalist. The newspaper has always been the friend of the people, taking the place of the priest and the teacher. When I heard Mr. Levey, a lawyer, attacking the journalists, it reminded me of Satan rebuking sin. There never was a criminal so great that a lawyer could not be found to defend him. If we hav bad laws, who is to blame—the journalists? No. Seven-tenths of our legislators are lawyers. What Mr. Levey has said is true of some papers and false of others. The papers of this country cannot be thrown together and judged as a body, for they are as diverse as the people. Ninety-nine out of a hundred of the statements that appear in a newspaper are true, except the advertisments, which are not written by the editor but by the merchants, who thank God that they are not as these wicked journalists are. Excepting further the congressional speeches, but these are delivered by the lawyers, who also thank God that they are not as these wicked journalists are. As for the style of newspaper writing, it is plain and easily understood, and that is just the peculiarity of the work of the ablest and most distinguished writers. The poor or hasty writer uses long words; the able and careful writer employs the simplest language, to do which requires the best knowledge of a tongue. I was the originator of the custom of interviewing. The great critics of the interviewer are the clergy, yet they preach from a book which they claim is an interview with God. They say, "And God said," when the fact is that God never said anything of the kind and the clergy know it. And these gentlemen also thank heaven that they are not as the wicked newspaper men are. I hav spent my life among journalists, and hav never known a more honest, upright, or conscientious body of men. The sins which hav been attributed to them are not the sins of journalists; they are the sins common to all humanity.

Mr. Levey directed his closing remarks more especially at the last speaker. He said it was more his misfortune than his fault that he was a lawyer, but that had nothing to do with the question. His statements would be none the less true if he were a pirate. There was no doubt that the journalists were an honest and upright class of men; the trouble was that they did not allow any of their honesty and uprightness to get into their papers.

The program of the club for April is an attractiv one. It is as follows: April 2d, "The Six Laws of Art" (illustrated), by Dr. P. P. Field; 9th, "The Silver Questions," by Van Buren Denslow; 16th, "Strikes: their Ethics and Objects," by F. F. Cook; 23d, "The Historical Evolution of Liberty, and its Bearing upon Anarchy," by Dyer D. Lum; 30th, "Around the World in Eighty Minutes." Illustrated with stereopticon views, by Lillian Leland.

If in perusing the foregoing account of the proceedings at the 405th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club the reader detects the presence of a feeling of sadness and longing that is not akin to pain, and resembles sorrow only as the mist resembles rain, he may attribute its origin to the depressing influence of Mr. Blissert's remarks. If it should ever become necessary to the peace and well-being of this community for that Frenchman from Cork to be gently but firmly sat upon, the writer of these lines will willingly conduct the obsequies of that solemn occasion. There is a vacant chair beside Professor George Vaughn, of Virginia, in which Mr. Blissert would be eminently ornamental.

THE two articles, "Examination of Church History" and "Christ as a Teacher of Hate," promised for this number, are necessarily crowded out. Both will be concluded next week. The series of articles by McArthur hav attracted considerable merited attention, and form one of the most effectiv contributions to church literature that hav been printed of late years. The other article is by J. H. Burnham.

News and Notes.

I was quite pleased when I stepped upon the platform at Danville, Ill., to meet Mr. J. M. McKinney, of Pilot, Ill., on his way from a distance of about thirty miles to my lecture at Ridge Farm. Mr. McKinney is one of our pioneers in eastern Illinois. Through his efforts Mr. Remsburg gave a lecture at Pilot which quite stirred up that rural community. One of the results of this affair was the dismissal of Mr. McKinney's son as teacher in the public schools simply on account of his Infidelity. This is a specimen of what the church is doing all over the country wherever it has the opportunity. Its petty persecutions are innumerable, and are severely felt in our smaller communities.

Within three miles of Mr. McKinney is the famous Crazy Family, consisting of a mother, daughter, and two sons. They are well to do and hav always been respected, but religion got hold of them like a whirlwind, and reason went by the board. The daughter thinks that she is the mother of God; the sons think that, like Jesus Christ, they can cure disease. They are quite handy with the revolver, and hav a way of pointing it at the heads of passers-by and compelling them to take a certain course through hedges and ditches if need be. This is a very forcible kind of exhortation, and for the time being is very persuasiv. The sons hav been put in the asylum. Of course friend Appleton will protest against this. The government should not interfere. Has not one a right to use his own revolver as he will, especially when he is animated by a religious conviction?

I had a good audience at Ridge Farm. There is quite a Liberal element here among the business men and farmers. Mr. J. L. Brown, E. A. Brady, J. C. Pierce, Dr. Sulzer, Mr. Dicken, and others are quite interested in the Freethought movement. It is proposed on my return trip to hold a county convention at Danville, and no doubt there would be a large attendance. Only twenty miles from here is Paris, well-known as the birthplace of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Remsburg lectures there in a few weeks, and Liberals from a distance are making ready to go.

Chicago is like a woman; when she is ugly she is fearfully ugly. Her tears are by no means April tears, glittering with jewels; but they are mountains of mud. It rained and snowed all day Saturday, and when I got to the Garden City the heavens were black, and the sidewalks more so, and the streets simply indescribable—a melancholy aspect indeed. But how could I hav a particle of discouragement when the moment I landed I met the genial face of that unconquerable Liberal, E. A. Stevens? So I cared no more for the storm, but knew that somehow things would be right in spite of the clerk of the weather, who had taken on such an orthodox fit. It rained and snowed throughout Sunday, but spite of all there was a good attendance in the afternoon, and nearly a full house in the evening, and the meetings were very interesting, for after the lectures President Orchardson and Mr. Stevens, and General Trumbull took part in the debate. Especially able was General Trumbull's address, and he gave the "two Sams" a most searching analysis, and with them the popular Christianity of to-day which must resort to such means in order to make any impression upon the community.

The Chicago Secular Union met this Sunday in their new hall, a beautiful and convenient one, and I was glad to dedicate it to "The Glory of Infidelity." This union is going on to success. Mr. Stevens knows no such word as fail. Mrs. Freeman is not only eloquent, but, with a woman's enthusiasm, does the needed work. Professor Orchardson, General Trumbull, Thomas Galpin, Frank Smead, Chas. A. Frankel, and Mr. Reickweld, who has just joined, and others, make a company that will allow of no retreat. Our colors will be kept a-flying in this great metropolis.

I wanted to stop longer and become more acquainted, but had to hurry on to new fields. Here I am at Rochelle in the elegant home of Otto Wettstein, and a very pleasant time am I having, though in a few hours I must speed away again. I lectured here on Monday and Tuesday evenings, and the Town Hall was full at both meetings with people, the majority of whom had never heard a Liberal discourse. There are as yet only a few declared Liberals in this place. Some liv on farms several miles from the village, and those who know the depths of Illinois mud will not wonder they could not be with us as we hoped. However, we had by railway some Liberal friends from Creston, six miles distant, and from Foreston, thirty miles distant. No doubt these meetings will hav good effect. Those present seemed to be thoroughly interested in the ideas advanced.

Only a few miles from here is where I labored for three years in the orthodox pulpit and built a church. This was sixteen years ago, when I didn't know quite as much as I do now—although I thought I knew it all, for hadn't I been three years to a theological seminary? I was quite enthusiastic in those days. I preached in the morning at De Kalb, then walked six miles on the railroad ties to Malta, and preached in the afternoon, and then walked back again to De Kalb. I don't think I shall do that any more. However, the physical exercise was good, whatever might hav been the mental exercise. I presume that twelve-mile walk helped to giv me backbone enough to be an Infidel. If I had been rich enough to ride in a carriage I might hav been orthodox still.

All readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know Otto Wettstein. He is one of our best thinkers and most vigorous writers, and he has a future still before him. I had an idea I should meet a gray veteran of the cause, but instead I met a young man, capable of doing great things yet in the cause of freedom with his clear brain and forcible language. He is enthusiastic, and is ready to work and spend money generously for the advancement of Liberalism. For years he has been an outspoken Freethinker when there were scarcely any to stand by his side. It is remarkable that he has been enabled to do so much in the world of thought when from his youth up he has been so immersed in business and has not had that leisure which every thinker so ardently desires. Mr. Wettstein's advertisments are in our Liberal papers, and I can heartily say that he is worthy of confidence. He is capable and honorable. Mr. Wettstein has shown me his improved design of the Freethought Badge-pin, and it is quite attractiv. As the combat deepens and we need to know one another better, it is well to hav this significant emblem of our thought and the future for which we labor.

Mrs. Wettstein is also a Liberal of the working order. A few more such women, and theology would hav no chance. She had the good fortune to hav a Freethinking father, and so she was born in liberty. This is a pleasant home, indeed, with wife and children, and shows the beautiful results in life of absolute Freethought. These Liberals hav the respect of all, because with true manliness and true womanliness they never flinch from the plain yet courteous expression of their individual convictions.

I shall hav most delightful memories of my sojourn here. All, so far, has been most encouraging. Westward still, with the music of spring in the air.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Rochelle, Ill., March 24, 1886.

Pharisaical Preachers.

From the Sunday Mercury.

While the Museums of Art and of Natural History, and libraries are kept closed in this city on Sundays, and the Puritans of the pulpit are still uselessly inveighing against the Sunday newspapers, the British House of Lords hav voted to open all national collections of art and history on Sundays as on week-days. The Commons cannot be less liberal than the Lords. The archbishop of Canterbury and the bishops under him of course opposed such progress, but they are powerless to stop it. So the working people of London and elsewhere will soon be relieved from the Blue Laws which make Sunday a day of gloom instead of a day of recreation and jubilation. The bill now before our legislature, setting aside twenty thousand dollars per annum to keep the museums in Central Park open on Sundays, ought to be amended so as to include the Museum of Natural History in Manhattan Park, and passed immediately. A number of ecclesiastics hav written to the legislature in opposition to the bill. It perhaps never occurred to them that museums are educators and most elevating in all their tendencies. Their master loved the hard-working poor people, and would never hav denied them innocent enjoyment on the only day they can hav it. The crusade against the rights and liberties of the working-people is as cruel and unchristian as it is unrepublican and pharisaical.

our fire department. The religion of the minority is too expensive! Certainly, this is separation of church and state with a vengeance!

How it is done, open this report at random. Take for a sample the Twentieth and Nineteenth wards of New York city. The exemptions soon roll up into the millions as you draw your finger down the page; thus:

Property of Young Men's Christian Association	$600,000
Fourth Avenue Presbyterian church	300,000
Calvary church	300,000
St. George's church	300,000
Society of Friends	500,000
Presbyterian church	200,000
Young Women's Christian Association	200,000
College of St. Francis Xavier	550,000
Episcopal church	100,000
Jewish synagogue	275,000
Holy Trinity church	130,000
Free Academy	200,000
Trinity chapel and school	275,000
In the Nineteenth ward we strike:
Roman Catholic cathedral	$2,000,000
St. Luke's Hospital	120,000
Lenox Library (free?)	750,000
Orphan Asylum	1,200,000
St. Bartholomew church	350,000
Columbia College	750,000
German Hospital	300,000
Holy Trinity Dispensary	40,000
Mount Sinai Hospital	276,000
St. Vincent Ferrer's church, etc	300,000
Hebrew synagogue	200,000
Woman's Hospital	450,000
Hospital for the Ruptured	160,000
Colored Home and Asylum	200,000

And so we might go on page after page. In this way, throughout the wards of our city, the roll of exemption goes on until seventy-six millions and over are rolled up, with the annual tax of three millions as the result.

In a similar way, though doubtless in a smaller ratio, the returns from the local assessors of the state will foot up an enormous amount. The property actually in use by churches in this state and exempted will amount to $150,000,000, while the institutions and cemeteries under their practical influence and control will doubtless more than double that amount.

Now, this abuse is one of constant and enormous growth, ever increasing with the rise of property. It is, in a word, an enormous real estate speculation, in which the fortunate owners are the only speculators exempted from the often crushing drawbacks of taxes and assessments. They can mortgage without tax to friends, and so have the value of the property in hand, and yet, by holding the title as a church or church institution, it is all exempted. This exempted property grows in value, therefore, by every assessment and tax paid in the neighborhood, until its annual increase of value amounts to millions. President Grant was fully justified, in this view of the case, when he said that this abuse must be stopped, or confiscation or revolution would inevitably result. His admonition in these words is one of the most striking he ever uttered. He said:

> In connection with this important question, I would also call your attention to the importance of correcting an evil, that, if permitted to continue, will probably lead to great trouble in our land before the close of the nineteenth century. It is the acquisition of vast amounts of untaxed church property. In 1850, I believe, the church property of the United States, which paid no tax, municipal or state, amounted to $87,000,000. In 1860 the amount had doubled. In 1870 it was $354,483,587. By 1900, without a check, it is safe to say, this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000. So vast a sum, receiving all the protection and benefits of government, without bearing its proportion of the burdens and expenses of the same, will not be looked upon acquiescently by those who have to pay the taxes. In a growing country, where real estate enhances so rapidly with time as in the United States, there is scarcely a limit to the wealth that may be acquired by corporations, religious or otherwise, if allowed to retain real estate without taxation. The contemplation of so vast a property as here alluded to, without taxation, may lead to sequestration without constitutional authority, and through blood. I would suggest the taxation of all property equally (Grant's Message, 1875).

President Garfield put on record a similar voice of warning. In Congress, June 22, 1874, he said:

> The divorce between church and state ought to be absolute. It ought to be so absolute that no church property anywhere, in any state, or in the nation, should be exempt from equal taxation; for if you exempt the property of any church organization, to that extent you impose a tax upon the whole community.

Such expressions from statesmen, jurists, and even clergymen could easily be collected to fill a volume. The voice of the Democratic party, in its convention is noteworthy. At the national convention in 1876 the Democratic party declared in favor of "education and schools without largesses from the treasury to any," also "the separation of church and state for the good of each; and common schools should be fostered and protected." In 1880 that party repeated its declaration in substance. In 1884, when Cleveland was nominated, the party declared in favor of "the separation of church and state and the diffusion of free education by common schools, so that every child in the land may be taught the rights and duties of citizenship."

But the Republican party is equally clear. Compare the following statements of this great political party: The Republican party in national convention in 1876 declares in favor of "an amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbidding the application of any public funds or property for the benefit of any schools or institutions under sectarian control." The Republican Convention of 1880 repeats in Plank 4 the above declaration "to forbid to the legislature of each state the appropriation of public funds to the support of sectarian schools." In 1884 this party "renews" its allegiance to these general principles.

Time does not permit further quotations nor are they needful. There is not, there cannot be, any question but that this enormous, but underhanded, taxation is unjust to those who are not church-members, and a direct violation of the principle of separation of church and state which is fundamental in our country and upon which our liberties depend.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE (Hon. George Z. Erwin, of St. Lawrence Co.): Allow me to ask you, Mr. Wakeman, has not the practice of exempting such property as you refer to prevailed since the settlement of our country in every state? if not, what states hav abolished the exemption?

MR. WAKEMAN: Certainly the custom is an old one; it has come down to us from time immemorial when there was a complete union of church and state. The states which have abolished the custom are California and (partially) New Hampshire, and I believe some of the territories, Washington Territory for one. In other states the matter is in process of agitation with every prospect of an early change in favor of impartial taxation. For—

This change is being made necessary by the other changes to which I have just referred: (1) the enormous increase of the exemptions and of their value; (2) the enormous increase of non-church-members; (3) the necessity of separation of church and state, in order to preserve liberty; and (4) the consequent assumption by the state of functions which the church used to perform before our Revolution.

From the time of Henry VIII. down, the church, and finally the churches, took charge of the most important functions of the government. It was the source of education, charities, and all decent burial. No one could be born, educated, medicated, married, or buried without the church. In the church the people lived, and moved, and had their being—such as it was. But all that is changed now. More and more the state, or private or corporate enterprise, performs these functions. Notice our grand system of public schools which should be and must be extended. Notice our grand public and private charities. Notice the great cemeteries, which are cities of the dead, gradually passing beyond the church and its control.

Now that the churches have ceased to perform their old public functions, they should cease to receive public pay. Certainly nothing can be more just. The state is being compelled to take up these old church functions more and more every year. The state must do this or submit to a practical reunion with the church, as it has now largely done in the city of New York. Unless this course of union with the church is to be pursued to its fatal end, the time to prevent the further abuse of exempting church property has certainly come. There can never be a better, safer, or more convenient time to begin to abolish these exemptions than now—before the amount becomes so large that, as President Grant says, only revolution can furnish the remedy.

Now, secondly, let us advert for a moment to the excuses for exemption.

1. It is said that the churches and their institutions do perform their old functions to some extent, and therefore they should be paid for them. We answer, certainly they should be paid, but only by those who receive the benefits, or who wish to contribute for them.

Our state, which is separated from the church, has no right or justice in forcibly taking and giving to the churches the money of those who object to these church functions, and who do not receive them, nor wish to contribute to them.

The time was that the church and state were one. Everybody was born into the church, and lived and died there. Now the state is the church to the masses of the people, who hav separated it from the church, and support it by their taxes, and in which they are represented. Not one-third of the people go to the churches, or are represented there, or have anything to do with them. Why should they be compelled to pay this enormous tax without representation, and often for purposes which they abhor? They say that the Dark Ages were the church ages; that the more barbarous and retrograde countries of Europe and America are now those most under church domination; that in the city of New York the majority of the criminals and paupers are of the church which receives the larger portion of this enforced contribution to our "ecclesiastical department," and which can boast of its millions of dollars, and its millions of paupers.

But further, many of the non-church people believe that many of the church doctrines and practices are inherently immoral; that, however it might have been in the past, the present light of science has shown them to be unproved and detrimental to the public welfare in the present age. They therefore have conscientious convictions against furnishing further means to teach, for instance, the doctrines of total depravity, hell, the fall of man, the atonement, forgiveness of sins by prayer, the absolution by penance, the practice of circumcision, baptism, the infallibility of pope or church or bible or revelator. Now, it is to them an outrage, in a state separated from the church, to be compelled to pay for the teaching and support of such dogmas and practices.

Let those who believe in such traditions support them. But let no law compel others to support a religious belief abhorrent to their inmost convictions of truth or right or duty or the public welfare.

2. But it is said the moral influence of the churches pervades the whole social atmosphere; their education and charities and burial privileges are free to all; therefore, all should pay for them.

The facts are otherwise. What moral influences there may be from church schools, dogmas, and influences are limited to their own believers, and as to them the statistics prove they are sadly defective. Mr. Dexter A. Hawkins proves by the figures that those children trained in the parochial schools in New York are more than three times as likely to get into jail as the children trained in the free public schools. And as we have before remarked, the largest church shows by the figures to be the most prolific mother of criminals.

But their colleges and schools are sectarian, and open only to their own sectaries or to those wealthy enough to pay for them. It is a shame that while the common school system cannot give the rudiments of learning to thousands for want of means, we are by exemption paying millions to wealthy sectarian colleges like Trinity and Columbia and the University. Our city cannot now, owing to the limitations of our state constitution, raise more money, not even to open evening schools sadly needed. Let there be no more exemption of sectarian colleges until the whole people are taught to read and write!

Nor are the church charities and burial-grounds open to the people. They are open only to their own sects, unless they are amply paid by the city or by the applicant for all they give or do. Such are their hospitals and asylums and protectories. Yet for taking care chiefly of their own vagrants, poor, sick, and infirm the city gave to such institutions last year (1885) in actual cash, as appears on this tax-bill, the enormous sum of $1,108,057.51, besides the exemptions aforesaid. Certainly ignorance, poverty, sickness, and misery are good things for a church! They are the chief sources to derive its public revenue from. Why should it stop the supply of its delinquents?

As to burial privileges, the churches only grant them to their own members who are qualified for "consecrated ground," while cemetery companies open "cities of the dead" as real estate speculations. Such grounds are the sources of enormous revenues to their church or other owners. As graveyards they should be declared inviolable, but they should pay taxes like similar property, or the custody and control of such property should pass to the county or state and be under public control. The churches should not have the power, after a century of exemption, of selling out their graveyards as real estate speculations, as they have done in the lower part of New York. When they ceased to be used or kept as graveyards, they in equity belonged to the city which had given them and made every cent of their value.

3. But it is said the state institutions are wholly unable and insufficient to teach morals, educate the people, care for the sick, and bury the dead. We answer, if this is so, let the state institutions be enlarged and extended until they can do these things as far as the necessities of the public welfare may require. Let the rudiments of morals, of civil and criminal law, and of politics and government, be taught in all our schools from the lowest department to the highest. The churches do not do that. Let the public school system be extended so that it may not be said to our shame that there are over 200,000 people in the Empire State who cannot read nor write. Let the hospitals and asylums and work-farms of the people be extended until those who need care can be cared for. Let the dead—if not cremated—be buried by the state, county, town, or city in something other than the "Potter's Field," unless, perchance, they can pay a large sum to a priest or a great cemetery corporation. Let the people, in a word, learn to take care of themselves either through public or private means.

4. But finally it is said, How can our public institutions get the means to do these things? Are not our taxes too high now? Can we trust our politicians with more money?

We answer that there would be money enough to do all of these things if taxation was only just and impartial. Take the sum of $3,000,000 and over, which our city expends on these churches and church institutions, and expend it for the public, in addition to what is already expended, for educational and charitable purposes, and the difficulty would be solved without further taxation, and at once. How could our day and night schools then be increased! Our hospitals and asylums enlarged! Our cemeteries be opened to the public! Nor is there any reason to believe that our Secular and public teachers or administrators of charity would be less expensive than our ecclesiastical. What do we get now for this $3,000,000? A few sectarian sick and poor taken care of under sectarian influences. No administration of charity could be more ruinously expensive than this. Many is the contractor who would take this $3,000,000, and have a large profit after lodging every pauper or patient it now cares for, on beds of down, and feeding them on luxuries from plates of gold!

Thus finally, we see that the very arguments alleged in favor of this method of indirect performance of public requirements, by farming them out to churches, and then paying for them by the indirect taxations of exemptions and subsidies, are all wholly fallacious, and lead to the opposite conclusion. It is found to be grossly unjust to the mass of the people; partial and sectarian in its application; insufficient in volume, and ruinously expensive.

One consideration more is not to be lost sight of. It is founding within our secular republic an imperium in imperio; a power greater than the republic and independent of it. Finally, here, as lately in Italy and Mexico, and now in Utah, the question will have to be tried out which is the real government of the people, the republic or the church. By exempting the churches we cut them loose from any part and lot in responsibility for our public welfare, and make them a foreign element, and whenever their interest may be adverse to our schools, our laws, our public interests, we shall find too late that we have spent our millions to rear up in our midst a deadly foe to our republic and its institutions.

These considerations are so clear and overwhelming that it seems strange that this practice of exemption has been allowed to go on increasing from year to year. But the real difficulty has been perhaps not want of courage on the part of legislators to meet it, but the want of some practical device whereby the shock and change to the public and to vested interests, incident to the change, might be avoided. Happily, by the plan embodied in the present bill, which we owe to the Constitution Club of Brooklyn, all bad consequences of the new measure may be reduced to a minimum. By this plan one-tenth of the exemption is dropped every year, so that the church institutions and the public institutions may easily meet their new requirements, until, in the tenth year, the government of the people, for, and by the people, may be realized by the complete separation of church and state. Thus, by a gradually increasing grade of impartial taxation, we shall finally and safely reach the position which both justice and safety require us to take. We pray you to begin without further delay this easy but rising grade to the Temple of Justice.

Mr. Wakeman was followed by Gilbert R. Hawes, Esq., on behalf of the liberal Christians who believe that churches, like other corporations, should bear their share of public burdens. Mr. Hawes addressed the Committee as follows:

ADDRESS OF GILBERT R. HAWES, ESQ.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I appear before your committee for the purpose of advocating the bill now under discussion. The parties whom I represent are the intelligent and liberal Christians and church-goers of to-day who are sufficiently broad in their views as individuals, and public-spirited as citizens, to appreciate the great blessings which will result from a repeal of the present law exempting church property from state taxation.

This important question cannot be approached in any narrow spirit of bigotry or blind partisanship. It is neither political nor sectarian, and must be discussed solely upon its merits, in order that we may reach a proper conclusion as to what course is best for the public welfare, which, after all, is of greater importance than the building up or tearing down of any particular creed or sect.

My argument must necessarily be brief, and what I have to say naturally divides itself into three heads:

1. Justice to the state.
2. Justice to rival churches.
3. Self-preservation.

1. Justice to the state requires that every religious corporation or society owning real estate should bear its proportionate share or quota of taxation. Otherwise this burden must be distributed among and assumed by the general taxpayers. The only logical or legal reason or excuse for granting this exemption would be some benefit extended by the church to the state in return, as a consideration therefor. But in this country we have no such hybrid combination as "church and state." Each is useful in its own sphere, while yet independent each of the other. No particular religion is recognized, because all are recognized. Consequently, there can be no such institution as "the church." We have very many church organizations, none of which can in any way influence or affect the solidarity of the state or the autonomy of the state government. In other words, under the wise provisions of the Constitution, as framed and adopted by the patriotic statesmen of the Revolutionary period, the state in no way derives any rights, benefits, or powers from the church, and therefore the state is under no obligation to grant special privileges where there can be no return. This is a government "of the people, for the people, by the people," and our only safety lies in a stern determination to allow no infringement or impairment of the people's prerogatives.

To properly sustain the government, taxation must be evenly distributed. No exemption should be allowed unless it be in a matter of public necessity. The very indirect and indefinite benefit to the state, as claimed, in the improvement of the morals of the community, thereby lessening poverty and crime, is not a sufficient reason for granting exemption from taxation for all the property acquired by the various churches, whether used by them for religious purposes or not. For very many years the churches have enjoyed this immunity. Having received so valuable a franchise from the state, it is only just and right that hereafter they shall be asked to contribute to the support of that government which protects them in their rights.

2. I have already shown that the state recognizes no particular church or sect. All should be treated alike, and have equal opportunities of prosecuting the work of securing converts, increasing their numbers, and filling their coffers. But it is unjust to rival churches that particular church corporations and societies should be permitted special privileges, thereby not only diminishing the rights of the citizen, but creating discriminations which are neither wise nor fair.

For example, why should Trinity church corporation (to the positive detriment of the poorer and weaker churches of the Episcopalian denomination) monopolize to herself so much valuable land in the city of New York, on which are erected not church edifices, but tenement houses and office buildings? There is the Trinity building, 115 Broadway, and the old cemetery property in the Ninth ward, valued at many hundred thousand dollars, on which not one cent of taxation is paid into the state or city treasury. This not only removes so much property from the tax list, but gives Trinity an unfair advantage in the bitter fight which is being waged by all denominations at the present time for "the survival of the fittest."

Time does not permit me to more than refer to a few other glaring instances of this partiality and favoritism on the part of the state to some rich and powerful church corporations who can wield quite as much influence as any railroad corporation.

Grace church has been able for many years to prevent Eleventh street from being cut through from Broadway to Fourth avenue, in the city of New York, simply because the parsonage stood in the way.

But this line of conduct is not confined to any particular sect. In the upper part of the city on the west side, Bloomingdale Asylum, controlled by Protestants, and the Convent of the Sacred Heart, controlled by Roman Catholics, have been able to prevent the opening up of streets necessary for public purposes and demanded by the citizens generally, and at the same time have escaped taxation on the large tracts of land and buildings owned by them.

This fairly represents the state of affairs as it exists to-day. It is unnecessary for me to quote any figures, as the speakers preceding me have fully presented the matter from the statistical point of view. Suffice it to say that in the state of New York real property to the value of many millions is allowed to remain exempt from taxation. This property is held for the most part by a few wealthy and powerful churches. As has already been shown, this operates as an injustice to the state, imposes a proportionately heavier burden on the taxpayer, and practically grants special privileges to the few at the expense of the many. Shorn of these special privileges, all would stand on equal footing, as it should be.

3. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. Some of the wisest and most far-sighted men in the churches of to-day begin to perceive that in many instances there has been reckless extravagance in the management of their business concerns; that looking after large estates does not harmonize well with the religious duty of "saving souls," and that the attempt to amass great wealth, and build magnificent and costly edifices, is not altogether consistent with the teachings of the lowly Nazarene who advised his followers to "lay up treasures in heaven," and whose gospel was to be taught and heard "without money and without price." But now everything religious must be regulated by the edicts of fashion. This means increase of expense in all directions, and corresponding risk. We have only to study the sad history of the Methodist Book Concern for proof of this. Many of our missionary and other societies pay large salaries to their presidents, secretaries, and other officers, provide for them elegant and sumptuous offices, and then "save at the spiggot" by paying the poor missionary among the savages and heathen, doing the actual work, such a miserable pittance by way of "salary" that he is half starved. Consequently every now and then an appeal goes forth, and a "missionary box or barrel" is made up by contributions from the good people who have already paid their money to the church, and been taxed by the state to make up for the exemption enjoyed by this same missionary or charitable organization, which still begs for alms, and, like Oliver Twist in always, "asking for more." "Ne sutor ultra crepidam"—"Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." In order that the church should preserve its vitality and retain its influence on the masses of the people, all business speculations, and like enterprises, must be abandoned. I read from the New York Tribune of to-day:

Two important Protestant Episcopal church corporations are making arrangements to move their church buildings further up-town and away from the scenes of business and traffic which have invaded their present neighborhoods. These are the Christ church, of which the Rev. Dr. Jacob S. Shipman is the rector, and the Church of the Holy Trinity, whose rector is the Rev. Dr. Wilbur F. Watkins. Christ church is at Thirty-fifth street and Fifth avenue, and all around it are stores and boarding-houses. "Our people have been disposed to move for several years," said Dr. Shipman, yesterday. "This neighborhood is losing most of the members of the parish. It is being filled up with places of business, and many of the elegant dwellings you see about you are little else than boarding-houses. So we are going to move elsewhere, if we can possiby sell our present property. We are asking $300,000 for it—not, I think, an exorbitant figure. There are 64 feet in Fifth avenue and 125 feet in Thirty-fifth street. That makes a big lot, and the building could be converted for a great many useful purposes. Some friends of the church, whose names I do not care to mention, have bought eight large lots on the Boulevard at Seventy-first street, and are reserving them for the corporation. This is simply a private matter of their own, though the church understands and appreciates it, and expects in case it can effect a sale of this property to take their very moderate offer and build a plain, substantial structure on the Boulevard corner."

This, again, shows that our churches desire to be located not where they may do the most good, as among "boarding-houses," but where it is more fashionable and aristocratic.

We hear on all sides lamentations over the decadence of religious faith and the constant falling-off in attendance on places of worship. There seems to be but one remedy—let each church stand alone, without depending on the arm of the state, or any support other than the free and voluntary offerings of its members. Let it eschew all business other than that belonging to its special work and functions. If it does desire to accumulate wealth rather than "sell all and give it to the poor," let the church be put on the same basis as other business enterprises, and taxed accordingly. This would perhaps rouse the church to a sense of how far it has strayed from the original purposes and objects for which it was organized. It would at least be productive of good in teaching care and prudence and inculcating proper business methods. It would relieve the overburdened tax-payer and elevate the church to that position where its influence for good would be more largely felt and appreciated throughout the community.

The first step will be taken toward this desirable result when church property is no longer exempt by law from taxation.

Ruskin's Latest Idiocy.

Sir John Lubbock recently compiled a list of a hundred books which every nineteenth century individual should read. Among the authors recommended are J. S. Mill, Darwin, Gibbon, and Voltaire. John Ruskin has undertaken to criticise Mr. Lubbock's list, and the authors especially selected as the objects of his holy wrath are the four above mentioned. "Sir John Lubbock," he says, "ought to hav known that Mill's day is over." Darwin should not be read "because it is every man's duty to know what he is, and not to think of the embryo he was nor the skeleton that he shall be. Because, also, Darwin has a mortal fascination for all vainly curious and idly speculativ persons, and has collected in the train of him every impudent imbecility in Europe, like a dim comet wagging its useless tail of phosphorescent nothing across the steadfast stars." Gibbon is condemned for the reason that "primarily none but the malignant and the weak study the decline and fall either of state or organism. Dissolution and putrescence are alike common and unclean in all things; any wretch or simpleton may observe for himself and experience himself the processes of ruin; but good men study and wise men describe only the growth and standing of things—not their decay. For the rest, Gibbon's is the worst English that was ever written by an educated Englishman. Having no imagination and little logic, he is alike incapable of picturesqueness or wit; his epithets are malicious without point, sonorous without weight, and hav no office but to make a flat sentence turgid." After that the reader is prepared for anything Ruskin can say about Voltaire: "His work is, in comparison with good literature, what nitric acid is to wine, and sulphuretted hydrogen to air. Literary chemists cannot but take account of the sting and stench of him, but he has no place in the library of a thoughtful scholar. Every man of sense knows more of the world than Voltaire can tell him, and what he wishes to express of such knowledge he will say without a snarl." Mr. Ruskin thinks it more useful to study the habits of the shrimps which he eats for breakfast than the authors mentioned. This opinion is not more surprising than the fact that its author should hav been consulted about books at all. A prejudiced, and self-opinionated man—a sort of cross between a Carlyle and a court jester—there is no earthly reason why his opinion should be sought, nor, being obtained, why a reasonable world should care for it. Leave him to his shrimps and his mirror. His stomach and his vanity must be fed.

It Would Be a Lame Law.

Our German friends of Brooklyn—and the city of churches has no better citizens than these same Germans—hav introduced a bill at Albany providing for the sale of light wines and beer on Sundays from 2 o'clock P.M., after church hours, until 11 o'clock at night.

As affording uninterrupted opportunity to obtain beer, this bill is all that is needed. From 2 to 11 o'clock is quite long enough for one day's visit to a sacred concert. But the bill is all policy and no principle, and we are not a little surprised that the Germans, who are usually independent, are willing to acknowledge even tacitly that the demands of the churchmen that they shall not violate the Sabbath are founded upon right. If it is wrong to drink beer and wine during church time, it is wrong to drink them at all. And while, for physiological reasons, it may not be wise to use wines in the morning, the fact that a few people are listening to a sermon can not make the use wrong. If the church people hav the moral right to control the appetites and actions of the Germans in the morning, they hav the same moral right to continue their espionage all day.

The Germans should amend their bill to demand the abrogation of all Sunday laws, and let the saloons be governed by the same laws on Sundays that they are on other days. Besides, our Teutonic brethren hav forgotten the poor Americans who like their cocktails in the morning. Their proposed bill would leave these to slide in at side-doors precisely as they do now.

Turn the Bible Out.

George Heald is the teacher of the Pleasantville, N. Y., school. He is a Protestant, and rather pious. It has been his custom to make devotional exercises a part of the day's study in his school. Some of the scholars did not like them, and took advantage of his closed eyes, as he led in prayer, to disturb the quiet of the occasion. Until last week he was unable to detect the authors of these disturbances, but on Monday he prayed with the weather-leech of his eye lifting, as a sailor would say, and located the noises among what he called the Catholic element. He singled out three girls, and whipped them severely, one of them, Miss Walsh, brutally.

The girl complained to her father, and he has carried the matter to the courts. The teacher offered his resignation, but it was not accepted. The Catholic children's parents object to their learning theology from a public school teacher.

If Mr. Heald had obeyed the positiv orders of State Superintendent of Schools, Mr. Ruggles, he would not hav introduced his devotional exercises. He was not hired to pray, but to teach. The Catholics of his district are right in objecting to him, and we sincerely hope that he will be punished for his assault upon Miss Walsh by a term in jail. Public schools must be made wholly secular, and religion left to home instruction, or the Catholics will hav very good reasons for establishing parochial schools. One such bigot as Heald is worth an argumentativ fortune to the Catholic priest of the town.

Presumption.

The following argument appeared in the Independent. It is a remarkable specimen of Christian didactics:

"Whether the Bible is of divine authority, and hence binding upon the faith and conscience of men, is a question of fact, to be answered affirmativly or negativly in the light of the evidence. All must admit the possibility of its divine authority."

Not so. The possibility of the Bible being of divine authority cannot be admitted until the existence of divinity itself has been established. Divinity must be defined, and the definition proved.

"Every candid person will also concede that there is at least some presumption in favor of the divine authority of the Bible."

Another error. The presumption cannot be conceded upon reasonable grounds unless the divine authority has first been shown. One assumption based upon another assumption is two steps in the air. The higher one goes in this fashion the harder is the fall.

"What, then, is the rule of prudence and sound discretion in the light of this presumption? Our answer to this question is that such a presumption is, for all purposes relating to our practice, as good as the most absolute demonstration."

Let us see. So far we hav three steps in the air. A divine authority is presumed. The Bible is presumed to emanate from that authority. And it is presumed that these presumptions are as good as the most absolute demonstration! These premises being laid down, the argument begins:

"The Bible being a revelation from God, we are then in this world probationers for immortality, here forming a character that will determin whether we shall spend that immortality in heaven or in hell."

This is a beautiful specimen of what the lawyers call a non sequitur. Upon one assumption and two presumptions another assumption is based—that the Bible is a revelation from God. Upon this the thinking editor of the Independent builds again. He presumes a personal immortality, then presumes a heaven, then a hell. Now, we would like to call him back to earth for a moment, and hav him prove his immortality, then prove his heaven, and lastly, his hell. If what he has written further be true, it is absolutely necessary for the good of men's souls that he do this. We can never admit that "such a presumption is, for all purposes relating to our practice, as good as the most absolute demonstration." Neither will scientific men admit it. When Darwin lost a link in the chain of evolution, he said so, and acknowledged that the missing link weakened the chain. Presumption, with him, was never counted as good as absolute demonstration. Tyndall abandoned a faith in prayer because its efficacy could not be demonstrated. And we respectfully contend that if the following be true, the foregoing presumptions and assumptions must be made facts:

"The difference between the two [heaven and hell], considered in relation to our interests, makes the broadest contrast conceivable. Nothing can be more glorious than the one, and nothing more awful than the other. And if the Bible is but presumptivly true in what it says about this life and that which is to come, and the relation established by God between the two lives, so that one course of action will secure to us heaven, and the opposit course will involve the damnation of hell, then this is sufficient to giv a rule of action, and just as sufficient as would be the highest possible proof. This would then be our best light, and every one is bound to follow his best light."

How can anyone admit that there is any difference between two places of whose existence he knows nothing? The evidence offered so far is an assumption of the existence of a divine authority, a presumption that the Bible emanated from that authority, a presumption that this presumption is as good as absolute demonstration, a totally unwarranted conclusion that the people of this world are probationers for immortality, and the assumption, unsupported by even a presumtion, that there exist these two different places, respectivly named heaven and hell! What court would convict a chicken thief on such evidence? Upon what grounds can the statement be based that one place is glorious, the other awful? If the Bible be only presumptivly true, then heaven and hell are only presumptions, and it can only be presumed that differing courses in life will land us in one or the other, and in such an awful matter presumption is not "as good as the highest possible proof." Supposing a man presumes wrong, then what? And that some of the Christian sects are presuming wrong we hav the testimony of all the other sects. Every one is bound to follow his best light, of course, but suppose his best light is a firefly lamp leading to the dismal swamp? The summing up of this remarkable editorial is equally curious:

"The thing to be done on the basis of a presumption, and equally on that of an absolute demonstration, is to repent of our sins and believe in Christ, and bring forth fruits meet for repentance and faith; and this, upon either supposition, is the only safe course for anyone to adopt in the practical conduct of his life. Every other course takes the hazard of being ruined for eternity; and this surely is a hazard that no man can wisely take. There is a safe side in religion as well as on other subjects; and that safe side commends itself to our common sense, as furnishing a good rule of action."

This is an ex cathedra statement, of course, but it is one that must make the Independent's Roman Catholic neighbors smile. "The thing to be done on the basis of a presumption is to believe in Christ." Where did they get Christ from? On what presumption did he ride into view? Where is the presumptiv basis in any of the foregoing presumptions for repentance and faith? Where the basis for the dogmatic statement that every course other than repentance and faith is at the hazard of eternal ruin? And if there is a safe side in religion, which side is it? Is it the side upon which shines the best light? Ah, but that "best light" notion is heresy. The best light is private judgment, and the Romish church says that leads to damnation for every follower. The best light also leads millions out of the church altogether, and that, say the Protestants, is likewise damnation—ruination for eternity. Where, then, is the safe side? What must we do to be saved?

The Independent's argument for Christianity—and it is as good as can be offered—amounts to just this: Divine authority is assumed, that the Bible has the sanction of this authority is presumed, this presumption is presumed to be as good as absolute demonstration; and the further presumptions that there is such a state as immortality, such places as heaven and hell, that there is a being called Christ, that repentance and faith are necessary to avoid hell and gain heaven, and, suppositionally, there is a safe side in religion!

Such is the reasoning of the elders and prophets—assumption, presumption, and supposition! We search in vain for one little fact! Presumption is the best they hav to giv. And the mightiest presumption of all is that everybody will be cast into hell for disbelieving a scheme which its advocates can only presume is true!

"Great God! on what a slender thread Hang everlasting things."

Voluntary Associations and Government.

The Galveston Daily News, perhaps the most enterprising daily journal in Texas, takes up a point in our reply to our Boston friends that they seemed afraid to meet. The News says:

"The New York TRUTH SEEKER professes to be unable to see the difference between a mutual protectiv association and a government. The difference is radical. A mutual protectiv association derives no revenue by forcing anyone to be a member or to contribute. A government sweeps all persons in who reside within its territory."

We readily admit this theoretical difference, but the point we emphasized is this: that voluntary associations must endow the chosen governors with power to enforce their decision—subject always to the rules made by the people themselvs—else the society would go to pieces and mob law be the result. In other words, voluntary associations must hav government or they could not exist. The experience of the world demonstrates this. If no law existed, selfish men would grasp everything, and the brute force of individualism would rule. We did not contend that there is no theoretical difference between the two, but that there could be no practical difference—at least, until everyone had become as perfect as the angels are supposed to be. The News continues:

"Under the most liberal governments yet invented the majority elects a set of rulers who under some restrictions exercise a general and arbitrary power of taxation—that is to say, levying forced contributions for almost any purpose—and an arbitrary power to regulate the business and moral conduct of every inhabitant, without even a guarantee that taxes shall be for the equal benefit of all the people, or that regulations of trade and morals shall be simply defensiv. The officials elected by the majority can oppress the minority, and even the very persons who elected them."

In much of this criticism of existing governments, the News and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER are at one. The persons elected to power often do abuse their trust, and against this we will ever protest. And we may go further, and demur to a great many of the rules the people hav seen fit to adopt for their own guidance. But we believe in reformation and not revolution. The News says that our rulers, "under some restrictions, exercise a general and arbitrary power." So they do; and right here is the point. The restrictions should be enlarged and enforced. This would do away with the fearful abuses under which the country now suffers, while not permitting lawless individualism to dominate. Officers should hav no power to levy taxes except for purposes approved by the people as specified in the rules adopted by themselvs. A very little government—and that relating solely to mundane affairs—is all that is necessary; but that we can do without any we do not think the News will claim. Neither can we think the News will assert that voluntary associations can get along without rules for the members' guidance, for a rule without a power to enforce it lodged somewhere would be no rule at all. This question of government or no government is not, as our Anarchistic critics would hav it, a matter of theory. It is entirely a question of fact. Here we are in the world, good, bad, and indifferent people. Can we to-day liv in peace without some government? Are there any indications that within any reasonable time we can so liv? Yes or No? If Yes, when? If No, what are you going to do about it? Spend your time in advocating an impossibility, or put your shoulder to the wheel and work for reformation of recognized abuses? That the editor of the News sees this there is no doubt, and therein he differs from his Eastern brethren of the Anarchical school. His concluding remarks we can adopt: "Set production and exchange as free as religion is; let the individual grow to perfect manhood; and reduce government to the proportions of a police power and national defense power, after which, if deprived of invasiv attributes, it would hav undergone an essential evolution and could no longer be the spoils system which all governments at present are." Whether government can be reduced quite as much as the News indicates is a matter of doubt. There are some functions of society now performed by government which the News's subsequent editorial in reply to a statement of ours has not convinced us can be safely left to the care of selfish individualism. We mentioned as one of the good things resulting from government a stable currency. To this the News retorts:

"A stable currency, perhaps. What currency? Perhaps one kind; perhaps many kind—perhaps an unstable currency. Hav not governments made execrable currencies, and licensed corporations to make the wildest of wildcat issues? Is not the government continually on a see-saw, and are not the people kept in a state of agitation about this very matter, because the government assumes to settle and again to alter and tinker with a matter of business?

All of which is true enough so far as it goes, and from one point of view. But there are more than one side to most questions, and this is no exception. Bad as governmental issues may be, the old state banks were over thirty times worse. And individual or mutual banking without governmental backing would be still more unendurable. Without going into the intricacies of the currency question, we think all will admit that the United States note, good in any state, is better than state notes, or individual notes, to the extent that thirty-eight states form a more responsible party than one state or one individual. If banking were under no governmental supervision, it requires no prophet to foresee that there would be an immense amount of swindling going on. Our banking system has quite enough objectionable features without multiplying them.

The News continues:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER combats Senator Wilson's bill to prohibit the mailing of publications containing lottery advertisments. But Mr. Wilson probably considers a lottery quite as bad as the wildcat bank, which appals THE TRUTH SEEKER'S imagination. They agree in distrusting and forbidding freedom of commerce, and lodging despotic powers in Congress, or in state legislatures. After that they may contend for a lifetime as to the wisdom and justice of any particular application of those powers. The matter of justice becomes in that way a petition for benevolence. It can be nothing more, when addressed to a power not under the necessity of entering into any bargain with the complaining persons, who hav no power to withhold obedience which serves instead of consent. THE TRUTH SEEKER would complain if the publications of the Infidel sect were excluded from the mails. But Christians generally may consider them worse than either wildcat issues or lottery tickets or flash papers, and may add to the list of desiderated services by government the suppression of Infidel papers. Perhaps the state as yet tolerates such papers because they do not attack its existence. Whenever they do, and become formidable to the state, they may learn whether a government is not an institution supreme to the units who create it."

This is going too far. There is such an instrument in existence as the Constitution of the United States, an instrument defining and delegating to Congress the power it may exercise. The power to prevent lotteries is not delegated to Congress. It is, therefore, reserved to the states. Congress may constitutionally establish post-offices and post-roads, but it may not inspect the contents of the mailbags. There is no constitutional nor legal power in this country to do that. And when the Supreme Court went out of its way to say it had (an obiter dictum judgment, the lawyers call it), the judges violated their oaths to support the Constitution. But on that account we do not advocate the abolition of the Supreme Court. We would, instead, hav the people hold the judges to the constitutional restrictions placed upon them. Under our Constitution Christians cannot suppress Infidel publications, nor can the government punish him who advocates its abolition. The definition of treason is clearly limited to overt acts. There are a dozen papers in this country crying out against the government, but the freedom of the press is guaranteed by the same article of the same amendment to the Constitution that guarantees religious freedom. The News's remarks on these points are deprived of their force because of lack of conformity to facts.

There is a scholarly courtesy in the criticisms of the Galveston News becoming to a great journal, which we miss in the editorials of the smaller Liberty. Whether or no it would not giv force and dignity to their utterances to copy the style of Mr. J. L. Walker of Galveston is a question we leave to the judgment of Messrs. Tucker and Appleton.

Editorial Notes.

A PRIZE of $100 has been offered by the American Baptist Publication Society for the best tract on "Giving to the Cause of Christ." The manuscripts are to contain not more than 1,050 words. We shall contend for that prize, and here is the tract: "The horseleech [the church] hath two daughters [Protestantism and Catholicism] crying, Giv, giv."

WE hav received the first number of La Tribune des Peuples, a monthly devoted to the social movement. The editors also send this notice: "We engage livly those of our readers who knows the french language to read this interesting monthly review. The first No is send gratis and free of expense, to all those who wish it, and who address themselvs to the bookseller's shop of des Deux-Mondes." The address of the publication is 17 Rue de Loos, Paris, France.

THE island of Barbadoes, an English dependency in the West Indies, is a good place for the priests. Its area is 106,470 acres; the population numbering 171,860, of whom 155,806 are colored laborers. The church and state are united, and the government supports a bishop at £1000 per annum; nineteen rectors at £320; twenty-one curates at from £200 to £300, and lesser officials in proportion. The Blue book givs a list of the fees allowed the church, "being appropriated to the use of the officer receiving them." The chancellor of the diocese has perquisits as follows:

On the consecration of a church or chapel	4	4	0
On the reconstruction of a church or chapel where by law required	2	2	0
On the consecration of a burial ground	1	13	4

Barbadoes seems to be a pretty good place for professional pictists, and the trade of soul-saving there must be a lucrativ one.

REPORT has come to our ears that THE TRUTH SEEKER is to be boycotted for publishing in its issue of March 20th a cartoon entitled, "A Contribution to the Irish Question." The boycotter-in-chief is Mr. Robert Blissert, to whom the cartoon in question has given offense. We are therefore to be deprived forthwith of our Irish constituency. It was before the Constitution Club of this city that Mr. Blissert first made known his dire determination, his action at that place being followed by a violent attack upon the paper at the last meeting of the Liberal Club, and he will lose no opportunity, he declares, to lower THE TRUTH SEEKER in the estimation of the workingmen. Now, THE TRUTH SEEKER does not propose to take back anything that was expressed by the spirit of the cartoon in question. With anybody's misinterpretation of it we hav nothing to do. The great enemies of Ireland, we insist, are the pope and the priests. It is matter of history that in the year of grace 1155 the pope of Rome presented the Emerald Isle to Henry II., and that a later pope re-deeded it to Queen Mary. Catholicism has gone through that country like a flock of geese, devouring everything before and ruining everything behind it. It has brought Ireland to poverty and dependency, and made her a perpetual pauper among nations. With the grip of the pope upon her unbroken, Home rule to-day would be practically Rome rule, as the German liberal politician Blind has pointed out. The Irish people or any other people must be mentally free before they can enjoy political freedom without abusing it. That is what THE TRUTH SEEKER desired to point out, and the sooner the Irish people recognize its truth the better for them. As for the boycott which Mr. Blissert proposes, it would be altogether out of order. That method of moral suasion was not invented and should never be used as an engin of religious persecution; it has been directed altogether toward industrial ends. This paper is on good terms with the trades unions; when it breaks with them, there will be at least an excuse for a crusade against it. Mr. Robert Blissert is making a fool of himself.

THE Catholic Mirror of Baltimore concludes an address to the Maryland legislature against the injustice of refusing any portion of the school money to the parochial schools as follows:

"If we show that we hav one-fourth of the school-children of Maryland in parochial institutions, on what principle are we denied an equivalent share of the taxes raised for the purposes of education, and paid by the whole people? Let it be understood that we ask no concession, we beg no favor. We simply demand that an intelligent inquiry be made into the facts of this question. If this be done in a spirit of justice, we hav no fear that the cause we advocate will not receive the amplest vindication."

Oh, certainly! Giv them the whole country and make the pope president!

THE first of last month the World of this city printed this dispatch from Harrisburg, Pa.:

"Mrs. Eliza Sloan Boyd, the oldest nativ-born resident of Harrisburg, and the first white child born in this city after the town was laid out—being born in 1800—died yesterday. When a young girl her parents moved to New York city, and while there she frequently went on missions of charity. On one of these occasions she visited the house of Tom Paine, the Infidel, when he lay dying, and it was frequently asserted by Mrs. Boyd that Paine did not die a disbeliever, but called on God in his last hours."

Paine died June 9, 1809, when this estimable lady was only nine years old. At that age she must hav been a very competent witness. The inventor of the story, however, overlooked a point. Paine believed in God, and there would hav been no incongruity in his mentioning the name of that formless shade. The writer should hav alleged that he called upon Christ.

THE Baltimore Methodist Conference adopted a report of the committee on Sabbath observance recommending that the Methodist clergy should preach once at least each year against the selling of newspapers, traveling by car or steamer, opening the museums, art galleries, libraries, and so forth, on Sunday. An amendment including street cars was lost, as a matter of course. Traveling ministers can reach their appointments on Saturday night, but in cities they would find it difficult to reach the churches on Sunday without the street cars. These saints might hav expressed their meaning more clearly by adopting some such resolution as this: "Resolved, That we unqualifiedly condemn and denounce as sinful, and contrary to God's law and the scripture, everything that we do not want to do ourselvs." And they would hav been more honest, though scarcely better understood, if their last resolution had been: "Resolved, That we are hypocrits."

FOR the last four months Louis B. Keller, a faith-curist of Newark, N. J., has been running a mission in the upper part of this city. Lately he announced that he would return to Newark, as the city had too large a heathen population for his purposes. He complains that the roughs put tar on the benches of his hall, burnt pepper to drive the people away; twice they turned out the gas; once filled the church floor with fetters; once took full control and danced; once struck Mr. Keller with stones in the head, cutting it; twice they dragged him by the whiskers; broke the meeting up three times by drunkards; stole two stoves from the church; broke the door and windows and drove nearly all the Christians away, and wound up by setting the house on fire. After recounting these indignities suffered, Mr. Keller closes with "a few words to the churches of New York: You had better see to your heathen in New York, and leave the heathen in Africa, China, etc., for God, for there is much more hope for the heathen in China to get to heaven than the heathen one block from Dr. Taylor's church, Thirty-fourth street and Broadway, New York. God hav mercy on heathen New York city!"

W. S. BELL lectures in Cherokee, Cherokee Co., Iowa, April 6th, 7th, and 8th. Possibly he may remain there as late as the 10th. Persons wishing lectures by him may address him at that point.

Letters from Friends.

BLOOMINGDALE, N. J., March 18, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Having observed a few lines from Mr. H. C. Luse in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 13th in reference to the cartoons on the outside leaves, I could no longer resist writing a few lines on the same. With Mr. H. C. Luse, I would say, "I do not like your pictures." I made an effort to secure subscribers. I succeeded in getting three for 1886; this encouraged me to try and get more. I recommended the paper highly to others. Having three sample copies, I sent them to persons of short acquaintance, two of whom were ladies, and when I received my paper of February 6th, the same as the copies I sent, I at once wrote apologies for speaking so highly of such grossness (I hav reference to the outside picture). I received a note from one of the ladies before my apology reached her; this is some of the language: "The paper you sent I received (thank you); the picture was horrible." This has not encouraged me to solicit much since, especially among ladies. I fail to learn how these pictures are to be productiv of any good, for they, in my judgment, elevate neither morally nor intellectually. Why not hav pictures in astronomy, geology, or botany, which would be more instructiv?

Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds visited this place on the 24th ult. Mrs. Reynolds delivered in an earnest manner a lecture, "A Woman's Reasons for Secularism." Much excitement followed. Infidelity with all its evils was preached from two pulpits for over two weeks. Hell and brimstone hav been of great service to the clergy here at the present time to frighten their flocks back to their old rut of bigotry, with their imaginary heaven ahead, and their imaginary hell behind and on all sides, and in their imagination smelling the fumes of brimstone from the place of the damned that are ever burning. Every Infidel has been denounced as vile and too wicked to liv in this Christian land, where all the good has been due to Christianity. This town has been disgraced, and the questionable reputation of Mr. Reynolds is to be inquired into by the Rev. T. Hall of the M. E. church. Infidelity is going to suffer now. Look out, Infidels—great shall be the crash. The few Infidels here are afraid to say their souls are their own, and when Mr. Reynolds was here they made themselvs scarce lest they would be seen by the Christians.

Oh, for a shower of common sense and reason, to take the place of blind faith and priestcraft.

Yours for mental liberty, GEORGE KRAHMER.

DURAND, ILL., March 15, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I favor your publication of the pictures most decidedly. Properly studied, they educate and enlighten. They supplement and illustrate the written word of Liberal literature and argument, and, I think, tend to giv quality, positivness, and strength to the spinal column of the average Liberal or Secularist, a thing much needed in some quarters. They place in view to all observers the earnestness and self-assertion which honest thought is acquiring. In these pictures there is philosophy, logic, and truth. There is a deal of the mathematical in them also. They point the finger of derision, 'tis true, toward sham and pretense; they express a scorn of the lie of religious humbug or hypocrisy, and they teach us to defy ecclesiastical tyranny and priestly and religious hate, but this in no wise proves or indicates a perverted taste, but the contrary.

All this is legitimate moral endeavor as a method of reform in law and manners. It is in the line of self-defense against the perverted and immoral; a legitimate war against corruption, against social and governmental vices, against a slavery from which, as victims, we would emancipate ourselvs.

These remarks are prompted by a deliverance of H. Clay Luse, of Waynesburg, Pa., published in THE TRUTH SEEKER March 13th.

I hav no doubt Mr. Luse is a model young man. I formed an agreeable though slight personal acquaintance with him at the Cassadaga Congress of the National Liberal League, in 284 (1884).

Friend Luse does not "enjoy such caricatures," deeming them "repulsiv exaggerations of the truth." I am sorry for the "mistake" and "influence" which hav led to this unlikeness, and would gladly contribute to my young and earnest brother's relief.

The element of comicality which pertains to the cartoon method of propaganda, in the case and cause of Liberalism, I suppose, is to remove from said propaganda a measure and degree of the acerbity and austerity which the tragic implies, and which inheres in the principles which antagonize us as Liberal citizens and Secularists. If the comic is repulsiv in appearance, it may yet be a necessity as a means to an end, which, I think, should, and does with me, remove its repulsivness.

I do not consider the truth exaggerated, or exaggerated upon, except it be contradicted, which I do not call to mind as having been done in any instance as recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

In the idea and principle of the comic in cartoon logic it is expected that a suggestion somewhat of the ridiculous and grotesque will develop; the artist is not bound to a literal exactitude of detail. It is sufficient if, in the plot on design, the analogy symbolical of the leading ideas is maintained.

I consider Watson Heston an adept in ideology, or, if you please, in cartoonology. His pieces indicate the philosopher and the well-read citizen and Liberal and I cannot appreciate the remark of Brother Luse that their publication is a "mistake." They lead through the "sensual nature" to the intellectual and the moral nature, and only the "influence" of priestcraft can be "marred" by their pungent and unanswerable logic. I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER in place in using the picture element, magnetic and electrical, in giving force to the "cyclone" which commenced rising in the days of Bruno, and to which was added volume in the American and French Revolutions.

May "superstition and ecclesiastical tyranny" go to and under the wall as the final result.

Truly and fraternally, JOHN STEVES.

NORTH PARMA, N. Y., March 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: It has been my privilege during the last year to be a subscriber to and a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. With very much of its contents I hav been well pleased and edified. But I must say that upon the reception of last week's paper I was very much disgusted with the illustration, entitled, "A Clerical Surprise Party." While I am an out-and-out Agnostic and Liberal, and do not entertain the slightest belief in anything that savors of the supernatural, and tenaciously hold to my right to think and act upon theological matters for myself regardless of the views of the Christian church, I do not ask any more for myself than I am willing to accord to others.

While I may radically differ with the views promulgated by the church, I believe and know there are many of its ministers and lay members who are earnest and honest, and are endeavoring to do good and make the people better. If they can get any consolation out of their doctrins let them enjoy it, unless we, who think that we hav a better than they, can by our example, and sound logic, and good reasoning, convince them of their error. You cannot do it by abuse or throwing mud. The religious world is moving in the right direction fully as fast as we can expect. The preaching of today would not hav answered at all thirty years ago. Very many of them hav given up such absurd ideas as the doctrin of election, special providences, the Bible theory of creation, a literal, burning hell, and many other of the absurdities and outrageous wrongs which the "good book" teaches. But it is a hard matter for an individual to giv up the ideas and doctrins of a lifetime. If Beecher were twenty-five years younger he would be an Infidel. Let us giv him and others of his class credit for being as liberal as they are, for they are doing very much good. As to the illustrations, continue them. There are plenty of subjects which can be shown up with advantage and profit that need not offend the sensibilities of the intelligent and refined, but will set them to thinking in the right direction. Permit me to suggest for instance, it might be well to show up some of the doings of that exceeding wise man, Solomon, or some of the caprices and cruelties of the "man after God's own heart" (David); for instance, his putting Uriah in the forefront of battle after having seduced his wife, or his loving kindness to his enemies after taking them prisoners, 2 Sam. xii, 30, 31; and in conclusion let me advise that we, as Liberals, act to others as we would like to hav them act toward ourselvs. There is an old saying, "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad." Now we, as Liberals, do not wish to destroy anyone, but to convince them of their errors, and make the world better for our being in it. But I hav drawn this out too long, and will close. Fraternally yours, J. TOMPKINS.

NEWPORT, ME., March 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I decidedly disagree with your correspondent Luse about the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are grand, and instead of my being "ashamed" to show them, I am proud to do so. The church has no respect for our feelings, She delights to slander Infidels, and when she speaks the name of one of nature's grandest productions, Thomas Paine, does she ever call him anything but "Tom" Paine?

I wish I had a million illustrated TRUTH SEEKERS to circulate instead of one. SEWARD MITCHELL.

UNION, MO., March 15, 1886.

Mr. EDITOR: Inclosed I send $1, for which send me "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion." You say it is a splendid book to loan to Christian neighbors. I hav always loaned THE TRUTH SEEKER to my Christian neighbors, but since you hav illustrated the paper with those nice (?) pictures, I feel ashamed to show the paper to any church-member, and I fully agree with Mr. H. Clay Luse that the pictures are repulsiv exaggerations of the truth. We Liberals don't need such pictures, and a church-member or Christian feels insulted if you show him the paper; even if he looks at the pictures he will not read the paper.

Your last cut on the front page is childish, and at the same time insulting to all church-members, and, as Luse said, out of place in a grand Liberal paper; and judging you, Mr. Editor, by your writing, I believe you yourself are ashamed of such pictures. I am an Infidel, and also a Liberal, and I know, and every Infidel should know, that we can only change a church-member to an Infidel by using kind and liberal arguments, and not by insulting him. If you follow Mr. Joseph A. Shade's advice, and use two pages of your paper every week for plain Bible expositions, and also keep such insulting pictures out of your paper, and not allow every crank to publish his fanatic opinion in your paper, it will be better for your paper and for our cause.

I notice that many of your readers are delighted with the pictures, and after one had said they were immense, the rest followed, and they all said immense. Yes, they are an immense absurdity, and unworthy of your paper.

I hav no right to dictate to you what pictures to print, or how to conduct your paper. I hav only given you my opinion as a friend of your paper; but if you continue to print the same kind of pictures, I don't want the paper any longer. Don't let your fanatic friends ruin your paper.

Truly yours, CHAS. REMHARD.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., March 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much delighted with your pictorials. I hav been reading the Bible, and find you hav followed it to the letter. I cannot see why even the most professed Christian should object to the teachings of that book. I think the minds of the people can be reached by this method better than any other way, as they set the people to thinking as well as reading their Bibles. I am quite sure that if the people will read their Bibles understandingly they will all become truth seekers, as every church I hav ever heard of professes to teach the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. This is the reason why so many thousands of the people like your valuable paper, and are turning their attention to its teachings. I think it one of the grandest truths of modern times that we hav a paper wherein we can deposit our grandest and highest thoughts of God, and the only way to reach him is to follow all truth. I know the church always teaches that good work availeth nothing, contrary to the teachings of Christ. And what can any Christian say of the church that does that? Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER liv. As long as it confines itself to all truth it will liv.

CHARLES SACH.

FORT SULLY, D. T., March 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Since you commenced illustrating your valuable paper, I hav often thought that it might interest you to know what we here think about it, and that is the reason I send you these few lines.

Well, we are not satisfied with those illustrations. We think the good old TRUTH SEEKER is too good a paper to be decorated the way it is now. The quantity is too rich and the quality too poor for anything. I will admit that good illustrations can help a cause considerably, but as for THE TRUTH SEEKER'S illustrations at present, I think them a failure. It is my hope that it might change soon, so if we can not hav THE TRUTH SEEKER as it was before, let us hav less of illustrations and something finished. With best wishes for our cause, I am Yours, JENS M. C. MARIAGER.

SNOWVILLE, VA., March 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I wish thee would issue once a year a book of the pictures of THE TRUTH SEEKER in a volume by themselvs. Can't you do it? Don't be alarmed because one now and then objects to pictures. My correspondents are legion, and all who speak of them are delighted with them and the forcible good work they will do. They are effectiv weapons, and I hope will be continued. ELMINA.

SAN JOSE, CAL., March 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I want a few cheap pamphlets; you will find the money, if you look sharp, in the corner of this card.

Putnam will soon be in California, and we must try and arrange to hav some good lectures. Your pictures show up old popery first-rate. Hit 'em again!—giv 'em "Hail Columbia!" And the Protestants are about as bad.

SAMOS PARSONS.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., March 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am casting a few crumbs on the water and hope they may return to you a subscriber or two. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberals success, I am glad to see sturdy blows both right and left against all forms of ignorance and error. Keep on swinging the battle-ax of freedom until every man, woman, and child is free from the fear of sheol or church influence.

I vote for the pictures; may their shadow never be less. Sheol, with hell in the background, date March 6th, is simply immense, and graphic. Let all the world hear what the pictures say unto the supporters of churches.

Mr. Putnam must not pass us by. San Bernardino needs a warming, and he is the man in the right place.

Respectfully, N. WOOLSEY.

BOSTON, MASS., March 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been much pleased with all of your first page illustrations, but I must say that the one in the last number (March 13th) is particularly fine as well as prophetic. The position of Beecher is good; in fact, it is immense. I feel to congratulate you on securing the services of an artist of the keen originality of Heston, and I feel confident that it will prove a feature of great attractivness to the general public. I feel anxious that you should perfect the arrangements you mentioned in a former letter to place them on sale in our city, and the larger cities of New England, and the news stands. I would also suggest that the cuts be printed on a sheet for distribution as a tract. I inclose herewith a half dozen names of gentlemen whom I would like you to send a sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER—if possible, last week's number. HENRY S. BACON.

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday, March 14th, we had the pleasure of listening to the genial secretary of the American Secular Union, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam. His subject was "The Glory of Infidelity." This is a new lecture, and one so good that it will bear repeating. The following is a brief outline: "Who is the Infidel? He is one who is popularly supposed to be unfaithful to his duty, but really the most faithful of the faithful. He is the element of the unexpected, the horror of Mrs. Grundy. Society abuses him, and finally builds him a monument and calls him a hero. Orthodoxy is a brick in the house of propriety. The orthodox will not use anything until it has the dust of ages on it; worships monotony. Infidelity is just the opposit of orthodoxy, and is glorified both in its spirit and results. Its methods and opinions are innocuous in themselvs, but the way we hold them is an important matter. The spirit of Infidelity is the spirit of inquiry. Since orthodoxy began to be it has always had a thorn in its side—Infidelity. It has always been a red flag, and the orthodox bull has always been obliged to be mad. Infidelity turns a frog-pond into a sparkling rivulet, it tests the truth and makes assumption furnish proof. It is better even to draw the sword for error than let the truth rust in inaction. Orthodoxy must thank Infidelity for keeping it a live corpse; it shows its greatest activity in refusing to be buried. 'Paradise Lost' was written to justify the ways of God to man. Infidelity compels orthodoxy to be bright in self-defense. Suppose Infidelity should cease its endeavors, everybody would go asleep. An attack on Infidelity is a bonanza for modern pulpiteers. Ingersoll has given more vitality to orthodoxy than a thousand ghosts. He has put it on its good behavior. If Christianity does go down it must thank Infidelity for a respectable demise. Infidelity has always kept the world alive. The Infidel is a supreme necessity; the world would willingly destroy him, but must answer him. The word of the Infidel is the living word, because it demands proof, it sets the world on fire. That which is cannot always be the representativ of what is to be. You cannot revolutionize society from the top, you must begin at the root. The Buddhas and the Christs were in opposition to established custom. Infidelity has been the door of progress. An Infidel may be a beggar, but he carries the infinit treasures of the new world. Like a shell he bears the music of the universe. The Infidel's face has always been turned toward the dawn, and he has borne the banner of victory. Faith broods. Doubt discovers. It has been claimed that Infidelity may be wise without being good, but Infidelity denies for the sake of morality. When an overzealous minister claimed that Emerson would go to hell, Father Taylor replied: 'Don't whisper it, then, or everybody will want to go that way.' The only virtue of the church is that it makes a good policeman. The minister is a kind of guide-post, so it pays to keep him whitewashed and in good order. Orthodox society is like a tread-mill. True morality is something infinitly more than respectability. It is one's moral nature that makes him an Infidel. It is not a simple question of logic, but one of manhood. Even in the field of art the Infidel is true to nature. Even here the Infidel is obliged to turn reformer in fidelity to the true and the beautiful. Voltaire, Hugo, Lessing, Goethe, Shakspere, Byron, and Shelley were noble specimens of Infidelity in literature, and Whitman a grand protest against orthodoxy in poetry. Nor must we stop here. Wagner was an Infidel in music, and his triumph was commensurate with his courage. The Infidel loses his life to-day to find it to-morrow. We must forever make and rectify mistakes. That which changes not is already in its grave-clothes. If our opinions were never questioned I would hope that some inconoclast might arise and destroy them. I am proud to declare that I am an Infidel."

Mr. Putnam also lectured on Sunday evening at Wilson's Hall, Allegheny City; subject, "The Foundations of Morality," and at Sharpsburg on Monday evening on "A New Heaven and New Earth;" but the present length of this communication precludes the propriety of giving them the notice they otherwise might receive. The lecture delivered at Sharpsburg was the first one of the kind ever delivered in that orthodox borough, and much credit is due Mr. D. M. Miller, of the adjoining village of Etna, for making the necessary arrangements.

Mr. Putnam made a good impression, and left with the kind wishes of all. Success to him in his trip across "the Rockies." Yours truly, HARRY HOOVER, Secretary Pittsburgh Secular Society.

McQUEEN, ILL., Feb. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4, three to apply on subscription, seventy-five cents for the new book, "The Order of Creation," which I think will be a book of high order judging by what of it I hav read; for the balance you may send me Remsburg's "Bible Morals." THE TRUTH SEEKER has come into my house to stay, if I hav been a little tardy in making my remittance this time. It was always good, but is certainly improving; especially hav I enjoyed reading McArthur's letters to "D. C.," possibly better than "Dogged Churchman" does, and I think such articles are of much value in a paper. They represent in condensed form the fruit of much reading and study of books, many of which we are not able to buy and might not hav patience to read. The church never like to hear of councils. They dislike to learn that they only hav man's judgment for what is God's word. But it will never do to commence to tell what the church dislikes in history, if I did this letter would run on ad infinitum, so I will close, wishing prosperity to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let its motto always be: Truth the natural language of the brain. G. H. BRITTON.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., March 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had a visit from Mr. Remsburg, and he has left a strong impression. Many of those who heard his lecture, "Sabbath-Breaking," pronounce it a masterpiece. I feel confident that his next visit to Providence will excite great enthusiasm, and draw large numbers.

There has just ended a Methodist revival here, headed by "Widow" Van Cott, who quietly walked away with $400 for four weeks.

What surprises me most is that there are not more dishonest people who are smart enough to assume the role of leading lunatic, and fill their empty purses. How easily people can be humbugged out of their sense and dollars!

With a word of admiration for the last poem in the Children's Corner, by Mrs. Buckner-Johnson, M.D., I am, Yours, W. P. BLYTHE.

YORKSHIRE, N. Y., March 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: During the last week in February members of our Freethought circle enjoyed about forty-eight miles of sleigh-riding. We experienced the usual vicissitudes, good roads, sunshine, and fine bracing weather alternating with pitiless nor'westers, huge drifts, an overturn, one broken whiffletree, and numerous prolonged stoppages, while stout hands wrought, sometimes in midnight darkness, to extricate the sleigh from clogging masses of snow. Warm wraps, robes, and soap-stones, and merry hearts with stirring sentiment, prevailed, however, and the whole was voted a success.

The occasion for such journeyings was as follows: Liberals in Holland, Erie county, resolved to hav a hearing right there, and engaged that prince of iconoclasts, J. E. Remsburg, to lecture on Monday and Tuesday evenings, while equally energetic ones about Java Village, Wyoming county, secured a hall and the same speaker for three lectures, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings and on Thursday afternoon. Of course, we could not afford to miss such an opportunity for hearing a prime favorit; besides, we were indebted to some of these friends for social and pecuniary aid at several of our own gatherings. And truly, the warm welcome and hearty hospitality that greeted us, as well as the delight of listening again to the choice rhetoric and fearless logic of the able orator, made the week one to be remembered. Neither of these towns had before known public utterance of this kind, and some thought, as well as considerable feeling, must hav been awakened. It seemed to us that if these five lectures could be followed in the course of two months by one in each place from Charles Watts on the advantages of Secularism, which he treats with incomparable force, a grand beginning would hav been made toward rooting out senseless superstitions and making way for rational views of life and religion. Like noxious weeds in the farmer's fields, the old, false teachings will withstand much skilled and persistent assault before they show signs of yielding; but by and by go they must. Let us work while for us it is day.

The little band in Yorkshire—two or three Spiritualists, two or three Materialists, and two or three Agnostics, working in harmony with mutual toleration—hav been trying earnestly to raise funds for lectures by Lyman C. Howe one Sunday in each month for a year. He will speak for us on March 21st, when the matter will be fully decided.

With bright hopes for the future of the good seed sown, I remain OLIVE DALEY SHERMAN.

ALPINE, March 22, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I am much grieved to learn that you hav retired the Boy with the Badge-pin from the Liberal Club report. I miss that buoyant spirit and the spice which the report was always spiced with. I hope you will soon reinstate him.

I wish you would use one small corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER to define the hard words in the paper. I found it one of the objections to the paper that they couldn't understand the hard words in it. Much of THE TRUTH SEEKER is written above the heads of the common people, and the common people we so need! The educated we are sure of. Try it. The pictures are good. F. J. DOVE.

ITHAOA, N. Y., Feb. 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its illustrations, comes to me weekly with a welcome. Though I hav no devotional songs of praise, like some, to entertain my Lord's coming, if my plain virgin experience, with my vessel filled with oil and lamp trimmed and burning, is not an indorsement for deity, it is evidence that I am none of his or hers. Your illustration of Jonah, who had orders by individual Freethought to go to Nineveh (pleasure), and disobeyed in contemplation of Tarshish, where a storm of difficulty arose with the waters (minds) of orthodoxy concerning the opening of the public libraries on Sunday, show that even the sacrifice of Liberal Jonah with a long list of names is no palliation. Christians are preparing a whale to gulp in Jonah at one swoop by a system of control, by a stoppage of Liberal literature on all the railroads and public highways, as vile as immoral and un-Christian. Illustrations are grand because they are the negativ pointing to the positiv.

ZENAS KENT.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., March 10, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Thanks; THE TRUTH SEEKER comes all right now, in Ben Parkins's name. I shall henceforth get it when Ben gets his. I am also more than thankful for "Bible Morals." It is peerless for missionary work here. It is so small and handy, and yet so vast and comprehensiv in its character. Long liv Remsburg, and also the indomitable John R. Kelso. They comprise a vast amount of the salt of the earth. They are saviors of the human race, and, combined with the immortal Darwin, they are the rock upon which this monster, Christianity, will perish, and be remembered only as the vilest curse of a barbarous age.

Respectfully, NELSON HUNT.

DOWLIN, TEX., Feb. 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I profess to be a philanthropist, a lover of mankind. I think it likely that I am older than any correspondent you hav. Under this impression, I will venture to ask a favor, free. Please publish the following: I, John A. Rutherford, of Dowlin Post-office, Lamar county, Texas, herein and hereby propose to every editor and publisher in the United States that if she or he will send me two copies of the paper that he or she is publishing, in a few weeks, I pledge myself to distribute them to the best advantage to the author. I am well known in Lamar county. I lived in the territory before it was organized into Lamar. I was the presiding officer in the case. I was county judge four years. My bragging puts me in mind of the man Moses in the Bible. Moses said, "The man Moses was very meek, above all the men on the face of the earth." I am well known to be honest and truthful. Yours, etc.,
J. A. RUTHERFORD, born Jan. 31, 1799.

COLLEGEVILLE, PA., March 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the seven chapters on "The Order of Creation," and B. W. Lacy's reply to Lambert's "Notes on Ingersoll," in paper.

Is it not possible to establish a Freethinkers' College, equal to Yale or Harvard, in the East? I feel almost sure that Professor Sunderland, brother of the late LaRoy Sunderland, would giv away his college for such purposes. We hav, and hold in it, a Scientific Club every Sunday afternoon. Mr. I. K. Rhoades belongs to it, and he givs out a TRUTH SEEKER every week. It is to him that I am indebted for your notice of Freethought literature. E. S. MOSER.

CARROLL'S PRAIRIE, TEX., March 20, 286.

MR. EDITOR: It has been quite a while since I wrote to you, as there are so many interesting friends to hear from that I would much rather read than write. But thinking some of our friends who contemplate coming to Texas might like to hear from this part, I giv them a little of what I hav seen. The strike is all the talk at present, all sides of the matter being discussed at length, and the conclusion generally arrived at here is that the strikers did not giv sufficient reasons for making this strike; that it was only to show their strength, etc. Be this as it may, it is very amusing to hear the Christians express their opinions. They think the strikers did wrong in striking, but think if they were in Jay Gould's place they would hav done just as he has. Anyway to make the most money. One of them was excusing Gould for what he had stolen by the fact that Gould had only robbed the rich man who robbed the poor man, instead of robbing the poor man direct, and added if he had as much money as Gould he would hav done the same, and so would his friends to whom he was talking; and they assented that they would.

Now I had been talking to some of them on the evils of Christianity just before the above conversation occurred. Of course they had claimed that everything that was right and moral was taught by it, and, above all, that they believed in and followed this Christian doctrin. But it seemed to me they "let the cat out" when they admitted they would do certain things that Infidels declare wrong if they had the power. They all seem to hav an indiarubber conscience.

But that is not what I hav seen, so will I say I've seen prairie and woodland, rich soil and some that was not so rich, and other things that are not of interest. But some things that may be of interest I will speak of. For the last four days the thermometer has stood at 80° in the shade, but you do not notice that it is uncomfortably warm; you see flowers growing in the woods and on the prairie, oats are up, the dogwood and other trees are in bloom, the grass is green, thousands of birds are in the trees, and everything says spring is here, especially the woodtick—he has been on hand for a month.

Of course this is all nice, and the best part is, there is a fine chance for a poor man to liv easy. The soil will produce anything—cotton, corn, cane, vegetables, fruits, etc.

Land is cheap—unimproved good land for $2.50 per acre; improved land from $5 up, according to improvements.

We expect to get a location soon for our coöperativ society. We will raise ribbon-cane and grapes for the market. There is plenty of money to be made on these two products.

Now we will not take up any more of your valuable space, but if anyone would like information I will be glad to furnish same. E. E. PARK.

OGDEN, UTAH, March 13, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been intending to write you ever since the beginning of the year, but hav been delayed by two or three causes, one of which was the hope of getting some additional subscribers.

I hav been trying for the last two or more years to revive our League and Secular Union, but without effect. 'Tis too long a story to tell you—all the difficulties that spread themselvs in the pathway. My last effort was to effect a Union of some kind, to meet and support Mr. Putnam when he comes. But, alas! A snag again has caused another shipwreck, and now my last effort will be when Mr. Putnam arrives, when, if something is not done that will form a good basework for the continuation of the good work, I shall fall in the rear, but will assist any others to carry out the work. Never again will I stand in the front to work, but the grand purposes of the American Secular Union, though, while I liv I will be ready to render any assistance to forward the work.

I am now trying to open up an institution on my own account, which, if any can be found interested enough to seek, will or may find something that will giv some light on the great work that is agitating the minds of those who are working for humanity. The people will not take papers or buy books by which to understand what is going on, and what is necessary for their own good. So, as a last effort, I will offer to them the light free, as far as I, within my limited means, can keep it burning. I hav fitted up a room twenty-four feet square for a free reading room for evenings and Sundays, and which will serve for small meetings, and with my own books and the periodicals I take, and as many more as I can add from time to time, shall be devoted to the good of those who will be initiated into the service of reform, as opposed to the powers that now prevail, causing the poverty and misery, etc., of the working classes by depriving them of the opportunity to earn a comfortable support, by their political and religious schemes for their own aggrandizement.

This, I think, will be my last effort, if it succeeds well. If not, then I shall feel I hav done all, and will be contented to pass over with a good conscience, and without fear. I am now in my seventy-fifth year, healthy and activ, and may liv some years yet, but that is as it may be.

Inclosed please find post-office order for $10—$3 to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the balance to place to my credit. I shall want some books, and will send an order soon. I will perhaps be able to sell some to visitors to my free reading-room, and shall want them at your lowest rates. Send your latest catalog. We are looking for Mr. Putnam, and will giv him the best reception we can.

As ever yours, JOHN A. JOST.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Little Lo.

Near to the Elkhorn's sparkling water,
Charming water that ripples so,
A weary mother and little daughter—
And child is mother, as mother's go.

Little Lo, with her soft hair shining,
Little Lo, with her dainty ways,
Does daily toil without repining,
Cycle of summer and winter days;

Smoothing the way for feet fast chilling
With touch of death and the icy wave,
Calmly, cheerfully, sweet hands willing,
May lure her back from the yawning grave.

Little Lo, with her blue eyes pleading,
Little Lo, with her golden hair,
Invalid mother gently leading,
And deftly placing the easy chair.

Helpful feet to a helpless mother
Is little Lo, with her wee brown hands,
As oft, mayhap, you've seen some other
Captiv following silken bands.

But never you saw a childish maiden,
Guiding the footsteps weak and slow,
Never a pair of small hands laden
With grace like this of Little Lo.

Hands like these are beautiful ever
If brown with tan or white as snow.
O suffering world, you may not sever
Humanity's needs from Little Lo.

Copy them now in bronze or granit,
Mould their beauty, and let them go
Unto the world to paint the sonnet
I may not sing of little Lo.

A Reminiscence.

Almost fifty years ago, or when I was about nine years old, my father sent me to the house of a neighbor about half a mile from my home to get some grain-bags. He started me off early, that I might return by the time himself and two or three other in his employ had finished their breakfasts and were ready to start for their work, which at that time happened to be two or three miles away in another direction from that in which I was sent. When I reached the place I found a threshing-machine set up where it was to be put in operation that day. This was something new to me, and an object of great interest, as machinery has ever been. The importance of my speedy return was driven from my mind for some time by an examination and my anxiety to see it in operation, which I had been told by a young man who got the bags for me it would be in a short time. My curiosity being partially satisfied by my examination, it occurred to me that I was expected at home even before that time. Somewhat reluctantly, as the machine had not been started, I left for home, which I soon reached, and found that my father had sent the men to their work some time before, while he waited for my return.

He seemed to think that I needed a lesson in promptness and lively stepping. He also thought that, in order to make it more impressiv, the lecture he gave me should be illustrated by the artistic use of the brush—which he had cut from a neighboring apple-tree. I need hardly say that the illustration was more forcible and more deeply felt than the lecture which accompanied it. Leaving me to reflect upon the lesson, my father went to his place of business, not to return until night.

Now, it so happened that, on this eventful day, the militia, or the men in the vicinity (in central New York) "between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, liable to military duty," were to meet at the village near by for drill—it was "training day." As I lived near the village, and within hearing of the music used upon the occasion, my curiosity, if not my patriotism, was strongly aroused, and, having little to do, I was strongly attracted in that direction. At first I thought I would go "just a little way" where I could see as well as hear, and though not intending it when I started, I was finally drawn to the field (nearly a mile from home) where the drill was going on. Once there, the sights and sounds, with other boys, were sufficient to hold me as long as the drill lasted. Then, the excitement being over, and thinking of what I had done, I was afraid to go home, as I well knew that my conduct would not be approved there.

The result was that I did not return until dark, when, feeling tired, guilty, and altogether miserable because of having yielded to temptation, I dreaded to meet my father and mother, whom I could see sitting in the house, but as I knew I must, I finally went in.

My coming was, no doubt, a great relief to them, although I did not realize it then. Very little was said to me after inquiring where I had spent the day. I was told, however, to eat my supper, and when about to go up-stairs to bed my father remarked that we must hav a settlement in the morning.

I did not get up next morning until my father had gone again for the day, and the matter was never mentioned between us afterward. My mother, however, talked with me about the affair, and, finding me repentant and submissiv, reassured me somewhat by saying that if I remained dutiful and obedient she would try to persuade my father not to punish me, and I do not remember that he ever did but once afterward (and that was the result of a misunderstanding of his orders on my part and without reflection or inquiry on his), although I lived with him until after I had reached the years of manhood. In thiuking of the first occurrence since, I hav concluded that he attributed my conduct to the treatment I had received at his hands on that morning, and feared to arouse my resentment further by additional punishment. I, however, had no such thought. It was due to a combination of circumstances operating upon me in an entirely different manner from a disposition to defy his authority. I think it was just as well, and that I was quite as obedient afterward as though he had punished me further.

The above occurrence shows, I think, how infinitly important it is that we should learn, as far as possible, the motivs which actuate others before censuring them, also the importance of resisting the temptation to do wrong. Nothing will destroy our respect for another sooner than being wrongly accused.

Uncle George.

Games for the Children.

My Lady's Toilet.—Every person represents some article of the toilet—comb, brush, soap, brooch, jewel-case—and the lady's maid stands in the middle of the circle and says, for instance, "My lady wants her brush!" The person representing the brush must immediately jump up or pay a forfeit for negligence. Once in a while the maid announces, "My lady wants her whole toilet," when all the players must rise and change places. At this time the lady's maid herself endeavors to get a chair, and the person left without a chair must become the lady's maid.

Imitation.—To play this game the players sit in a circle; one of them takes a cane in his right hand, and says: "They can do little who cannot do this, this, this," pounding the floor with the cane three times, as he says the last three words. He then passes the cane from his right to his left hand, and gives it to the next person, who is told to say and do exactly what his predecessor did. He may think the catch is in repeating the words or in pounding the floor a certain number of times, while it is in passing the cane to the left hand, and with the left handing it along. A forfeit must be paid for every mistake.

Orchestra.—Select a conductor, who is to arrange the players in a semi-circle, each being assigned to play some imaginary instrument, and instructed how to play it. The conductor first calls on his orchestra to tune, and then, naming some lively air, begins to hum it, at the same time waving a baton, when all the players must join in, imitating by voice and gesture their instruments, such as violin, harp, cornet, tenor horn, trombone, flute, piccolo, clarinet, double bass, drum, cymbals, etc. Solos may be called for, and the person representing the instrument named must respond or pay a forfeit, as must all who fail to play when called on, or who break down by laughing. There are few games which afford more fun than this, if played in good spirits and in a lively manner.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—A complex kaleidoscopic charade.

Subject.

Turn the kaleidoscope and, lo,
What various changing figures show!
They flash like lightning into place,
Or twinkle into newer grace.

A few small bits of colored glass,
Each piece a jagged, shapeless mass,
Yet in this magic instrument
All glories in one glory blent.

And such kaleidoscope I own,
But I, instead of glass alone,
Put in whatever thing I choose,
And then enjoy the changing views.

Now let us take a waterfall,
Tho' not of hair, as ladies call;
Yet in its central refluent tide
A tapering roll of hair is spied.

Now in this waterfall I mean,
No hairy "waterfall" is seen;
Once in the eye, alas, you'll find,
'Tis something that may make you blind.

First View.

But turn it now and then behold
What wondrous visions thus unfold;
A feline with nine lives prevails,
A monster said to hav nine tails.

Nine constellated stars next shine
In southern skies with light benign,
Whose name, a palindromic shrine,
An altar we translate, define.
The third is first, of heart bereft,
Of little value all that's left;
In fact its worth as plainly meant,
Expressed in full is just one cent.

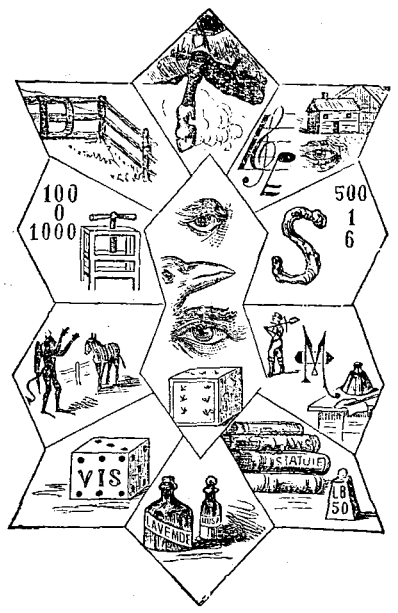
Second View.



The instrument again we turn,
No stars about an altar burn;
But tail to tail, the first and second,
A feline and a rodent reckoned;
What need to tell what must ensue,
The third expresses what they do.

Third View.

Again, reversely seen, behold
A weight that's used for weighing gold;
Altho' this weight is but four grains
That southern altar it contains.
Its first is known as "Charles's wain,"
That rodent, second, draws the train;
And thus the *true charade we find,
A cart-load, cart and team combined;
But now the whole four grains delete
That feline stands again complete.

To what city in Massachusetts are these boys going with their boats?

Correspondence.

Lake Maitland, Fla., March 7, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write you a few lines from the Sunny South. Papa takes The Truth Seeker. I read the Children's Corner, and am delighted with it. I am eleven years old. I hav a sister nine years old and a little brother one month old. I go to school—am in the Fifth Reader. I study grammar, spelling, arithmetic, geography, dictation, exercises, and writing. Papa has a large orange grove; he lost about one thousand boxes of oranges this winter by the frost. We are east of Lake Maitland two miles, and one mile from Lake Howell, a beautiful sheet of water, two miles long and one mile and a half wide. There are five boats on the lake, and we catch lots of fish. We came from Illinois thirty months ago. We like Florida better than any place we ever lived in. Some winters I go barefoot all winter. I hope this letter gets in The Truth Seeker. Please excuse mistakes and bad writing. From your friend,

J. Gail Denning.

West McHenry, March 14, 1886.

Miss Susan Wixon: I hav often read The Truth Seeker at grandpa's for the last few years, and enjoyed the letters and stories of the Children's Corner. This last year I hav been going to school to Mr. Vasey in the highest room in the public school of this village. For the past week I hav been at home, as I hav had a bad cold, and we are moving to a farm which papa bought a year ago last summer. I hav never lived on a farm, and I am afraid it will be lonesome, though I hope not. Miss Wixon, I should like very much, if I see the next Truth Seeker, to see this letter in print, if you think it will do.

Your little friend, Grace Stevens.

P.S.—Answer to Puzzle No. 2: Dickens—Howitt—Burns! G. S.

Geneva, Neb., March 7, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: My papa has been taking The Truth Seeker for a good many years. I like to read the Children's Corner, and think it is nice. Papa got me "The Story Hour," and I read stories to my mamma, and she likes them very much. I like to go to school, but our school will be out next week. I will be sorry, but it will commence next April. I am eight years old, and I hav two sisters and one brother. Three of us go to school. If you like this letter, I will write again some time.

Your little friend, Irena J. Whitzel.

Leonard, Iowa, March 10, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write you a letter seeing all the boys and girls are writing to you. I go to school. We hav three weeks more of school. I hav a mile and a half to go to school. I study reading, arithmetic, spelling and geography. I am only twelve years old, and this is my first attempt in writing a letter for any paper. My father takes The Truth Seeker. I will hav to close for this time. Yours truly, E. S. Leonard.

Roswell, N. M., March 3, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I see many letters from little folks in the Corner, but none from this country, so I thought I would try and write one. I am a little girl just eight years old. I go to school and study reading, writing, arithmetic, and spelling. I am going to study geography and history next winter. I hav a gentleman teacher, and like him very much. I hav a grandpa and grandma in this country. Grandpa takes The Truth Seeker, has been taking it for a good many years; he thinks there is no paper as good as it, and would not do without it for anything. Dear Miss Wixon, I am afraid I am making my letter too long, so I will bring it to a close. As it is my first I am afraid it is not good enough to print, but I hope so. If it is, I will write again, and write about my little pets and my playmates. Well, good-bye. From your loving little friend. Maggie Ovard.

TRAVELS IN FAITH
From Tradition to Reason.
BY ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Cloth, $1.25. For Sale at this Office.

Poetry.

The End of the Gods.

Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilean; the world has grown gray from thy breath;
We hav drunken of things Lethean, and fed on the fulness of death.
Laurel is green for a season, and love is sweet for a day;
But love grows bitter with treason, and laurel out-
livs not May.
Sleep, shall we sleep after all? for the world is not sweet in the end;
For the old faiths loosen and fall, the new years ruin and rend.
Fate is a sea without shore, and the soul is a rock that abides;
But her ears are vexed with the roar and her face with the foam of the tides.
O lips that the live blood faints in, the leavings of racks and rods!
O ghastly glories of saints, dead limbs of gibbeted gods!
Though all men abase them before you in spirit,
and all knees bend,
I kneel not, neither adore you, but standing, look to the end.

Will ye bridle the deep sea with reins, will ye chas-
ten the high sea with rods?
Will ye take her to chain her with chains, who is older than all ye gods?
All ye as a wind shall go by, as a fire shall ye pass and be past;
Ye are gods, and behold, ye shall die, and the waves be upon you at last.
In the darkness of time, in the deeps of the years,
in the changes of things,
Ye shall sleep as a slain man sleeps, and the world shall forget you for kings.
Though the feet of thine high priests tread where thy lords and our forefathers trod,
Though these that were gods are dead, and thou being dead art a god,
Though before thee the throned Cytherean be fallen, and hidden her head,
Yet thy kingdom shall pass, Galilean, thy dead shall go down to thee dead.
Of the maiden thy mother men sing as a goddess with grace clad around;
Thou art throned where another was king; where another was queen she is crowned.
Yea, once we had sight of another: but now she is queen, say these.
Not as thine, not as thine, was our mother—a blossom of flowering seas,
Clothed round with the world's desire as with raiment, and fair as the foam,
And fleeter than kindled fire, and a goddess, and mother of Rome.
For thine came pale and a maiden, and sister to sorrow; but ours,
Her deep hair heavily laden with odor and color of flowers,
White rose of the rose-white water, a silver splendor, a flame,
Bent down unto us that besought her, and earth grew sweet with her name.
For thine came weeping, a slave among slaves, and rejected; but she Came flushed from the full-flushed wave, and imperial, her foot on the sea.
And the wonderful waters knew her, the winds and the viewless ways,
And the roses grew rosier, and bluer the sea-blue streams of the bays.
Ye are fallen, our lords, by what token? We wist that ye should not fall.
Ye were all so fair that are broken; and one more fair than ye all.
But I turn to her still, having seen she shall surely abide in the end;
Goddess, and maiden, and queen, be near me now and befriend.
O daughter of earth, of my mother, her crown and blossom of birth,
I am also, I also thy brother; I go as I came unto earth.

Thou art more than the gods who number the days of our temporal breath;
For these giv labor and slumber, but thou, Proserpina, death.
Therefore now at thy feet I abide for a season in silence. I know
I shall die as my fathers died, and sleep as they sleep; even so.
For the glass of the years is brittle wherein we gaze for a span;
A little soul for a little bears up this corpse which is man.
So long I endure, no longer; and laugh not again,
neither weep.
For there is no god found stronger than death;
and death is a sleep.

—Swinburne, in Hymn to Proserpine.

How a New Convert Felt.

I had heard it preached all my life that only a few feet really enter the "narrow way," and that it was very easy to be deceived as to the genuinness of one's experience. A great fear took possession of me. I doubted the reality of my supposed change of heart. Then for weeks I went through "deep waters of affliction" such as I hope few children ever know. Being only thirteen years old, I was indeed a child for the bearing of such a burden of sorrow. My only peace was in a few hours of troubled sleep. Parents, brothers, friends, ministers, tried in vain to comfort me. I spent my time in praying, in reading the Bible, and in all ways seeking for one ray of light. Night after night I cried myself asleep, and awoke in the darkness only to get up and kneel by my bedside over and over again in prayers which, like the Psalmist's, were "strong crying and tears." Still I got no relief. But, as weeks went by, my melancholy gradually wore away. I came at last to hope once more, but never with the joy of such complete assurance as others told about. I think my tardy peace was a half despair of doing anything more. And I came to feel that if God did not save me I could not help it.

* * * * *

After awhile I found I was being regarded as unsound on many vital points. Complaints began to be made, not so much on account of what I preached as because there were certain things I did not preach. I had become an earnest student of science; and whispers began to reach me that I was coming to be looked on with suspicion, from the fact of having so large a number of scientific books in my library. About this time I was appointed to read an essay before our association of churches and ministers on the subject of Darwinism. And as Balaam, when called by the Moabitish king to curse the children of Israel, disappointed his employer by pronouncing a blessing instead, so I disappointed and scandalized the church authorities by declaring my conviction that this new, ridiculed, and hated doctrin was the very truth of God. I had not indeed as yet outgrown the reconciliation folly, so I tried hard to think that that Genesis and the "Origin of Species" might lie side by side and in peace together on a minister's study table. But I was not long in seeing that the fall and the ascent of man could hardly both be true. I tried indeed to believe that a miraculous Christ and a supernatural redemption might still be retained, though I had surrendered all faith in the supposed fact which constituted the only reason for their existence. But I soon became convinced that when evolution came in at the door the whole orthodox "plan of salvation" must go out at the window. I learned the fundamental and universal truth that every theological system springs out of and takes shape in accord with some cosmology or scheme of things. If, therefore, the new revelations of science were true, I felt sure that evangelical Christianity could not be true. For science was telling us of a new universe, in which the fundamental conceptions of the nature of God, the nature of man, and their mutual relations were being radically reconstructed. If, instead of a perfect creation followed by a catastrophe, which called for a scheme of redemption by way of recovery, there had been a gradual and orderly evolution from the first under the guidance of an all-wise power, then there was neither necessity nor place for any of the cardinal points of the old faith.—M. J. Savage in The Forum.

Book Notices.

SOCIAL WEALTH: The Sole Factors and Exact Ratios in its Acquirement and Apportionment. By J. K. Ingalls. New York: The Truth Seeker Co., 33 Clinton Pl. Price $1.

The author of this work tells his readers that he can remember when the first railroad was built in this country. We happen to know that he was one of that famous "Old Guard," who, back in the Forties, sturdily contended for free land for all. He has, then, had rare opportunities for observing the development of our social conditions, enlightened, as he was, so many years ago as to first principles with respect to creating and distributing social wealth.

In form the volume is a series of essays written with the purpose of "directing inquiry to questions intimately related to all human life and employment." That is, the argument of the author is directed toward points of investigation which often escape the economist, but which, when settled, serve to clear away the rest. In the performance of his task, he makes a brief review of economic schools, their origin and growth; traces the rise and growth of capitalism, and analyzes those sources of unearned increase—profit, interest, and rent. Chapters follow on the conservation of wealth, tools, and improved machinery, the nature of wages, land ownership, etc., with an exposition of the law of contracts, and of the relations of money and credit to production and exchange. The closing chapters of the book relate to proposed remedies, reforms, and suggestions to legislators.

In summing up his conclusions, the author says: "Labor divorced from or disinherited of the land is only an abstraction without productiv power;" and "Land without the application of labor is unproductiv of economic values." "The whole device of income without work is fraudulent, and without the least justification in ethics or economics." Therein is seen the drift of the book. Here and there in its pages are striking passages; and here are some of the pithy sentences: "Forced competitorship is only fully realized at the very bottom of the industrial scale." "From conquests with bludgeons, swords, and spears, as in the earlier ages, civilism has inaugurated a war of cunning and fraud, whose weapons are technical terms, shrewd devices, class legislation, and forms of law recognizing no rights as supreme but those of property and the law of the market." "The false merchant works for profits, and is not a coöperator in the social industry, but a despoiler and tribute-gatherer." "The quick-witted child early becomes a very 'prince of economists.' To get something for nothing becomes a habit and a cultus, which, as a man grows in years, he tries to reduce to an art. If by shrewd device or subtle pretense he can wholly escape work, and saddle the expense of life upon others, he learns that, under the teachings of our 'exact economy' and 'reformed theology,' he will be entitled to social distinction and respect, and to hav his position defended by learned professor and titled dignitary, both secular and religious."

Mr. Ingalls's book will stimulate thought.—John Swinton's Paper.

THE ORDER OF CREATION, the Conflict between Genesis and Geology. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents. New York: The Truth Seeker Company.

Under this title those essays hav been republished which hav appeared in the Nineteenth Century in the discussion between Mr. Gladstone and those distinguished authorities who deny that Genesis contains a divine revelation and that the assertion made therein can be reconciled to the accepted facts of science. The first essay, "Dawn of Creation and of Worship," by W. E. Gladstone, was called forth by the "Prolégomènes de l'Historie des Religiones," of Dr. Réville in which Mr. Gladstone is made the representativ of those who find warrant for a belief in a primitiv revelation in the scriptures. Mr. Gladstone, with his truly wonderful command of English, attempts to show the connection between the Hebrew traditions of Genesis and the Olympian mythology of Homer, and to prove that there is a divine revelation contained in Genesis I. The second essay, "The Interpreters of Genesis and the Interpreters of Nature," is by Professor Huxley, who deals with the proof which Mr. Gladstone draws from science in support of his theory in such a manner that Mr. Gladstone is obliged in his second article to modify many of his statements, and change some of the argument which he sets forth in his first. In the third article, "Postscript to Solar Myths," Prof. Max Müller deals rather severely with the mythological and etymological arguments of Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Gladstone in a second essay, entitled, "Proem to Genesis; a Plea for a Fair Trial," defines more exactly his position in the discussion, and defends it with great plausibility. Dr. Réville in the fifth article, "Dawn of Creation," states with great clearness and defends with much force his views on the book of Genesis, and his opinions about the mythology of Homer. Professor Huxley follows with a very able article, entitled, "Mr. Gladstone and Genesis," in which he attempts to dispose of Mr. Gladstone's modified, as effectually as of his original arguments, at least those which he based on scientific discoveries. The last article, "A Protest and a Plea," by E. Lynn Linton, is a very skilful defense of the position which the Agnostic occupies, and a powerful plea for the belief which she herself holds. However we may condemn many of the publications of the Truth Seeker Co., we must thank them for the convienent form in which they hav given us these essays, as they present in very accessible form arguments with which every one should be familiar.—The Princetonian (Presbyterian College Paper).

She Shocked the Divine.

A prominent divine was the invited guest of Mr. B. and family. Miss Alice, the charming daughter of the host, was gracing the festivity, and said impulsivly:

"Oh, mother, I've been roasting up in my room all afternoon. It's hotter than—"

"Alice!" said the father, sternly.

"I say it's hotter than—"

"Alice!" said the mother, excitedly, and the divine looked at her in alarm.

"I say it's hotter than I ever saw it before," continued the young lady coolly, "and I just sat there without a thing on—"

"Oh, Alice!" said her father, in alarm. This time the divine was thoroughly frightened.

"I just sat there without a thing on—"

"Oh, Alice!" said the mother, almost crying.

"I say I just sat there," continued the girl, not noticing the interruption; "I just sat there without a thing on except my very lightest summer clothing, and read my Bible all the afternoon. Will you hav some more soup, doctor?"—Elmira Gazette.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM,

THE PRESENT
AND
THE FUTURE REPUBLIC OF NORTH AMERICA.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A Book Advocating Associate Life as a Remedy for Poverty, Vice, and Crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

CONTENTS: The titles of some of the chapters are: Present External Appearance of Our Republic; Government and Laws; Finance; Public Improvements; Production and Distribution; Education; Morality and Religion; Marriage and Divorce; Life in the New Republic; Life in the Existing Republic; Examination of the Objections to Communism; Methods Proposed for the Transition from the System of Individual Property to a System of Collectiv Property; Danger. Gems of Thought.

THE persecution of the Quakers by the Protestants forms one of the saddest chapters in the volume of ecclesiastical crime. That a quiet, peaceable, honest, inoffensiv sect, no matter how strong their delusion, should be subjected to the infernal rule of bigoted Christians is a reproach upon the manhood of the world, and the perpetrators of the outrage cannot be denounced in too strong terms.—D. M. Bennett.

ANOTHER virtue, the example of which has passed strongly into me, was my father's settled, placid indifference to the clamors or the murmurs of public opinion. For the judgment of those that had no right or power to judge him he seemed simply to care nothing at all. He very rarely spoke of despising such things. He contented himself with altogether disregarding them. Hollow babble it was for him. There was something truly great in this. The very perfection of it hid from you the extent of the attainment.—Carlyle's Reminiscences.

Facilis descensus averni, etc. (Virgil). Enter ye in at the strait gate, for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.—Matt. vii, 13, 14.

THE journey down to the abyss
Is prosperous and light;
The palace-gates of gloomy Dis
Stand open day and night
But upward to retrace the way,
And pass into the light of day,
Then comes the stress of labor—this May task a hero's might.
—Conington's Virgil.

THE true Agnostic is one who says: "I do not know and do not believe that I can know God;" but he does not say, "There is no God." That kind of talk is the counterpart of the orthodox bigotry that says: "I know all about God, and you'll be damned if you don't believe what I tell you!" Both positions are illogical and wrong. The only honest, modest, true, and tenable ground is that of the man who admits, as the evolutionist does, that there is a persistent force, a permanent reality, an inscrutable mystery, an unknown and unknowable power, behind or in phenomena that we cannot comprehend, and there leaves it, and waits and works patiently and in trust for more light and vaster knowledge.—Anon.

THEN shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels (Matt. XXV, 41). God is pleased often to appeal to men for the justice of all his ways; and therefore no such doctrin ought to be admitted, that carries in it an idea of cruelty beyond what the blackest tyrants hav ever invented.—Burnett's Thirty-nine Articles.

Do not try to reason, or you are lost.—Moody, the Evangelist.

REASON must be our last guide and judge in everything.—Locke, the Philosopher.

NOTHING can be consistent which has not reason for its foundation.—Cicero, the Heathen.

HEAR now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips.—Job, the Patriarch.

REASON is the only faculty we hav wherewith to judge concerning anything.—Butler, the divine.

REASON is the supreme authority, and there is no appeal from its decisions.—J. M. Wise, the Jewish Rabbi.

IN deep questions, where great names militate against each other, an appeal to authority only thickens the confusion.—Burke.

Odds and Ends.

TROY Parishioner: And so you don't like this place? Rector: No, I can't say I do, exactly. I don't find the right field here for me. Parishioner: Right-field? We'll be very sorry to lose you; but if you must go, they're looking for a right fielder at Albany.

SAM JONES says: "The best man in Chicago is the man who spends the most of his time on his knees. I don't care who he is." The man that makes a business of putting down carpets would appear to hav a pretty sure thing on eternal glory. —Gazetteer.

THERE are 1,400,000,000 people living on the planet which we inhabit, and yet there is now and then a man who wonders what the rest of us will do when he dies. There are people in "society" who honestly think that all the world closes its eyes when our set lies down to sleep. There are men who fear to act according to their own convictions, because perhaps ten persons in a crowd of 1,400,000.000 will laugh at them. Why, if a man could only realize every moment what a bustling, busy, fussy, important little atom he is in all this great ant-hill of fussy, important little atoms, every day he would regard himself less, and think still less of the other molecules in the corral.

THE LADIES' LENT.

SCENE.—Sixth avenue street car. DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.—Black Eyes and Blue Eyes.

Black Eyes: Why, how do you do? I havn't seen you since Lent began.

Blue Eyes: No; I'm awfully busy—church every day, and——

Black Eyes: Church all day, you mean. I go to early communion and——

Blue Eyes: Oh, you're High; we're Low, you know; but——

Black Eyes: Yes, I'm high; besides, Mr. Credo, the curate, does early service——

Blue Eyes: Oh, I've seen him. He's awfully handsome. Our rector has no assistant, and he's an old married man. It's too stupid.

Black Eyes: How you talk! I just love to go to church. The five o'clock service is perfectly lovely. I'm so glad Lent has come.

Blue Eyes: So am I. I was all tired out.

Black Eyes: I was, too. I resorted to everything, the last two or three weeks before Ash Wednesday; kept up on quinine and beef-tea——

Blue Eyes: Did you? I took massage treatment. And I hadn't a rag left to wear.

Black Eyes: Nor I, positivly. Mr. Standround marries Molly Wallflower soon, I hear.

Blue Eyes: Yes; I'm to stand with her. Such a bore! We can't any of us go decollete.

Black Eyes: Why not.

Blue Eyes: Because Nell Needle, the maid of honor, is so scrawny, she won't.

Black Eyes: She can't, you mean. What hav you given up this Lent?

Blue Eyes: Novels; my eyes are very weak.

Black Eyes: I hav given up meat. Mama has to hav chicken, or fish, or a bit of terrapin every meal for me.

Blue Eyes: You are brave. Hav you seen those lovely satines at Blank's?

Black Eyes: No. I'm going shopping this afternoon before church.

Blue Eyes: They're too pretty. Mamma and I selected six. We always get such summer dresses out of the way in Lent. Are you saving Easter-money?

Black Eyes: I expect to begin right away. I'm embroidering a cashmere for Easter Sunday, and and it takes all my pocket-money to buy the silk and beads.

Blue Eyes: I havn't much put away, either. I bought a parasol yesterday; that ruined me for this week. Eighteen dollars.

Black Eyes: I must see it. Mr. Credo doesn't want us to dress much this year—is trying to get the young ladies to set the example of quiet Easter toilets.

Blue Eyes: How odd! Fancy Easter, though, without a new dress.

Black Eyes: Ah, I shall hav a new one, but nothing striking. It's a dove-gray silk. The front breadth is solid work, studded with cut steel beads. I am embroidering it myself, and it's awfully hard work. Mr. Credo wanted me to take a Lenten mission-class, but I'm too fully occupied.

Blue Eyes: We hav a sewing-club. I wish you'd join. It's great fun.

Black Eyes: Perhaps I might manage that. What is it?

Blue eyes: Ah, a dozen or so of us meet every Tuesday and Saturday evenings, sew till nine, when a few men come in, and we hav tea and sandwiches, and a quiet little time, you know.

Black Eyes: No dancing, of course?

Blue Eyes: Oh no, indeed; that is, not really. A valse or two, perhaps, that one of the girls plays for. And we break up promptly at midnight.

Black Eyes: It must be great fun.

Blue Eyes: Yes, and we wear the cutest little aprons, you know. I've one for Saturday, trimmed with lace and orange bows.

Black Eyes: Oh, I'll join. I've got some embroidered mull that will be lovely for an apron. And I'll wear white bows, I guess. Good-by, now. I get off at the next corner, and I've got to rush, too, to get to the dressmaker's, and over to church in time for the 12 o'clock service.

Blue Eyes: Oh, never mind if you are a little late.

Black Eyes: Yes; but the seats are free at this service, and unless I'm early our pew is sure to be full of strangers.

Blue Eyes: So I think. I like my own pew; the cushions are just right to kneel gracefully. Well, good-by.

Blue Eyes: Good-by.

Black Eyes: Good-by. Oh, Jen, I forgot. Do you think hussar pompons will be used this spring?

Blue Eyes: So all the swell milliners say. I shall hav one.

Black Eyes: Shall you, really? Well, I don't know; I can't decide.

Blue Eyes: Don't right away. You've got till Easter to think it over.

Black Eyes: Thanks, awfully. Good-by.

Blue Eyes: Good-by. —P. H. Welch, in Puck.

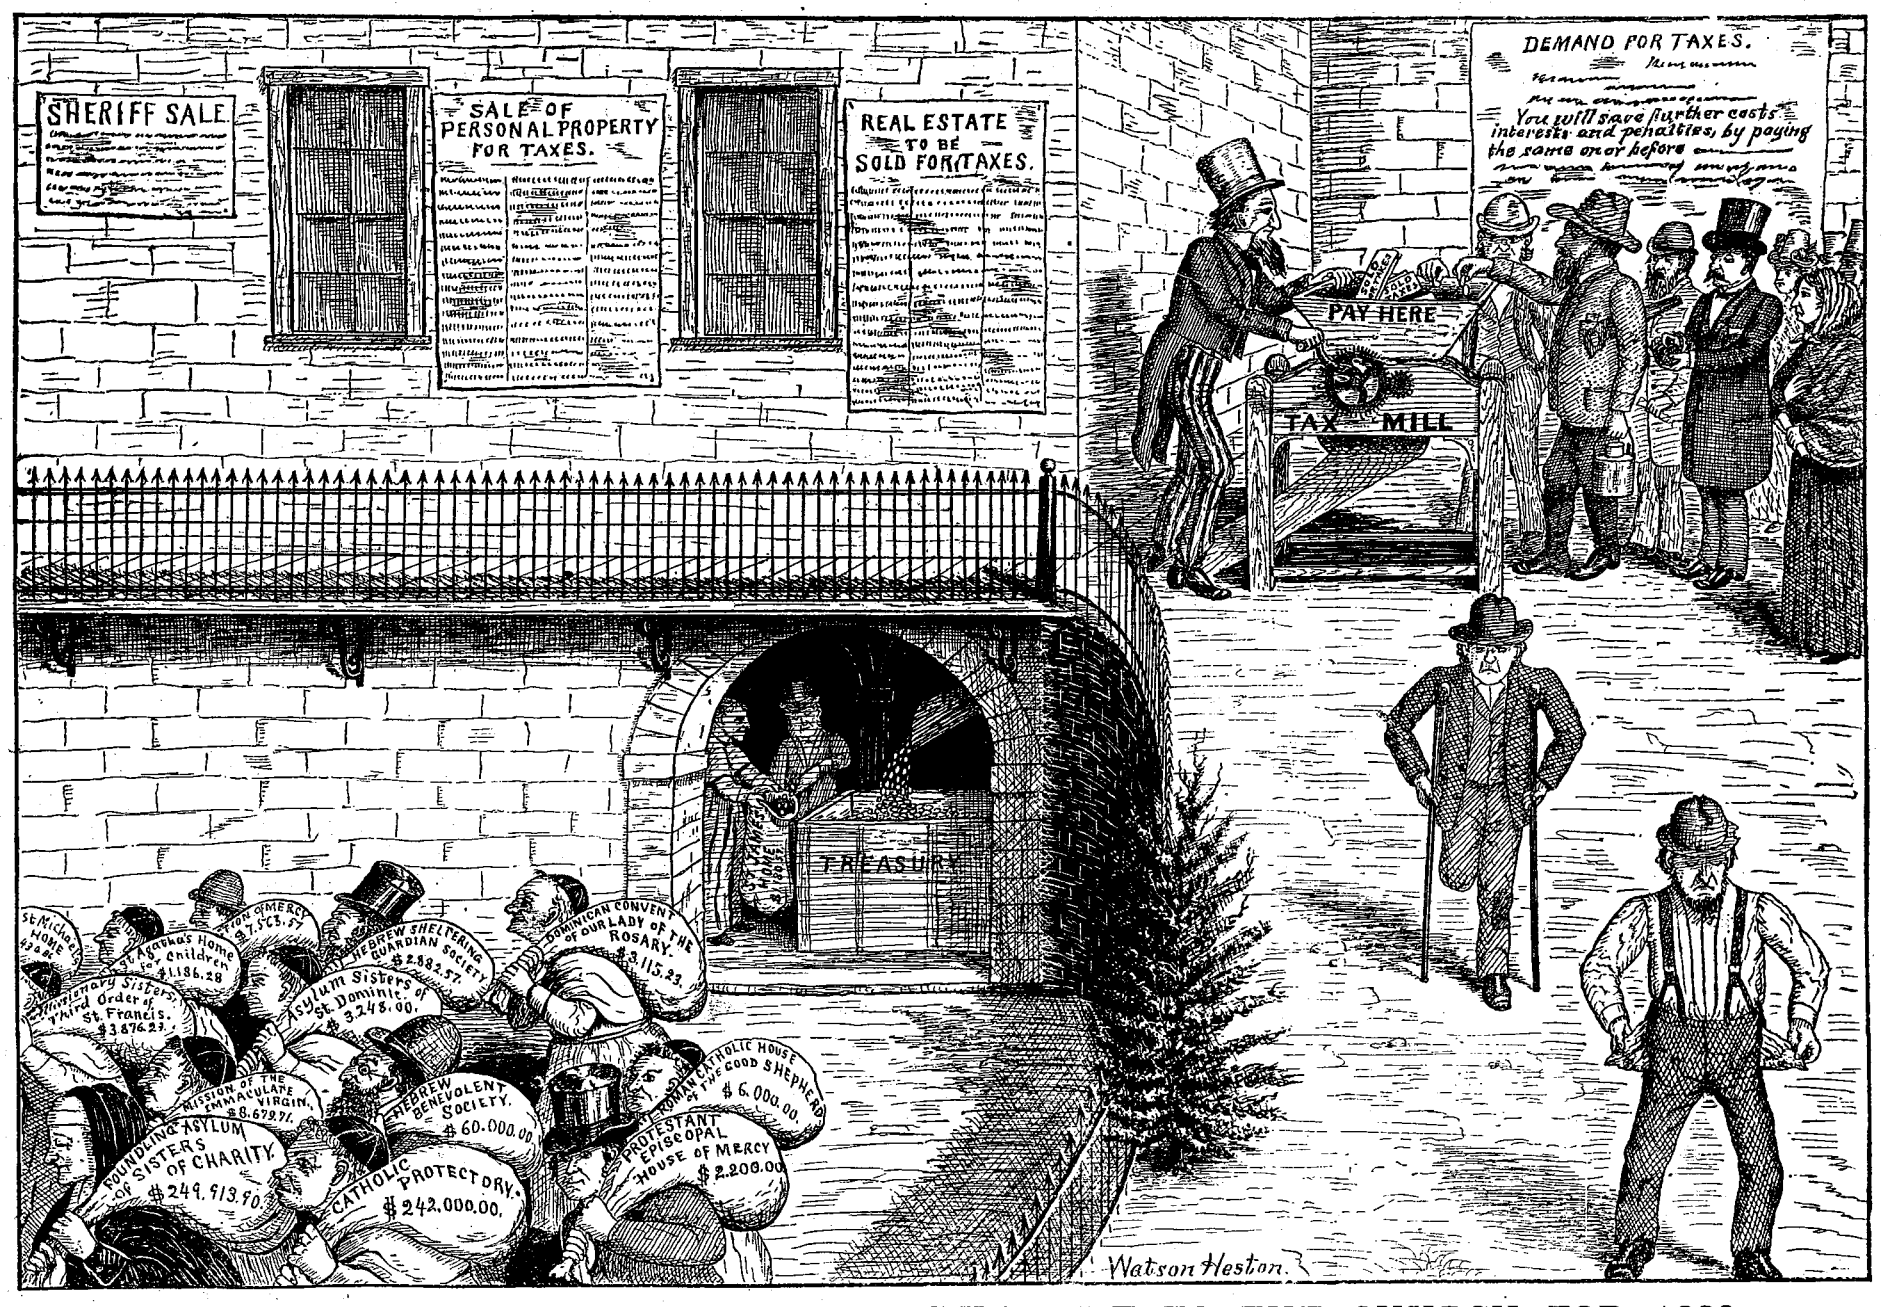
This is looked at as another link to the chain of evidence tending to show that the lost ocean steamer Oregon ran down the Morse and was sunk by her.

THE railroad strike in the Southwest, centering at St. Louis, Mo., was on Sunday declared off, and the men ordered to their work again, and then on Monday it was ordered to be continued. The contradiction arose from a misunderstanding between Master Workman Powderly and Jay Gould on the question of arbitration. The end is not yet.

GARRET MAYBEE, of Brookville, L. I., the half-blind man on whom negro Rugg made a murderous attack on the day he killed Mrs. Maybee and her daughter, is said to hav become insane. He is haunted by the idea that he is pursued by Rugg, the murderer of his family. Rugg, it will be remembered, experienced religion previous to being hanged, and is now in heaven.



THE Rev. Oscar F. Brown, of Bayonne, N. J., left his home and family on the 4th of March, and industrious search was made for him by his wife, who feared her husband's mind had become affected through overstudy. Public anxiety has been somewhat allayed during the past week by the discovery that the Rev. Mr. Brown has since his disappearance been living in comfortable intimacy with a woman in the upper part of this city.

GOVERNMENT GENEROSITY—NEW YORK'S GIFT TO THE CHURCH FOR 1886.

Notes and Clippings.

THERE is talk of a world's fair in Washington in 1892, to commemorate the fourth centennial of America's discovery.

LADY COOK. once Tennie C. Claflin, who married a noble lord of England, has a stepson forty-two years old, which is about her own age.

BY a vote of 169 to 137 the German legislature has decided to continue the anti-Socialist law. Meanwhile mutual concessions between Prussia and the pope of Rome are being made.

SAM JONES, the revivalist, has given up the use of tobacco. It is said that in his sermons he plainly shows the effect of this self-denial, being absent-minded and rambling, and repeating himself often.

THE captain of a Salvation Army in Shenandoah, Pa., refused to carry the stars and stripes ahead of their own banner, and persisted in carrying them in the rear. Last Sunday a crowd of old soldiers and other patriotic persons took the flag away from the army.

IN his last Lenten lecture Dr. Dix, of this city, emitted the following wail: "Here hav we the philosophy of Materialism and Naturalism full blown. The old religion seems tottering, crumbling; the powers of heaven are shaken, those majestic powers which once restrained the lawless, comforted the sorrowful, and helped the lowly; the light grows dim; 'woe unto us! for the day goeth away, for the shadows of the last evening are stretched out.'"

OVER $1,400,000 has been contributed from other countries, mainly from America, to help Ireland. It is to be hoped that this money will not, like that sent to relieve the earthquake victims in Spain last year, be spent in the rejuvenating of decayed cathedrals and for the further glory of the pope.

WHILE the Rev. Dr. Kittredge, of Chicago, was describing in a sermon on Sunday morning how there were red-handed Anarchists lurking about the city ready to burn or otherwise destroy property, escaping steam began to issue from the pipes of the grand organ just back of the pulpit. A moment later the entire congregation apparently began having visions of dynamite bombs and Socialists. The members were soon skurrying through the aisles pointing at what they thought to be smoke. When the audience was on the verge of a panic, Dr. Kittredge said he was "only forcibly admonished to put more steam in his sermons," and order was restored.

THE Windham, Conn., Transcript says: "Spring is here, and earth turns to the sun in all the warmth of young love that in millions of years has not abated one jot or one tittle. She carries us past the dividing line between winter and summer, and we turn our backs on the snow-clad hills, and face the sunny vales, and the fields that to-morrow will be as new and fresh as though they were born or created yesterday. We wait the flight of the frost king for the running of the waters oceanward, babbling and singing as they go. The warm rains at hand will delight the meadows, which the spring virgins will strew with flowers." Nothing analogous to this has as yet been remarked in New York.

BANKER SELIGMAN, the wealthy Israelite, recently visited the Workingmen's Free Reading-Room and Library and interviewed Mr. Bordollo, the organizer. A few days later he sent the institution a big dictionary and a check for $25, with a broad intimation that the library might depend on him hereafter for the price of its rent, which he proposed to pay. All this occurred just after Mr. Seligman had read the article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 27th on "A Worthy Enterprise," to which his attention had been called.

A LADY said: "My boy is rather slangy, but he has a very strong faith in everything that bears the stamp of ecclesiastical authority. I was reading the other evening after he had gone to bed, when he called to me, and I went to his bed. He said, 'Mamma, I want to tell you a story.' Then he related the story of Samson and the foxes, and when he had come to the end said: 'Of course that's true, for the book I read it in had Bible Stories on the back. But you don't think that if any kid on the street should tell me that I'd believe him.'"

ONE of the prettiest entertainments in this city is "Pepita," now enjoying a successful run at the Union Square Theater. The lady who takes the title rôle, and who under the name of Lillian Russell has by her beauty and talents won a first place in the public estimation, is the daughter of Mrs. Cynthia Leonard, our friend of the Liberal Club. "Pepita" is a great achievement. Miss Russell is so pretty that everybody admires her; the scenery and costumes grow more attractiv the more they are gazed upon; Proprietor Hill is one of the rising managers of New York; and the audiences are all that could be desired. Those who postpone a visit to the Union Square Theater are wasting time that might be most profitably employed by going to see "Pepita."

THE cause of religion, humanly speaking, was brought to a practical test by Lee and Cline at Perryville, W. Va., recently. Cline, championing religion, got the drop on Lee first, and made him get on his knees and offer a prayer to the throne of grace in orthodox fashion. Apparently there was not much attention paid to his prayer, for soon after delivering it he procured a gun and shot the life out of Cline. Lee is in jail and Cline is doubtless an angel. It is a great pity that Cline's services on earth were dispensed with so soon. He was a very practical and forcible evangelist, and the denomination to which he belonged should take steps to hav him canonized.—Ex.

EDGAR M. FORREST, a reformed gambler and drunkard, is holding exciting and profitable revival meetings in Missouri. He says that he was converted about six years ago while running a faro game in Parsons, Kan. One night while dealing, being then several hundred dollars ahead of the game, he says he felt as though a hand was laid on his shoulder, saying, "Stop!" So impressed was he with the thought that it was the hand of God that he threw all his winnings upon the table and exclaimed, "Right here I quit!" He went to work the next day exhorting the drunkard and the gambler to follow his example. Mr. Forrest showed a level head in stopping ahead of the game, but some people will wonder if he would hav quit so promptly if he had been behind.

An Examination of Church History.

BEING LETTERS TO A CATHOLIC.—XI.—CONCLUDED.

To none of your sacraments hav I paid such especial attention as to that of the eucharist. In the course of my reading I met a work on the wonderful doings of the holy wafer. I noticed that the Jews—a rather practical set, by the way—were the usual objects of divine vengeance for their temerity in interfering with this sacrament. One instance in particular made a great impression on me. A Jew had obtained a wafer and called in the whole congregation to help him annihilate Jesus. Armed with knives and headed by the rabbi, they attacked it, and at the first stab blood came in such quantities that they threw the wafer into a well, the water of which, although it was very deep, became crimson in a moment. The wafer floated on the surface and emitted a peculiar light which attracted the attention of a policeman, who entered the house, discovered the Jews, arrested them, etc., etc. Such an immense quantity of blood came that it was only by a signal exhibition of divine providence that the city was not inundated. The wafer, so the story ran, was now on exhibition in the cathedral of the "Most Holy Sacrament."

After reading various stories of like ilk, I determined to test the matter for myself, so by the judicious use of a little flattery, with the addition of a $5 note, I persuaded my cook to bring me some consecrated wafers. For two succeeding Sundays she attended early mass and edified all by partaking of the sacrament, bringing me each time the wafer in her handkerchief. I now had Jesus under my own roof, and awaited with impatience an opportunity for a fair test.

I ordered my man to dig a trench from under my window to the banks of the river, and had a six-inch pipe connect it with my sanctum. You see, my friend, like you, I was inclined to believe these stories, and as I had just lifted a mortgage from the homestead and did not own any real estate on the other side of the river, I was not very anxious to hav my house floated over onto somebody else's property.

I selected a beautiful Sunday in mid-summer. The house was quiet and no neighbors around. Drawing a table up to the window and just over the outlet pipe, with a large dipper near at hand in case of emergency, I placed my wafers before me and with a fine cambric needle was about to commence operations, when, glancing through the window facing the Hudson, I noticed a small yacht lying in the stream. Not a breath of wind fanned the waters, and her sails flapped as she swung at anchor. I could see the yachtsman as he sat astern, pipe in mouth, the smoke hanging in clouds over his head.

If there be anything I delight in more than another, it is a surprise, and I pictured to myself the astonishment of the yachtsman at being suddenly struck by a squall and seeing the river overflowing with blood. His testimony, should he outliv the experiment, would be corroboratory of mine; I would write to the holy father; be invited on to Rome; possibly a cardinalate given me; and even—yes, my friend, I saw canonization in the distance. We can not control our thoughts, and I shame to confess I aspired to that holy and exalted position.

After commending my soul to God, I very gingerly jabbed one of the pieces—and looked in vain for even one drop of blood. I then rushed to the window to see the effect on the elements. Everything remained in statu quo—not a ripple on the water, not even the faintest trace of a breeze. I scanned the horizon to the north, west, and south—no indication of even a little cloud. Nature remained serene.

I was disappointed, and, returning to the table, jabbed one piece, then another, then the two; but all to no purpose. The yachtsman remained in his same old position, in blissful ignorance of the surprise I had intended for him, and whatever blood may hav come left no traces on my table and was soaked up in the trench. I was disappointed, but reasoned that in some mysterious manner the essence of Jesus had left the wafer and gone into my cook when it was placed on her tongue.

One day, while reading the "Treatis on the Mass," by Pope Innocent III., in which he queries what would become of Jesus if the wafer were eaten by a mouse, I prayerfully reconsidered my determination not to experiment again, for I wanted only the very faintest evidence, and would then proclaim it from the house-tops.

You remember my breed of light Brahmas. Well, I selected my best hen, and, placing her apart from the rest, made her fast, and then feasted her on one of my wafers. You cannot imagin with what anxiety I watched the result. The next day when she cackled I was seated on the veranda and imagined she was more joyous than usual; she seemed to say, "Good luck! good luck!"

Now that the moment of success had arrived, I was powerless to move, to act, even to think. It seemed as if the air were teeming with a host of holy visitants singing hosannahs; the heavens opened, and the sweet strains of the "Venite Adoramus" mingled harmoniously with the joyous exclamations of my angelic friends, and a voice whispered softly in my ear, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

How long I remained thus I cannot say, but as the strains of this heavenly music died away, and I caught the last view of the smiling faces of the angelic choir, my physical assumed the master, and I hurried to the nest; and lo! there lay my egg. It was apparently the same as any other, but I hugged myself with delight, as I thought that I then held in my hand the only egg in the world possessing eternal life. I carried it carefully to my sanctum and tenderly placed it in cotton batting.

Reclining in my easy chair, I allowed my imagination full sway. I was undetermined what to do with it. Should I giv it to the pope, and obtain my reward? Should I exhibit it, and make money? What ought I to do? I had a treasure, and it was my duty to unborn generations not to fritter it away. An inward monitor seemed to say, "Keep quiet and await results."

For weeks I would go several times a day to examin it, being always careful not to handle it, for as it was a mystery, I did not know but some mysteious process of incubation might be going on. Happy thought! I might obtain a "type." Of course, I did not know what a "type" was, and I never had met anyone who did; but, as I had read so much of them in holy books, I felt convinced that, like taurs, fauns, and satyrs, they had once existed. Possibly it was to be my good fortune to renew the breed. Here my imagination again had full sway, and I pictured myself as the sole possessor of the "type breed," and with what pleasure I would present one to each of my Catholic acquaintances! and believe me, my friend, I thought frequently of you.

To attempt to portray my feelings, hopes, aspirations, during this trying period would be useless. I had no peace by day, and at night wandered around à la Theodore Tilton. Any moment might be the culminating one. It arrived. One day I became aware of a peculiar and unsavory oder, and traced it to its source, and, my friend, would you believe me?—it was the egg. Eternal life had become eternal death.

Sadly I consigned it to the compost-heap; my hopes were blasted, my faith shattered. Ever since then I hav abhorred eggs, and the light Brahmas are no longer my pride. I could not for a long time divest myself of the impression that my failure was due to the devil. You know how he always intrudes, and whenever there is to be a manifestation from "on high," he generally succeeds in outwitting the omnipotent, omniscient, and omnipresent God. I placed my solitary wafer carefully away, and for months gave it no consideration.

I had become so thoroughly disappointed that I now became cautious, and recommenced by reading works on the Lord's supper, and, to my surprise, found it had been a custom long practiced in pagan Rome. Even Cicero, a hundred years before the advent of Jesus, had written against it as a senseless and old-time superstition. On lookng further, I found that even in debased Tartary they had this sacrament. The Egyptians also, had partaken of the body and blood of Osiris; the Persians of that of Mithra; and the Athenians, in celebrating the Eleusinian mysteries, were, in this point at least, good Catholics. But when my investigations into the Aztec question satisfied me that they also practiced the same ceremony in honor of Quetzalcoatl, I was forced to conclude that your holy eucharist was a relic of those barbarous days when the cannibalistic propensities of our ancestors were in the ascendency.

I then examined your therory more carefully, and found that in its present shape it differed essentially from the practice of the early church. Then it was held as commemorativ of the last supper; and the holy pix, now esteemed so sacred that a special sanctuary is built for it in every church, and which, when a priest is carrying it to a dying man, imposes perfect silence and the deepest meditation, was, prior to the ninth century, carried by the faithful on their persons and kept as a talisman in every Christian household. I read with interest that Paschasius Radbert, in 831, was the first to advance what is now known as the doctrin of transubstantiation, and wondered why the faithful had been kept for eight hundred years in such complete ignorance of this greatest of all blessings. But when I came to the writings of Berenger, who attacked the doctrin in 1050, and found that your greatest pope, Gregory (Hildebrand), protected him, and remained his constant friend through these persecutions, I was completely mystified. I followed its history down to the Council of Trent, where a bare majority of an ecumenical council of sixty-four, representing, as they claimed, the entire of Christendom, declared that it had always been in the church, of the church, and had been taught by Jesus.

I read with surprise the arguments of your theologians in proof that substance is the essence, the spiritual part, and when the mystic words are pronounced the essence of the wafer is changed into the essence of Jesus. I turned to your scriptural tale and found represented merely an ordinary and very plain repast, when one of the sitters broke a piece of bread, and giving it, with a cup of wine, to his companions, remarked as often as they did so it would be a gentle reminder that he had once been with them. (How often hav you and I done the same over a parting glass?) I searched in vain for anything in regard to essence, and transubstantiation was never mentioned. I examined your missal and found that when your priest places the wafer on the tongue of the communicant, he says: "Corpus domini nostri Jesu Christi," etc.—"May the body of our Lord Jesus Christ"—and does not say any word about essence; so I wondered why your theologians changed the terms and garbled the meaning of their God in their teachings, and in their practice did the direct opposit.

Here was something for an investigating mind, so I determined on another experiment. In my collection I found a sermon by the most Rev. Archbishop Kenrick. It had been published in pamphlet so as "to enable the faithful to answer all questions," etc. One of the statements made was that for over eighteen hundred years the mass had been celebrated daily by over one million priests, and at least two million of the laity daily partook of this sacrament.

So I procured a very fine scale and weighed my remaining wafer, and found just how many it took to the pound, and I computed how many pounds had been consumed by these two million daily communicants in the eighteen hundred years. I then estimated that the pix used by the priest weighed ten times as much as the one in my possession, and by closely observing the quantity of wine and water used at each mass, which I estimated at two ounces, I satisfied myself as to the total amount of raw material used by the clergy. Now your writers represent Jesus as both small and mean-looking, and I allowed 125 pounds for his weight; so by simple division I found he had reproduced himself over 872,000,000 of times, or about once a minute for the past 1800 years, in order to satisfy the cravings of the faithful. This result satisfied me that your scheme was a gigantic humbug, and the change of doctrin an attempt at the further mystification of a mystified creed which could not bear even that slight investigation which the slumbering intelligence of man during the dark ages was bringing to bear on it.

A short time ago I saw a statement in one of your papers in regard to the low spiritual condition of the Southern negro. The writer deplored this, and begged alms to keep up the mission, and giv these poor unfortunates the benefits of the gospel.

Now, I should like ask you a question. I presuppose that you are somewhat familiar with what is called fetichism; so, presuming Archbishop Kenrick to be correct, and my figures not faulty, do you know of, did you ever hear of, could you possibly imagin, any form of fetichism so degrading, so inconceivably stupid, as this bulwark of your faith—the sacrament of the Eucharist? And why, in the name of common sense, do you wish to impose it on the negro, who already has more superstitions to contend with than he can well master?

The most bitter opponents of your church feel to congratulate themselvs that you possess the Jesuits and recognize them as your leading society. Had it not been for them, most of the legends on which your faith is founded would hav remained sunk in the obscurity of convents; Mary would hav been an ordinary woman; Jesus Christ the head of your church, and infallibility a dream. Therefore I, for one, say let their numbers increase, and in the near future we may hear that the second advent has become reincarnated in the general of their order.

In conclusion, allow me to regret again your indisposition to meet me as per your own proposition; and when I look at a bushel of notes I had made, and think of the rare treat I anticipated in having you answer them, I feel you hav taken an unkind advantage. Should your objection be personal, you will find ten thousand Infidel readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER anxious for light. Any of them will willingly meet you. For my part, I will assure your opponent that you are a good lawyer, with strong common sense on all subjects except religion, and as capable as any one I know to represent the opinion of the Catholic laity of America.

Your friend, McARTHUR.

A Challenge.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For the past three years I hav, at opportune times, investigated that phase of Spiritualism known as "Spirit Photography," and am convinced of its genuinness.

I desire to convince others, even the most skeptical Materialists. Therefore I submit the following proposition:

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all of its readers who are interested, to nominate a committee of five or more to supervise all arrangements in connection with the sittings.

To select a photographer known to them to be au fait in the art in every particular, who shall be present and critically watch every step taken.

He may make the developing bath according to the formula used by the medium artist and procure the plates at my expense.

In short, every method that can be thought of by your committee to prevent fraud may be resorted to, and the details of the various experiments and the results published in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

All this may be done without cost to anyone except myself. Who responds? R. M. ROBINSON.

To Friends of Truth.

Will friends who are continually claiming that Truesdell is a medium, and was helped by spirits in the tricks he performed in the presence of Elmina while she was at Syracuse, please inform her how this can be when Mr. Truesdell showed her how the tricks were done, and told who did the writing, and brought proof and evidence each time? I could hav done each trick myself (with a little practice). Am I then a medium? Do spirits aid me? I hav had D. M. Bennett's name in large script, in plain sight here in my room for three months, and hav vainly asked any and all mediums to tell me what it is written upon. A little, simple test, and yet they cannot do it.

ELMINA.

The Origin of the Whole Business.

Three hundred centuries ago, more or less, probably more, a man in puris naturalibus sat on a rock by the placid waters of a lake that reflected the blue of the arch above.

He was meditating—thinking aloud—in regard to the race in general and himself in particular. He propounded sundry and divers conundrums as follows, or about as follows:

"Am I not the superior animal of all the animals on earth? Most certainly.

"Am I not superior to the ox, the ass, the hog, the hyena, and things, even the mastodon and megatherium? Most decidedly.

"Do I not walk upright? Yes. Does any other animal? No.

"Hav I not the power of speech? Yes. Has any other animal? No.

"Can I not reason? Yes. Can any other animal? No. How do I know they can't? I know they can't. The idea is preposterous that the ox and the ass, and things, can reason. But I can? Most certainly.

"When these animals die, is that the end of them? Undoubtedly. When I die is that the end of me? It can't be—can it? I don't know. Yes, I do—it can't be. I, the highest order of living things, the talking and reasoning animal that walks upright, perish as the ox and the ass, the hog and the hyena perish? It can't be. Perish the thought.

"But my material being will die and rot as the hog dies and rots. Surely. But is there not an inner, a spiritual being—a something or other, I know not what—that will liv after my body has perished? There must be, there must be. I, the upright-walking, talking, and reasoning animal, man, cannot surely die as the hog dieth.

"No, no, no, it cannot be. I surely must hav a—a—what? A soul—yes, I will call that something which, with my body, forms a duality, a soul. Will not this soul, which no other animal possesses, liv on and liv ever after the death of my body? It must; it must. I feel it; I believe it; I wish it; I know it. Ha! ha! I am immortal! Man is the only immortal being of the earth's array. The ox, and the ass, and things shall perish, but I shall liv on after my body perishes, and liv on forever! O my prophetic soul, thou teachest me this, and I believe."

Here he leaned over and saw his reflected form in the pellucid waters at his feet. He started, and came to a perpendicular position. What he had seen was a revelation. He never before saw the reflection of his noble form, and now he was more in love with himself than ever. Stretching forth his arms he leaned over the water mirror as far as possible, without falling, and saw himself reflected as the letter T. Then he raised his hands above his head. Then he lowered them to his sides. He lifted one leg, then the other. He posed in divers attitudes—he tried to see his back, but the view, for obvious reasons, was not satisfactory—and looked himself all over in the liquid mirror at his feet. He was pleased, more than pleased; delighted with himself as he never before had been to such a degree. Then he voiced himself again:

"Yes, surely hav I a soul that must liv after the body dies. Where will it liv? I know not. But there must be a place for souls. But what about souls? Our bodies are from nature like those of the ox, and the ass, and things. Does nature furnish the soul? No; else hav the hog and the hyena souls. Ha! there is a higher power than nature? Yes, surely. I will call that higher power God. God made the human soul. Where dwells he my soul shall dwell. Heaven—I will call it heaven—the abiding-place of God and human souls.

"But there are bad souls as well as good. Will they liv? Yes, for they are immortal. But where? There must be a place for bad souls. Undoubtedly. I will call it hell. There the bad souls shall forever liv in torment, while the good souls are at peace in heaven. Is not God, the maker of my soul, to be praised, to be honored, to be glorified, to be loved, to be feared, to be supplicated, to be bowed down to? Most assuredly.

"O my God, I bow down to thee and praise thee. I love and honor thee. I thank thee that my soul is not like some other souls. I fear and supplicate thee, and will be thine forever. Amen!

"Should not God be worshiped by man? Most certainly. What shall I call the belief in and worship of God? Religion. I will call it religion. I will inaugurate it at once, and boom it to the best of my ability. I will be the mouthpiece of God and a power among men. With religion I will hold them in check, in thraldom. They shall bow to it, to me, to God. I will frighten them with hell. Stay; must there not be a master of hell, as of heaven? There must. God of heaven, who of hell? Devil—I will call him the devil. Ha! I will frighten them with the devil and hell. I will hav them on the hip. I will rule them by divine right. I feel the right and the might. I feel inspired. I am inspired by God! Yes, I am the God-inspired man. Glory to God! I am the one holy living man. My God, I bow down to thee and thank thee that I am the one man holy. I will be the high priest of the Lord. Lord is a good word. I will be the high priest of the Lord, and preach to the people. They shall acknowledge me and the Lord. I will hold them in subjection for the Lord through fear of the devil. With religion the world shall be policed and held in chains."

Leaning over, he again surveyed himself in the liquid mirror at his feet, and to his satisfaction. Then, straightening up, he threw up his hands and cast his eyes aloft, exclaiming:

"Up there in the blue is heaven, the home of God. There livs God, and there is heaven. Down there, under the earth, is hell, the home of the devil. There livs the devil, and there is hell. Here am I, man, with a soul immortal—a soul with a life eternal. Glory to God and the soul within me!

"I go to preach God and devil. I go to preach heaven and hell. I go to preach man's soul immorta and life everlasting. I go to preach eternal happiness and eternal torments. I go to preach religion and the consequence of denial. To be sure, all these are of my imagination, but I feel they must be realities. I wish, I hope, I desire to that end. They are realities. I know there is a God and a heaven for my soul through all eternity. I know there must be a devil and hell for wicked souls through all eternity. I know man has a soul to be saved or damned. I believe. I hav faith. I know. As to religion, there is none; but there shall be. I proclaim it as God's prophet. With this as a weapon wielded for the Lord, it will be a glacial period if I get left!"

The man ceased and strode away, soon being lost to view behind a hill. Thus originated in the egoism of man the all-permeating essence of his mental composition, God and the devil, heaven and hell, the soul immortal, and life eternal; and thus was religion started in to hold the world in thraldom.

SI SLOKUM.

Prayer, Ancient and Modern.

We read in ancient (modern) books where prophets and mischievous priests with feeble prayers hav sought to stay the providential hand; where craft pierced heaven with a bitter curse on gallant youths who in their sport mistook a stupid dunce for jovia and good-natured age; where hungry bears with appetites increased by God made but a small and dainty meal of forty bright and happy youths and maids just budding into life's sweet bloom. We also read where prayer closed the friendly clouds, and famin with relentless curse brought death and desert fields. The sun and moon at man's command reversed their course to giv a beastly mob of brutes more time to butcher fellow-men. We read where Egypt's fertil fields were changed to barren desert wastes; where seas and rivers parted wide to let the feet of men tread dry, and first-born babes in purest innocence were slaughtered by divine command. Egypt's hosts were robbed of gold; the rivers ran with crimson blood; sticks were changed to coiling snakes, and dust developed into lice. Frogs supplied the place of rain, and winds with pestilential breath brought men unnumbered woes. Miracles were wrought; the ass of Baalam spoke, and Babel, with her thousand tongues, at once relinquished work. Fish were made to swallow men and not digest. Fresh water streamed from barren rocks. The heavens oped and granted one unsavory dish for forty years. Dyspeptics eager cried for change, and lo! from heaven's portals snakes and quails came tumbling down. Divinity at man's command saved Lot from Sodom's fires. At convicts' prayers the angels oped the iron gates. When Jesus raised imploring hands the ancient towers fell, the dead came forth, and empty vaults resounded naught.

The times hav changed. Entreating hands are raised in vain. The prison walls reëcho now unanswered prayers. Devotees stand beside the sick and vainly strive to frighten death away. Men die at nature's call, and when the fatal die is cast there can be no demurrer, no pardons or reprieves. The millions prayed for Lincoln's life; the same for Garfield's too. They died, and now they pray that Christ may wield the scepter over all the world; but Reason's flaming torch enkindles Superstition's walls, and now her once embattled towers are crumbling into smoke and dust. Holy water will not quench the flames. The winds engendered by the priest but lap and kiss the eager flames. The church must die.

G. F. RINEHART.

The Canadian Man with a Badge-Pin.

Mr. Watts arrived in town on Tuesday, 23d, and will remain in Canada until about the 1st of May, when he will go to England. He lectures here next Sunday, 28th, and every Sunday for the next few weeks. A number of lectures hav been arranged through the country, which he will attend to through the week. He is greatly pleased with the Society's new hall, and will assist at the opening to-morrow night (Friday).

His numerous friends will be pleased to hear that he has entirely recovered from his late indisposition, and "Richard is himself again."

The unhappy individual who for the last few weeks has ground out the items for this corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and who is doing it partly for amusement, partly with the hope of interesting perhaps a few people in the other suburbs of civilization, and partly to keep himself out of other mischief, has been the subject of some criticism, some little abuse, and also the recipient of some kindly advice from a few friends. The latter is accepted with thanks, but the former requires some little explanation, and as there is not much in the way of news this week, with the consent of our much-abused editor, I will rise to explain.

Among other things, I am told if I don't like Christianity, by all means go for it, but let individuals alone. "What right hav you," says one, "to attack the ministers as you hav done in the case of Drs. Wild and Potts?"

I might say broadly that I only claim the right that the public press hav taken in dealing with these gentlemen. The papers in Toronto and elsewhere hav given them, and particularly Dr. Potts, a more wholesome dressing-down, and called them more hard names, than I hav done, but of course the newspapers as a rule are Christian, and can with other Christians fight and say what they please of each other, but for outsiders, "Hands off!"

But I claim a better right than this for my alleged attack on these reverends. We don't as a rule make war with individuals. There are hundreds of Christians of my acquaintance, among whom are a number of ministers, all of whom I know to be upright and just citizens and generous friends. But these gentlemen, Messrs. Potts and Wild, hav gone considerably out of their way to attack Secularists—not myself personally, but the Secular Society in general and some of my friends in particular.

A year ago, in Montreal, the Rev. Dr. Potts made a most scurrilous attack on our friend Mr. Watts, and was principally the cause of the non-success of the debate at that time between him and Dr. Sexton. He used the most violent language, going so far as to say that Mr. Watts ought to be driven out of the city. Had it been fifty years earlier in the same town, he would no doubt hav been driven out, and driven, if possible, to the orthodox hell, by the same class of bigots. Oh, but I'm told Dr. Potts is sincere. Of course he is, but I think history will prove (see Draper's "Conflict" and White's "Warfare") that Christian leaders hav been dangerous in exact proportion to their sincerity.

And Dr. Wild three years ago made the boast from the pulpit that the Toronto Secular Society would never succeed while he was in the city. He has repeatedly denounced us, and repeatedly refused to meet us in debate, and yet we must deal with him gently. He delivered a lecture a few weeks ago—subject, "Bradlaugh and Liberty"—in which he demonstrated that he knew no more of one than he did of the other. He denounced Mr. Bradlaugh as a hypocrit, and repeated the old lie of his having, on his first applying for admission to the House of Commons, refused to take the oath, and, although written to on the subject, he refuses to correct his statement. These are the men that week-kneed nothingarians say we hav no right to attack. I take no stock in the precept which Christians profess to believe in, "If thine enemy smite thee on one cheek, turn to him the other also," and I don't act up to it—neither do the Christians.

I am also told that it is unmanly to attack them under the cover of an assumed signature. Well, that's all right; but for fear that there may be somebody in Oregon or at the Antipodes who holds the same opinion, let me say that I liv in Toronto, always bear that in mind; also that I am in business there, and for various reasons wish for the present to remain so; also that I state nothing but the truth, but am not strong enough, financially or otherwise, to fight single-handed the whole church militant of this hot-bed of orthodoxy.

There is an old chestnut which explains the situation: An old sinner had been lying on a bed of sickness for many months. He was wasted away to a skeleton; the doctors gave him up, and the parson was called in. Said he: "My dear friend your days are numbered; you hav only a few hours to liv; don't you think it is time you commenced to wrestle with the Lord?" "Wrestle with the Lord? What! with them 'ere legs?" at the same time sticking out a fearfully emaciated leg from under the bed-clothes. "Pshaw! he'd toss me into hell the first throw." See? I'm theologically out of order. I'm not strong enough on my "pins" financially, socially, politically, to wrestle with the orthodox party in Canada. If they didn't toss me there they would toss my business into sheol in no time. No, thank you, not any in mine! I am glad to hav the opportunity now and then of doing what little I can to help along the cause, but martyrdom is out of fashion, and never did any good anyway.

March 25, 1886.

The opening of the new Secular Hall on Friday evening, March 26th, was a most unqualified success, an event long to be remembered, one which marks the beginning of a new era in the existence of the society and augurs well for its future prosperity.

Thanks to the efforts of the committee, Messrs. Hicks, Earsman, Elliott, Edwards, and others, who had given their whole time for some days to the work—and thanks also to the ladies who assisted in the work of decoration—the hall at the hour of opening presented a beautiful appearance.

The walls were tastefully hung with pictures and a number of neat bannerets bearing the names of noted Freethinkers and scientists, living and dead. The stage and windows were handsomely festooned with flags and lace, and the two handsome gas chandeliers put in by friend Earsman and son threw a radiant light upon the prettiest hall of its size in the city.

A good program had been provided of music, singing, reading, etc., the rendering of which gave general satisfaction. President Algie occupied the chair, and during the concert Mr. Watts made a short but eloquent address, setting forth the aims and objects of the society. The ladies furnished an excellent board of refreshments, which were duly appreciated; and after the concert came dancing until the small hours. Everybody was delighted, and if a "thousand hearts" did not "beat happily," it was only because there was not that number present. At all events, for those who were there, "all went merry as a marriage bell," and there is a consensus of opinion that the affair must be repeated at an early date. Arrangements are already being made for doing so.

On Sunday evening, the 28th, Mr. Watts lectured; subject, "The Bible or Science, Which?" and Mr. Algie, who was again in the chair, performed the duties of that position as only he can. The hall was well filled with an appreciativ audience. Mr. Watts was in his best vein, and made an excellent impression, the applause being hearty and frequent.

He lectures to-night and to-morrow in Listowel, and next week goes north for a few days, lecturing in Galt, Ayr, and later on in Alton.

Altogether, the Toronto Society hav made an excellent start in their new quarters. They hav a splendid hall in a new and handsome building—a hall which they are all proud of; and with the experience gained while in the old rooms, seeing where mistakes hav occurred and profiting thereby, they expect to make Secularism more popular than it has been in the past, and under the improved conditions manage the affairs of the institution so as to bring profit and pleasure to all concerned.

The library and reading-room will be open at least three or four evenings during the week and all day Sunday, and country friends visiting the city will be cordially welcomed.

The citizens of Toronto are in a somewhat peculiar condition just at present. They are living, so to speak, under the guidance of a headless corporation. Our immaculate mayor has been unseated, his Christian supporters are at their wits end, and "chaos is come again." Some meddlesome busybody discovered that Mr. Howland did not possess the requisit property qualification, and the law in the case having been tested, the office of mayor is declared vacant, and the city pays the expense of a new election. Mr. Howland will be again nominated, and in all probability reëlected; but some of those in a position to know say that if elected he will be again unseated on similar grounds. As the fellow in the Mikado says, "Here's a state of things."

The law in this matter is clear enough, and a little forethought on the part of the mayor or his friends would hav saved all the trouble, but as a rule this class of people don't think to any great extent; they go into politics as they do in religion, and thought or reason like "the flowers that bloom in the spring, tra-la, hav nothing to do with the case." There seems to be no immediate danger of disaster from this trouble; in fact, a stranger wouldn't know that he was inside of a decapitated municipality. Some of the leaders in the late crusade of fanaticism hav a sort of a dazed, far-away look in their eyes, and a generally crushed appearance, but otherwise things go on pretty much as usual, and no doubt the people will manage to liv through the crisis.

A few weeks ago the Rev. Dr. Potts preached a sermon on, and took up a collection in aid of, foreign missions, said collection amounting to something over twenty-three hundred dollars. A few days afterward eleven hundred idle laboring men sent a committee to the mayor requesting him to giv them work on the streets. I may hav an awkward way of putting things together, but it would seem that to relieve the poor at home should be of more importance than the foreign missions.

In the course of his sermon, while pleading for large contributions, the doctor said that "giving was a means of grace." I rode down town with him the other morning in the horse-car, and I couldn't help thinking, from his oily, sleek, and generally stall-fed appearance, that grease would hav been the proper word. I may be hauled over the coals for this, but it can't be helped; from the nature of the thing it slipped out before I could stop it, and it's only a case of quid pro quo.

TORONTO.

March 31, 1886.

The Liberal Club.

Various causes conspired to render the 407th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club one of the most interesting of the season. A fine audience was present, such as any presiding officer might deem it a privilege to call to order. Before producing the lecturer of the evening, President Wakeman spoke of THE TRUTH SEEKER as being better than ever, announcing that it was to be boycotted by Mr. Blissert. This had the effect of sending numerous persons to the secretary's table for copies of this paper, and the unusually large stock on hand was exhausted with alacrity.

Dr. P. P. Field was the lecturer, and he announced that the central thought of his discourse would be "The Six Laws of Art." The original six arts he described as architecture, painting, sculpture, literature, music, and oratory. All of these were desirable, but the greatest and crowning art of all was oratory. The various phenomena which are marked in connection with oratory Dr. Field called repose, economy, opposition, succession, etc. The Catholic church and John L. Sullivan represented repose; nature was economical; the dude violated the law of opposition by bowing and pulling his hat in the same direction that his alleged head goes. Dr. Field had a fanciful way of telling off each part of the human anatomy to represent some abstract but immensely significant thing. There was no necessary connection made apparent between them all, but the attempt to find one was extremely ingenious.

Dr. Field read several extracts from a book to illustrate the laws of oratory, and struck many picturesque attitudes. It must be confessed that those in the rear of the hall could not understand what he read. They could see that his mouth was working violently, and could plainly hear the sound of his voice, but the articulation was defectiv and the sense was sacrificed. Some of the reforms which he claimed to hav accomplished in bad speakers bordered on the incredible. The speaker wore a frock coat, open with the exception of the lower button. In his most frequent attitude he stood with his left hand hanging at the side, and his right thrust inside the breast of his coat. The lecture was entertaining, because the audience were interested in studying the speaker as well as his words. Dr. Field is to open a school at Dr. E. B. Foote's house on Lexington avenue, where for a very moderate sum he will giv lessons in the art of oratory. He is highly spoken of by competent judges of merit in that line.

Dr. Eccles responded to an invitation from the president to address the meeting. This speaker has hitherto been deemed a somewhat energetic orator, and the clock has often been known to stop and listen to his eloquence. but on this occasion he had himself well under control. Dr. Eccles would not depreciate the art of oratory, but he did not believe that he himself could make any headway learning it, because of the difficulty of teaching old dogs new tricks. This speaker had no criticism to offer upon Dr. Field's dramatic ability, but confined himself to pointing out the philosophical errors into which the speaker of the evening had fallen. Dr. Eccles was working his way up toward the hights of oratory which he has been wont to attain when the chairman called time on him.

Madam Delescluze, who is something of an elocutionist herself, wished to say that she was extremely surprised to learn that Dr. Eccles had never taken lessons in the dramatic art. He certainly had all the mannerisms of the studied elocutionist, and it was hard to understand where he got them. It was evident that Dr. Eccles had been taking lessons in "repose" since he delivered that lecture before the club on Socialism, on which occasion his gesticulation and rolling of his r's had reminded Madam Delescluze what a fine melodramatic actor he would hav made. The madam wished Dr. Field great success as a teacher of elocution. He appeared to hav studied the subject, and would doubtless do very well. Madam Delescluze added that she herself was naturally one of the shiest women in the world.

The next orator was Robert Blissert, who said he was shy also. It was going out of his domain to talk of elocution. Mr. Blissert had evidently not read the last number of this paper, and his language was mild.

Dr. Field explained that shyness was necessary to the good speaker. The orator must be sensitiv. He then answered Dr. Eccles. Standing on his right foot, he threw his left leg out and his right hand up until a straight line drawn from that hand to the left foot would hav followed both the arm and the leg very closely. He held that position for a moment, and then abandoned it with a loud snort. Dr. Field told Dr. Eccles that he didn't believe Dr. Eccles could do that. Dr. Eccles did not try it. Then Dr. Field went further. Shoving both hands into the air as high as he could reach, he stooped and touched his fists to the floor without bending the knees or breaking his back. Then he looked triumphantly at Dr. Eccles. The latter hadn't a word to say, and the conquest of the orator of the evening was complete.

Mr. Denslow, an eloquent man, who goes deeply into all questions that he bends his mind to, will address the club on Friday evening, the 9th; and when that solemn time comes round, the present writer there'll be found, with literary tackle; and while the oratory flows, and while the audience repose, he will record the cackle. The price of admission to the meetings of the club remains the same, notwithstanding their ever-increasing attractivness.

The Tent.

I propose to start the Tent the last of May, or, at very latest, the first week in June. Last season demonstrated beyond all question that the Tent is the most effectual and best possible method to propagate Liberalism during the summer season. Thanking the friends from all sections who so generously contributed to the Tent Fund, I wish to call attention to the fact that I do not desire to pitch the Tent where there is already a strong Liberal society able to engage lecturers, but in places where prejudice and bigotry are so great that halls are refused, or where Liberals are so few, or sectarianism so strong, that a course of Liberal lectures in winter is impossible. We desire to go where by a course of lectures and earnest, judicious efforts an efficient Secular Society, with science school on Sunday in which the women and children shall be deeply interested, may be the result.

Last year we charged ten cents for the use of our cane seat chairs, and made plank seats in the larger half of the tent free to all. This year it is proposed to hav friends who desire the Tent in their neighborhood to draw up a paper and canvass all Liberally inclined in their vicinity for contributions toward expenses, and giv to those who so contribute the cane-seat tickets for distribution among their friends and neighbors who they desire should attend. At suitable times collections will be taken up. But the main dependence will be on the Liberal contributions of those genuin friends of Secularism who liv up to their principles, and find their greatest happiness in promoting that of others.

The Tent effort is not simply for the gratification of acknowledged Liberals, but to help the thousands of honest hearts who are looking for beacon lights to lead them from the errors of the past, from useless rites and ceremonies, to the exercise of reason, and living lives of love and truth.

All agree that Secularism is doing as well as doubting. Let us, then, do justice to our friends and neighbors by helping them, as we hav been helped, out of the cruel bondage of superstition and priestcraft, and endeavor to promote their best welfare and happiness by diffusing the light of truth, so that they may share with us the liberty, peace, and happiness we enjoy.

Friends desiring tent effort in their neighborhood are requested to write me soon as possible, so that my route can be positivly decided, dates fixed, and all the necessary arrangements fully completed. The tent needs a lot (smooth greensward preferred) not less than 70x75, in a place easy of access, and the use of forty ordinary planks, sixteen feet long. We return them uninjured, as we do not drive nails in them. The tent-master and myself must be provided for during our stay; the tent-master, sleeping in a small tent, requires only use of pillows and quilts. Immediate application is absolutely necessary as we do not wish to waste time and money taking long jumps, and and must arrange so as to avoid loss of a single day from the 1st of June to the 1st of November.

News and Notes.

Rockford, Ill., is a city of about 20,000 inhabitants, and is quite conservativ. Nevertheless there is a considerable radical element. The Liberal Christians hav a prosperous society under the care of Dr. Kerr, who is almost on the line of our own work. In fact, as he himself said, there is but little difference between us, not enough to quarrel about. He has a dash of transcendentalism, and accepts the philosophy of Spencer, and finds in the conception of an infinit energy the opportunity for prayer and aspiration which simple humanity does not afford. These Platonic ideas, accommodated through the "Unknowable" of Spencer to modern science, are quite fascinating, and so long as they are held in a generous spirit, and with a recognition of the equal dignity of purely scientific thought, are rather to be welcomed, like music and poetry, and all things which are pleasing and at the same time unprovable. Dr. Kerr is entirely undogmatic, and the tendency of his work is to that for which the Secularist strives—a happy life where we now are. I enjoyed meeting with so cultivated, genial, and thoughtful a man as Dr. Kerr, and can but hope for his continued success at Rockford. Mrs. S. B. Miller and friends, who arranged for the lecture, made my short stay in Rockford very pleasant. I arrived in the afternoon, and was obliged to leave on the midnight train for Ottumwa, and I had but little time to study the situation. There was a good audience present, and it strikes me that Rockford will be an important point in the future of Liberalism. The country round about is permeated with Freethought, and a Secular Union in this city would in time find a growing local support. I was glad to meet among those present at the lecture Mr. Steves, of Durand, who has been for years in the Liberal ranks, and also others from a distance, showing the interest that is felt in the national organization.

At Ottumwa I also found a cordial welcome. There is a large society here, in which the Spiritualist element predominates, but an element that is quite in harmony with the aims and methods of the Union. Mr. Howell, the present speaker, introduced me to the audience. Mr. Stewart and Mr. Remsburg hav been working effectivly in this field. Mr. William Lindsay, Mr. and Mrs. McCarroll, and others keep the forces in constant activity.

A full house was present at the lecture. It is desired that I should spend a Sunday at Ottumwa on my return trip, and I am in hopes to be able to do this. I hope also that the Ottumwa Society will be able to secure for awhile the services of Mr. Reynolds, who will find in Iowa a very promising field for his energy and many a place where he can pitch his Tent and find crowds of intelligent listeners. Iowa is one of the best of territories for the pioneer of freedom. Its broad and breezy prairies do not take to orthodoxy. They are too much like rolling ocean to be favorable to sectarian narrowness. The churches hav for the most part a dilapidated appearance—as if they suffered from alternate chills and fever. Leon, to which lively place I came from Ottumwa, was all agog with a revival when I arrived. The Christians heard that the Infidel was coming, and immediately sent to Chicago for a man to start the revival business, and it was in full operation on the night of my lecture. Two meetings were held in the churches. In spite of this, however, the Opera House was occupied to its utmost capacity. A good Christian met me in the afternoon and told me that the prayers of the faithful had been offered up for my conversion. I replied that I was perfectly willing to be converted if good and sufficient reasons were presented to my mind for such a change of opinion. In the evening a free platform was offered, but no one stepped forward to giv any evidence. Therefore I am an Infidel still. Mr. Remsburg has already lectured here, and arrangements are being made for another, and perhaps a series of lectures during the summer. Mr. J. W. Long, Mr. Gammon, and others are interested in the movement. Without doubt a Secular Society will be formed here. The county has many Liberals, and although they are not rich they hav enthusiasm and courage. I met Mr. Lemmax, of Princeton, Mo., and he reports quite a number of Freethinkers in his vicinity, and if possible I shall lecture at Princeton on my return.

Still on the move—from Leon I went to Creston, where Mr. F. J. Green, of Nevinsville, had made arrangements for a lecture. Here also there is a strong Secular element. Leading business men are Liberals. For some years the Unitarians hav done good work. Mr. Derr, of Creston; Mr. Wick, of Murray, who came about thirty miles to attend the lecture; Mr. Geer, of Cromwell; Mr. F. J. Green, of Nevinsville, will make this part of Iowa good for Liberal progress. Mr. Green has already done some effectiv work. He engaged Mr. Remsburg for Nevinsville, but the Christians, who had control of the hall, by one vote refused, to let him hav it. But Mr. Green was not to be defeated, and he moved his forces to Cromwell, where a most successful meeting was held.

From Creston I went to Omaha, in the midst of driving snow. When I arrived there were several inches on the ground, and it looked as if I should hav no more than a corporal's guard at my lecture. There was no use to fret; nature is very impartial, and treats the Christian and Infidel alike. However, there was a good attendance, both afternoon and evening. Omaha is a point of very great importance. It could count a thousand Liberals if they were well organized. I was sorry not to be able to remain longer. There is an auxiliary Union here, but many difficulties hav been in the way. I know, however, that it will eventually prosper. I shall endeavor to lecture here again on my return, and reorganize the Liberal forces. Mr. Thomas Foreman, Mr. Higgins, Mr. Davis, Mr. Jacobson, author of "Bible Inquirer," and many others whom I met, are ready to "lend a hand." Mr. Foreman especially, who made arrangements for Mr. Jamieson's lectures, has done very effectual service. Mr. Jamieson's lectures at Omaha were quite successful. I find that he has been doing splendid work in this country, at Omaha, Creighton, Seward, and other places.

Rev. Mr. Copeland, of the Unitarian church, outside of the formality of prayer, to which even radical Unitarians cling with a wonderful fondness, as if somehow or other they could persuade the inexorable laws of nature to do a good turn—outside of this Mr. Copeland is a first-rate Liberal. He is my successor in the Unitarian church at Omaha. I left here about eight years ago for the breezy common of the universe. Even the mildest form of Christianity was to me a prison-house. Still I can't find much fault with so broad and genial a man as Copeland, and I hope for him success. In the real issues of the day for liberty and justice, he is thoroughly with us. I rather enjoyed going into the church where I used to preach, but in my heart how thankful I was that not even its gilded chains could fret my soul any more.

I am now at Creighton, Nebraska, a bright and lively place indeed. I feel quite at home. Although there are five churches here, the Liberals are really the commanding power. Mr. Quimby, aided by Mr. Jamieson, has done much to bring about this favorable position. I had a large audience last night at the Opera House notwithstanding the bad weather. I expect an increased number this evening. From here I go to Stanton, Seward, Plum Creek, on to Laramie City for April 11th, and Rock Springs, April 12th, and then I strike Utah and take the route as already announced, laid out for me by that indefatigable worker, William Reynolds, of Wanship, chairman of the executiv committee of Utah Territory. Those who desire lectures in Idaho, Montana, and Dakota will please address me at Wanship or Salt Lake City.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A New School.

Directly in the line of progressiv ideas is the new school just incorporated for this city. Its existence is principally due to the business tact and generous philanthropy of Courtlandt Palmer, the treasurer of the American Secular Union. Section 2 of the following Act (chapter 67 of the Laws of 1886) clearly defines its scope and purpose:

SECTION 1. Alexander S. Webb, F. A. P. Barnard, Charles F. Chandler, Abraham S. Hewitt, Parke Godwin, E. L. Youmans, R. Heber Newton, Francis B. Thurber, William Lloyd, Andrew Carnegie, Gustav Gottheil, and Courtlandt Palmer, and all other persons who may become members of the corporation, are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name of the Gramercy Park School and Tool-house Association, with perpetual succession, and power to use a common seal, and to alter the same at pleasure, and to sue and be sued, and to take and hold by grant, purchase, and devise, real and personal property to an amount not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars in value, for the purposes of said corporation, and to sell, convey, lease, and mortgage the same, or any part thereof, subject, however, to the laws of this state in relation to devises.

SECTION 2.—The purposes and objects of this corporation shall be to establish and conduct a school and tool-house for the instruction of children of both sexes, so as to combine thereby general and theoretical education in science, art, and literature, together with practical and technical instruction and manual and business training in the various trades, arts, and professions.

SECTION 3. The amount of the capital stock shall be fifty thousand dollars, to be paid for in money or property.

SECTION 4. The number of shares of which such capital stock shall consist shall be one thousand, of fifty dollars each.

SECTION 5. Said corporation shall carry on its operations in the city of New York, with the privilege of establishing and conducting branch schools of the same general character elsewhere.

SECTION 6. The number of trustees shall be five, and the following are the names of the trustees who shall manage its concerns for the first year, to wit: Benjamin S. Church, Robert H. Lamborn, Courtlandt Palmer, Walden Pell, and Rush C. Hawkins.

SECTION 7. Said corporation shall also possess the general powers and be subject to the restrictions and liabilities prescribed in chapter forty of the laws of eighteen hundred and forty-eight, and of the acts extending and amending the same.

It will be seen that the school proposes to be to youth what the kindergarten is to childhood—the successor of the latter institution, Mr. Palmer calls it, both being the natural outgrowth of the modern ideas which are gradually taking possession not only of the educational, but of all domains. The scheme of education of which this school and tool-house forms a part divides the learning period of the young into three stages, as set forth by Comte, but shortening each somewhat. The first stage of a child's life is the six or seven years of infancy, when the babe gradually acquires a knowledge of things around him by contact, very much as a calf learns by experience not to butt his head against a stone wall. From six or seven up to thirteen or fourteen the chief characteristic of the human animal is curiosity, and a natural propensity to pry into things. In successfully rearing a boy to the age of twelve or fourteen this school and tool-house plays an important part. In the first six or seven years the kindergarten is the method employed; in the second, the tool-house, in which he not only acquires knowledge, but also learns how to apply it. Mathematics applied becomes a pleasure when mathematics in the abstract is dull and uninteresting. The tool-house continues the work the kindergarten has begun, and the scholar is introduced into the mysteries of nearly all the trades. This education is therefore the best possible basis for those youths who must depend upon their own brain and hands for a living, fitting them as nothing else can for the hard practicalities of an unsentimental world.

In inaugurating this school, Mr. Palmer has done New York city a great service, and it is to be hoped that he will find substantial aid in maintaining it. As may be seen from the bill, the funds for the support of the school are to be obtained by the sale of stock. The enterprise is not a charity. The stock books are open at the office of Gilbert R. Hawes, 120 Broadway, one of the gentlemen interested, and who procured the passage of the act of incorporation. Mr. Hawes is also putting through the legislature a bill to establish an evening grammar school among the denizens of the East side of this town similar to the one in successful operation on the West side. Mr. Hawes is soliciting but not begging aid for the Gramercy Park School and Tool-house, and wealthy philanthropists can help the rising generation by calling upon him.

Christ as a Teacher of Hate.—Concluded.

Christ seemed to be intent upon this one point, so to impress his followers with such a sense of providential care that they would need no thought for to-morrow. "Ask the father what ye will in my name, and it shall be granted unto you." "Forsake all and follow me." Simple trust in him was the grand virtue. He enforced this practically when he fed five thousand people on two loaves and a few fishes, and also when he ordered his disciple to go and cast a hook into the sea, on which he would catch a fish; in his mouth he would find money with which to pay the taxes. These things were to impress his followers with the supreme sense of faith in him, and that faith would provide for them and at the same time save them. How absurd to tell us in the presence of his life, sayings, and teachings that he only meant that they should not hav undue anxiety about to-morrow. What treachery is this in this to this so-called divine teacher! What did he mean in his pointed prohibition when he said: "Be not like unto the gentiles?" They were doing the things which this prohibition covered. They were taking thought for to-morrow in food and drink. Can anything be more stupid than to charge this Christ with this moral depravity, saying what he did not mean? "Sell all you hav and giv to the poor." "Lay not up your treasures upon earth." "To him that would borrow of thee turn thou not away; lend without hope of return." "He that will lose his life shall find it, while he that will save his life shall lose it." What do these words mean if they do not convey to the mind the same thought, that of trust in God and not in forethought, as in prudential measures? He warns against human providence in the saying, "He that will save his life shall lose it." Intellectual dishonesty is seen in this forced construction put upon the words of the Christ, that there might be some kind of an apology for turning gentile. Is it not true that these professed Christians are in all things but name gentiles, for they do the things which the gentiles do, and they make a gentile of Christ? If they could only be induced to tell the truth, that would end the farce, and then we would see just what we see now, under a false name. If there is any intellectual dishonesty in this world, I would like to know where it is if it is not in these devotees of the Christian religion who swear by the Christ and at the same time crucify his words. Here is where we find the strength of Dr. Rexford, and others like him who are known in the churches through their extreme praises of the Christ and his gospel of love, and at the same time twist and torture his words out of all that is natural. Deprive Dr. Rexford of the use of his twisting and turning exegetical machine, and he is as weak as was Samson when shorn of his locks; but as long as it meets with success as a foraging and skirmishing operation around the commissary department of old orthodoxy, all is well. The scriptures which we hav introduced are all in harmony with the entire doctrins of Christ. But the important question now arises, How is it possible to find the products of industry in a scheme which fundamentally ignores industry? This is eminently true of the gospel of the Christ. "Take no thought for to-morrow" does not produce humanities or charities. It does not build asylums nor institutions of reform, or those that are in the interest of civilization. It has no school-houses, no institutions of learning, no art, no science, no improvements.

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy-laden, and I will giv you rest." Forsakng occupations of industry to follow the footsteps of an adventurer, or of a God, will not produce civilization, build railroads or churches. And the obvious reason why we see these things in connection with Christianity is because of the antichristian element, the potencies of human industry divorced from all that is divine or supernatural. For want of this obvious discrimination, we often hear those stupid devotees, doctors of divinity, talk about what Christianity has done in comparison with all else in the civilization of this world. Christianity has become gentile: it has lost all but its name, and this it would discard had it not lost the honesty of its founder. It has stolen the forbidden things of the Christ, which is the principal agency used in its propagandism. It has stolen the way and methods of the world to carry on its purposes. It has long since trampled in the dust all that once made it Christian. It is now of the world, and its devotees love the world and the things that are in the world, and they are busy in laying up their treasures on earth. In spite of the Christ who forbade this, they will not sell their treasures for any proffered mansions in the skies. They hav become like other men when shorn of their hypocrisy, which has fastened itself upon them as a result of their endeavor to serve two masters. They know that living up to the teachings of the Christ renders civilization impossible. What would become of the emporiums of fashion if those calling themselvs Christian should turn Christian? What would become of the Christian millionaire if he should turn Christian and sell all that he has and giv to the poor?

If the Christian ladies' phylacteries should be cut down so that they would come within the primitiv dimensions, where would our fashions go to? This all goes to show that Christianity is nothing but one huge system of premeditated hypocrisy. The Christ of Palestine is dead, and hangs a corpse in the grand cathedrals and splendid churches of to-day, and the worship therein offered is a sublime mockery. Its priestly devotees cannot be ignorant of this fact. It is treason against the intellectual life of the race. The antichristian element permits Christianity to hold up its head by its splendid suffrage, without which it would hav had dishonorable sepulture in the black, historical gestures of its own infamy. It is the lowest kind of uninformed civilized thought to assign humanities and charities to the influence of Christ's doctrin. Will Dr. Rexford please inform the world why this "gospel of love, with its unparalleled humanities and charities," so utterly fails to make itself known and felt in the land of its birth—in the land of infinit Gods, Christs, and Bibles? What can be the measure of this stupendous failure? Were there "chariots of iron in the mountain" which denied success to this divine gospel of love—this gospel of love driven out of the land of its birth, never more to enter there? This is one of the saddest chapters in the history of this gospel of love. What a shame in the presence of this impotence is a divine scheme to maintain that this gospel of love can produce humanities and charities, when it so utterly failed to make itself known and felt in its nativ land! But no doubt this failure is a part of this gospel of love, and all goes to show that failure is the common inheritance of the gods of all religions.

It has met with success only where it has fallen in with an antichristian civilization. In such an environment it will succeed, as any other religion would, and hence it is that Christianity exists by the suffrage of a civilization which it did not create, and it owes its existence to this civilization, and therefore it is evident that the boast of Dr. Rexford is extreme folly: "It has done more than Mr. Ingersoll and all of his fellow-skeptics hav done, or ever will do." In the line of begging, this is eminently true, and in making instruments of torture it is unparalleled. Hospitals and asylums which it controls are, as everyone knows, largely supported by the generosity of those whom it must damn. The support which these institutions receive comes from the human, and hence is antichristian. It is human providence, and not diviue. But this wise doctor tells us that "this is a gospel of love." "It is all love." "Love is the all in this divine scheme." "Love one another." "Love thy neighbor as thyself." "Love all mankind." What a senseless philosophy this is! Love is not the slave of command. It cannot be commanded. A command to "Love one another," "Love all men," "Love God," is profoundly insane. It is impossible. You might as well command a mother to hate the babe which she so fondly caresses, and for whom she would giv her life, as to command anyone to love, much less to command the loving of an enemy. Love and hate obey no one's command, they do not come within the provisions of such authority. A command to love God, whom we hav not seen, is the most consummate absurdity. We never love that which comes not within the provision of our senses. We know not of God; to love such is impossible. We can only love in the presence of sense perception, without which love or hate is excluded. We form ideals in the absence of sense perceptions, and these are what we love or hate, but not the real. But we are informed, at any rate, that Christ's doctrin is love by this eminent D.D. The same is true of Mohammed's gospel, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." "If I had not come and spoken unto you ye had not had sin." "These shall go away into everlasting punishment." "Ye hypocrits, ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" In a parable of the Christ in illustration of the kingdom of heaven, he takes a wedding feast. Those not coming that were invited, he ordered his servants to go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in. This being done, one was found without the wedding garment; he was bound hand and foot and cast out into outer darkness, he being thus for no fault of his, being compelled to enter the wedding feast, and then he was forced to submit to this cruel treatment. How can anyone call this a gospel of love without hazarding mental suicide? It is promised by one of his inspired apostles that the "Christ shall come with a flaming sword, taking vengeance of them that know him not." This is a gospel of love!

And then the endless punishment to which they are consigned who reject him thunders a negation to this false claim, a gospel of love. No, not in the last will and testament of the Christ can anyone for a moment believe that the gospel of Christ is a gospel of love without the most disgraceful perversions of the clear statements of the Christ. But this doctor opens our eyes once more when he impeaches his God. Hear what he says: "Jesus was combating the narrow sympathies of Judaism, which was a religion of hatred for all except a narrow circle in Palestine." This divine religion, the religion of God's chosen people, thus vilified—a religion of hate. This is the way this man of God talks about the father of his Christ. This is the hight of Christian audacity. What can surpass this, coming from the lips of priestly love? The best that God could do was to giv to his chosen people a gospel of hate. Well, doctor, it is all right; there is no hell, and hence Dr. Rexford can rest in quiet though he does condemn the father of the Christ. And still he persists in telling the people of the love of God. He is the pastor of the Church of our Father. We are not left without more of this deep logic which is so peculiar to the Christian minister. He says: "Staying with the folks at home is what made Luther an outcast; what imprisoned Galileo, burnt Bruno." This certainly is a new revelation. I hope that the doctor has not turned Mormon. History points to the fact that this church of Christ did these foul deeds. The church of the living God imprisoned Galileo, burnt Bruno and Servetus, and millions of others. The doctor's gospel of love did these bloody deeds, and it stands before the enlightened judgment of civilization condemned as the vilest of all criminals. To make the world indebted to Christianity for its civilization is to falsify all history and read it backwards. Had Christianity passed down unimproved there could hav been no philosophy, no science, or art; there could hav been no inventiv skill. There is nothing in Christianity to produce any of these things. None of these are Christian. The gospel of love, in the mind of its author and his disciples, had only a short work to do. It was to be done before that generation passed away. This is the obvious reason why Christ had no words for industries or improvements. "God will provide. The time of my return is so near you will only need to attend to the one thing needful. Be ye ready, for the son of man cometh in an hour when ye think not." This fact fully explains his marked indifference to all of the important things of this life. He was silent on the questions of law, statesmanship, medicin, science, philosophy, art, poetry, and literature. He founded no schools. He gave the world no treatis on any of the many absorbing interests which contemplated the good of the people. He said nothing of the moral power of home, but rather commanded desertion. He never wrote a word except some unknown words in the sand. He left no guide whatever, under his own signature, to which disputation might refer. No, no, all was left to a few ignorant fishermen who hav no historical existence. Yet Dr. Rexford tells us about Christ's gospel of love. If there is such a gospel it is an absurd one. But how does he know that he, Christ, ever left such a gospel? Ecclesiastical exegetical gymnastics is the source of his information. The numberless disputations which hav taken place over the divine authority evidently tell the truth, that his demonstration of the truth of this gospel of love came as we hav suggested. In all honesty, is it possible that the thoughtful clergy of this age are so stupid that they do not see that this entire scheme is purely a human invention, and a very poor one at that? Suppose that the world had acted as commanded by one of the loving disciples of Christ as to the method of obtaining wisdom. "If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God who giveth liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given." We see that this at once explains the silence of Christ upon the all-important question of education. What would hav been the schools, colleges, and universities of this, or any other age, if this had been the way to get an education? The following statement is legitimate. Had the gospel of Christ not been arrested in its development there would hav been no school-houses, no universities, nor any place of education anywhere under its reign. To speak of any growth, any improvement, any civilization, anywhere as a result of Christianity is to speak in measureless terms of folly. One of the fortunate things in the history of recent centuries is the total rejection of the Christian scheme practically. The devotees practically do not believe it as formulated by the master. Their unbelief is, in fact, one of the principal factors which keep the church in existence—that is, the Christian church so-called. The treason of Christian devotees is the real ground of Christian hope to-day. But the humiliating part is in this matchless hypocrisy in claimed fidelity to Christ while they crucify him. In the light of another statement made by one of his disciples, what kind of medical institutions would fill our civilization to-day if his statement had been adopted by the world? "If any are sick among you let him call for the elders of the church, let them anoint him and pray over him, and he shall recover." If this inspired authority was respected there would hav been no medical universities, no physiology, no surgery, no anatomy, no M.D.'s; nothing of this sort would be in existence. The elder, with his brush and grease-pot in hand, would hav done the work, assisted by prayers. This work being thus performed, the assurance is given he shall recover, and, a consequent result, the ruin of the undertakers' business. But our Christian devotees do not believe this. When they are sick they send at once for a physician, good, bad, or indifferent morally, to come and treat them, and never giv the elder, or his grease-pot, a thought. Surely these are the days of the unregenerate. Now, dear doctor, if you fail to see where the intellectual dishonesty comes in, read these sayings of the Christ, and then consider how you are forced to pervert his words before you can make out a case in the interest of Christ's gospel of love.

We must now consider the gospel of love in its humanities and its charities, which are "unparalleled anywhere else" in the light of what is fundamental in it from a moral point of view. We are often invited to consider this gospel of love in its unsurpassed moral excellences. I hav for many years been a student of this gospel of love, and if its morality is the basis of its claimed victories, I am at a loss to know in what sense this is true. This gospel really nowhere treats this question of morality at all. Its moral phase is only accidental. The law and testimony must decide this question. Its morality is virtueless. Is there anywhere in this gospel of love even an illusion to the value of virtue or morality? Hav we not for centuries been told that morality is useless as a savior? "Christ is the only salvation." Does the Christian devotee hope for a mansion in the skies upon the ground of virtue or morality, or because he has kept the moral law? Certainly not. The virtue by which he secures a through ticket is commercial. He believes in the author of this gospel of love, and is saved—unbelief will consign him to hell. If he obeys the master, then he has a mansion and a harp in heaven; if he does not he has the assurance that he is lost. Is there any moral justice in this, that because a man refuses a gift, a gratuity, therefore he incurs the penalty of perdition? This, to say the least, is immoral. Heaven is offered as a bribe, and if this fail, then the threat of hell comes in; and if these fail, then comes the execution—he is sent to hell. This gospel of love is founded upon commercial value and nothing more. Society in its evolution had arrived at nothing higher at that time. To act because it was right had not reached religious consciousness. All was commercial. Will it pay? It will pay to follow this Christ, for you hav a promise of the life that now is, and everlasting life hereafter. Virtue is in the market and has its price. To obey this gospel of love is heaven; not thus to do is hell. The fifth commandment illustrates the whole Christian ethics: "Honor thy father and thy mother." Because it is their due? No; this would be to do right because it is right. This will not do, but because potatoes and eggs hav a value in the market. "Honor because you may liv long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Everywhere in the gospel of love this principle prevails. Take the case of the rich man and the beggar. The first goes to hell, and the latter to heaven. One would naturally ask why this discrimination? Any sane one in the contemplation of this marked difference would say that there must hav been reasons founded in the eternal fitness of things. The wickedness of the first must hav been measureless, and the latter the incarnation of all virtue; but we will allow Father Abraham to explain this matter. A Christian should not for a moment hesitate to take his explanation. Well, here it is: "Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime received good things. Likewise Lazarus received evil things; now he is comforted, while thou art tormented."

In these words of Father Abraham there is not a shadow of sin in any form charged against this rich man now tormented in hell fire, no charge of immorality at all. Why, then, is he thus punished? The answer comes from heaven, and it must be the true answer. Listen while heaven justifies the "ways of God to men:" "He in this life received good things." And this is the reason why he is in hell "lifting up his eyes in torment," and asks for a drop of water to cool his burning tongue. So we see that this gospel of love sends men to hell, not because they are immoral, but because they "receive good things." What were these good things which this rich man received in his age in comparison with the good things that fall to the lot of the average Christian of to-day, to say nothing of our wealthy and fashionable Christians? If this rich man was sent to hell for the good things which fell to his lot, how many times must the present followers of Christ be sent to hell for their good things, which are ten to one of his! But why send this beggar to heaven? Because he was moral? No, not at all, but because he received evil things. It is evident that morality is not a factor in the contract in the admission of a devotee to heaven, and it is also evident that immorality is not a factor in consignment to hell. The sayings of the Christ do not honor morality. Hear him: "He that smiteth thee on the right cheek turn to him the other also." "He that compels thee to go one mile go two." "He that will sue thee at the law and take away thy coat giv him thy cloak also." "He that would borrow of thee turn thou not away—lend without hope of return." All of these would tend to encourage immorality. "Resist not evil" is the secret of crime. These cranky rules are not moral, even if they are not immoral. They are simply foolish. Human society would be impossible, regulated upon this plan. We should resist all forms of encroachment upon individual and society rights. The unresisting and the meek do not move the world to higher virtues or more exact morality. Those who do right because it is right scorn heaven coming as a bribe, and hell defy coming as a threat. Herein is the strength of human society. The yea, yea, nay, nay, loving your enemies, hav ever been powerless in the accomplishment of good in any age of this world. Mr. Rexford's gospel of love is, as it ever has been, incompetent to do good. It is the antichristian element in the church that renders him possible. His gospel of love has made the bloodiest pages of all history; it has slaughtered more than all other religions. Christianity unbaptized by the world, acting in its divine capacity, has shown in one thing only inventiv skill; that is seen and only seen in instruments of torture. It invents hells here and hells hereafter. These things consign it to to the ranks of barbarism. Its historical gestures are draped in the bloody vestments of its slaughtered millions, and the bloody victim's blood of Calvary cannot atone for such black infamy as characterizes the past history of this church full of dead men's bones.

J. H. BURNHAM.

Authorship of the Declaration of Independence.

In Mr. Wakeman's address at the last celebration of Paine's birthday, he said that if Paine did not write he dictated the very phrases of the Declaration of Independence. The question of the authorship of the Declaration was little thought of until Jefferson became a candidate for president in 1800. About that time the Virginia Gazette insisted that it was drafted "by some anonymous person." Now Paine was anonymous all through the American Revolution. He did not publish himself as the author of "Common Sense" in 1776, and all the numbers of the "Crisis" were signed "Common Sense." When he returned to England in 1887, he published an anonymous pamphlet, entitled, "Prospects on the War." Four years later he came out openly as the author of "Rights of Man," and then some critic detected him as the author of the former work.

The earliest hint of Paine's authorship of the Declaration of Independence, so far as I hav been able to discover, was in the Newark Gazette, Oct. 5, 1802. I quote the paragraph with the editor's own italics and capitals:

It has long been supposed that Mr. Jefferson drew up the Declaration of Independence. This report was raised to further his election, and the philosopher has thought fit to countenance it. It was thought absolutely necessary to prove that he had done at least one good act in his life, and this was pitched upon. Mr. Jefferson was one of a committee of five, indeed, and after they had jointly drawn up the instrument it was given by Congress to a certain person, who, above all others, the Democrats would dislike to hear, had corrected the writings of Mr. Jefferson for revision and amendment, and it was from this person it received the ELEGANT DRESS it now appears in."

The statement that it was "jointly drawn up" by the committee we now know is not true. It was not until 1823 that Jefferson ventured to say, "I drew it." It is also untrue that "it was given by Congress to a certain person for revision and amendment." Jefferson in 1821 said that he was requested to draw the Declaration, and he adroitly added: "It was accordingly done, and being approved by them, I reported it to the House on the 28th of June, when it was read and ordered to lie on the table." Only a few slight amendments had been made in the committee by Franklin and Adams, but it underwent much change in the House, and was engrossed and printed exactly as it had passed the Congress.

The article in the Newark Gazette was published Oct. 5, 1802; twenty-five days later Paine landed in America from a national ship, having been brought over from France in the same by order of President Jefferson.

The earliest public and positiv assertion that Paine wrote the Declaration appeared in Cobbett's Register about 1835. The first proof ever adduced was in 1872, in "Junius Unmasked," whose author never heard that anyone else ever suspected it. The first knowledge I had of the discovery was about January 3, 1872, when Joel Moody, of Kansas, was introduced to me. His book was already in stereotype, and on Sunday, January 21st, exactly one hundred years after the date of the last letter of Junius, I announced the discovery at a meeting of about forty persons, at the same time holding in my hand the first printed copy of the book. Mr. Moody was not present; he remained three months in Washington and desired for a time to remain unknown. Hence the authorship was generally ascribed to me. I hav never claimed it, but I hav made several further discoveries of Paine's secret work.

Dead.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: John Canavan, a member of the Albany Secular Society, and a stanch Liberal, died March 24th, after a brief illness. Always willing to do his share in helping to spread Liberalism, he will be missed by his co-workers in the Liberal cause.

Yours respectfully, C. HERBERT LUCK,
Secretary Albany Secular Society.

An Impostor.

We are glad to note that our warm-hearted and energetic Greenback friend, Robert Blissert, the well-known tailor at 852 Broadway, has been elected chairman of the New York Central Labor Union. This combination of labor, or of those who liv by labor, can within one year carry this city and state and elect candidates of its own nomination, entirely disregarding either of the old parties, if it wishes to.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The foregoing appeared in last week's Pomeroy's Democrat, and is remarkably false. And, while it pains me to think the little lie should hav had much currency, it givs me great pleasure to hav thus an opportunity to bate the blare of this noisy trumpet. This blizzardy Blissert has had no official connection, in any capacity, with the Central Labor Union for more than two years; and, although he goes spouting to the lyceums and clubs about the labor movement, I know not a soul in any union whom this "energetic Greenback friend" of "Brick" really represents. He has no more standing before the unions of this city than Ben Butler or Jake Sharp, and the sooner people who now look upon him as a leader know the truth the better it will be for all hands. If I could hav my notion adopted, the Central Labor Union of New York would pass and hav published a vote of repudiation of this two-faced tailor and a few of his colleagues among the soi-disant reformers who go about doing so much damage, when taken as samples of our stock.

At least, let me assure your readers who may hav seen this item that Blissert is not a member of the Central Labor Union; that we elect a chairman every Sunday for that day only; and that we rigidly exclude from our deliberations every topic that might tend to divert our attention from the pressing industrial needs of the hour to politics of any kind.

Yours respectfully, J. N. BOGERT,
Trustee Central Labor Union.

New York, March 29, 1886.

A Letter from Chicago.

Putnam's precursor was a violent rain storm, which, while on my way to welcome him to the western metropolis on Saturday evening, set me to speculating whether or no an orthodox conspiracy had not been hatched up with the weather clerk, for everything wore a most woful frown, never relaxing until too late to benefit Liberalism. *Sun*day was a misnomer; it was dreary enough for the most approved Presbyterian Sabbath, for Old Sol had little chance to penetrate the dense clouds emitting melting snow, making the slushy streets a misery to pedestrians.

Our Union has engaged a new hall in the same building as the old one, and its furnishing combines comfort and beauty. Besides the main hall, there are reception rooms, a banquet hall, work rooms—in fact, all the modern conveniences, and a sable attendant thrown in. The ante-rooms were hurriedly furnished, as it was the intention of the Union to hav given the secretary a rousing reception, but his engagements would not permit.

Sunday afternoon the storm was particularly severe, and largely prevented attendance at the dedication or consecration of the Secular Hall, on which auspicious occasion the visit of Secretary Putnam was quite opportune, as well as the theme of his discourse, "The New Heaven and Earth." All present were ennobled by the mental elevation attained where a true rationalist pleads for an idealization of this weary, humdrum life, and its ceasless round of ignorance, injustice, and wrong, and tries to point how to bring it in conformity with science and reason, so that this world—the Christians' vale of tears—may bloom with bright images of human happiness and illustrious thoughts, which shall put an end to social anarchy, and inaugurate on earth the new heaven—a heaven where with improved manhood and associations we shall all liv to love and enjoy each other's happiness.

Having been struck by the literary beauty of Putnam's "Glory of Infidelity," given at the Cleveland Congress, we selected that as his evening lecture, and as the storm had somewhat diminished, a large audience was present. I believe I express the unanimous sentiment of our society when I say that for a lecture of its character it has never been surpassed, and seldom equaled, on our platform—a platform famous for the talent it affords.

A true lover of Liberalism—who loves the principle for itself—loves also its finest examples, and delights to contemplate the moral heroism of those who hav bequeathed to us the mental liberty which it is our duty, so far as in us lies, to make universal. When greatness—in the field of either physical, moral or mental heroism—ceases to be an abstraction, when it becomes embodied in human conduct and character, we are compelled to indulge in feelings of gratitude and admiration. This is the greatest and grandest impulse which seizes the human mind. "The Glory of Infidelity" is the adoration of this enthusiasm; it fairly bristles with good things, and each sentence is an epigrammatic secular sermon. Putnam is the very embodiment of whole-souled sincerity.

Our Union has had a good many financial claims upon it this winter, and I, as its treasurer, feel under obligation to the members for generous assistance. Thos. Galpin and G. W. Reickweld each handed me a "V" on the night of Putnam's lecture, and A. C. Berg, U. C. Dahl, and Frank Smead hav often given evidence that they are Liberals. Dr. E. S. McLeod has left our city for the West, and the best wishes of our society go with him, for he was one of the most generous and genial gentlemen we hav ever had.

E. A. STEVENS.

P. S.—Hav just received a private note from my friend Gen. M. M. Trumbull, than whom there is no more competent authority, who was present Sunday evening. He says in reference to Putnam's lecture on "The Glory of Infidelity:"

"FRIEND STEVENS: I can say that it was a very eloquent and inspiring production, full of noble sentiments, and the highest moral instruction. Very sincerely yours,
"M. M. TRUMBULL."

Prayer.

We make haste to chronicle the first instance known of any benefit accruing from the habit of praying. The incident occurred in the city, and will be valuable as a text for our ministers, though perhaps the fact that the benefit was conferred upon one who denies Christ will dull the point of their sermons.

It is the custom of one Bernard Polak, a denizen of Catharine street, to rise every morning at three o'clock for the purpose of visiting a synagog to say his prayers and read the Mosaic law. Just as he was getting out of bed one day last week, a man smashed in his window and leaped into the room. Early rising has made Mr. Polak peculiarly vigorous. Although the intruder was a powerful man, Mr. Polak soon subdued him and handed him over to the police, after which he went to the synagog, read the law, and prayed.

As a religious journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot allow this proof of the efficacy of prayer to go unheralded. The benefit in this case was threefold. 1. The habit of getting up to pray at three o'clock in the morning enabled Mr. Polak to be out of bed to receive the visitor at an hour when non-praying people are sleeping the soundest. 2. The early rising on the part of Mr. Polak presupposes also early retiring. Early retiring prevents dissipation, since worldly revelers choose the hours of night for their orgies. 3. Early retiring and early rising hav made Mr. Polak a healthy and hale old man, and given him the muscle necessary to overcome bold and bad marauders. Hence it follows that the habit of prayer is threefold in the nature of its benefits, and we respectfully submit the foregoing case to Professor John Tyndall as an answer to his challenge to the churches to show the efficacy of prayer.

But on the other hand it is also our duty to protest against prayer. As we hav seen, prayer may be beneficial under certain combinations of circumstances, but there are other combinations in which it not only is not beneficial but is a positiv nuisance. As a burglar alarm it may be all very well; as a means of working off a stump speech in the House of Representativs it is to be discountenanced.

Simultaneously with the praying Mr. Polak's appearance before the public, the chaplain of the lower house of Congress has brought the fact of his existence into view. He has begun a series of prayers especially designed to apprise the Almighty of his views upon various topics, and to seek that powerful shade's help to enforce them. One day our chaplain brings up for the Almighty's consideration the reprehensible practice of shearing lambs in Wall street. "Rid the land," he implored, "of all gamesters, whether they gamble with dice or cards, or chips, or with wheat, or stocks, or corn, or cotton. Deliver us from the influence and power of robbers, who, enticing their victims to boards of trade and stock exchanges and bucket shops, name their practices of plunder 'shearing the lambs.'" The next day this cabinet officer of deity instructs his chief as to the labor question. He prayed that God might forbid the rich and prosperous from attempting to import and reproduce on our new soil the pomps and shows, the folly and fashions, the luxury and pride, of other climes, lest the giant Anarchy, blind through ignorance and rage, like sightless Samson, goaded to madness by oppression, should put forth his hairy strength and celebrate his self-murder in the ruins of his oppressors till chaos come again. As an indirect condemnation of the "philosophy" of our Boston friends, we think this is unfair, unless the Anarchists are invited to pray to the representativs, and allowed full opportunity to explain to the Almighty just what Anarchy is.

This method of stump speechifying is, moreover, open to other objections. This great and glorious nation pays the chaplain nine hundred dollars a session for his services, and the understanding is that for that sum he is to tell God how much superior this country is to any other, and to beseech him to confuse all our enemies. To reveal to him that the United States are sometimes torn by internal dissensions, and very far from being a perfect nation, is to invite divine reprobation; for, as Napoleon said, God is on the side of the strongest battalions in war. So is he with the nation that least needs him. In proof of this we hav only to refer to disrupted Poland, discontented Ireland, conquered and abused Madagascar, and other small nations preyed upon by the strong. Therefore to let the Almighty know that the United States has weak points is almost a direct appeal for him to withdraw his patronage.

With the newspaper criticisms that these kinds of prayer are silly and blasphemous, disgraceful to the House, and ought to be stopped, we hav no sympathy. So long as our representativs disobey the Constitution by paying some pious mountebank for praying, we do not think they can be disgraced by the quality of the service. And as blasphemy toward particular deities is only a question of geography, so blasphemy toward any country's God is only a matter of opinion. If there is any use in prayer at all, let us hav it practical. If this chaplain shall continue to make himself a praying nuisance until the members of the House recollect that Congress has no official business with religion, and dispense with his services, it will hav been, next to the case of Mr. Polak, the most fruitful instance of prayer known in this country.

The Progress of the Museum Business.

The Hagan bill to authorize further appropriations for the maintenance of the museums in Central Park, printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 27th, passed the Assembly, after a lengthy debate, on April 1st. It is a pleasure to find that only one New York city member opposed it, Mr. Lucius Lucullus Van Allen by name, and of the seventh New York assembly district by habitation. The reporter of the Sun says that "the flaps of his great shirt-collar took on the character of angels' pinions as he thundered against legalizing the breaking of the Sabbath." Mr. Van Allen read a list of names of clergymen and business men protesting against the opening of the museums on Sunday, but if the list was longer or more representativ than the names asking for the opening which the assemblymen read in the pamphlet laid upon their desks by the American Secular Union, the reporters hav evaded their duty by omitting to mention the fact. Another opponent of the bill was Mr. Erwin, of St. Lawrence county, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Erwin, the scoffing Sun reporter says, looks at Sunday from a North Woods standpoint. He said that he knew he should be called an old fogy and puritanical for opposing the bill, but he desired to remind the members that this same puritanical spirit had made this country what it is—a free land. The poor people who were alleged to be in sympathy with this move were the very people who would not make use of the institutions if they were opened. Nearly three-fourths of the beautiful things in the museums were contributed by Christian men and women, who would be certain to remove them if this bill became a law. Mr. Erwin has evidently been supplied with Mr. Jesup's pamphlet and had an interview with Bishop Doane. These arguments are very familiar. Mr. Platt, of Dutchess, wanted to amend the bill by substituting two evenings a week for Sundays. He said that in England in 1882 the question was brought up whether certain public institutions should be thrown open on the Sabbath there. It was submitted to the societies of English workingmen. Against it were 2,412 of these societies and for it were only 62. By actual count, 6,500,000 persons visited these same institutions when they were subsequently opened two evenings in a week. Mr. Platt, who is an editor, has also read Mr. Jesup's pamphlet, but seems not to hav heard of the recent action of the English House of Lords.

The speakers in favor of the bill were Robert R. Hamilton, of the eleventh New York assembly district; J. A. Cantor, of the twenty-third district; James Haggerty, of the twentieth; Edward P. Hagan, of the sixteenth district; Daniel E. Finn, of the first district; J. P. Windolph, of the thirteenth district; and John B. Longley, of the tenth Brooklyn district. Mr. H. B. Hotchkiss, of the eleventh Brooklyn district, pointed out that the bill was not mandatory, but permitted the local authorities to increase the donations to the museums by $20,000 per year, provided the institutions are kept open on Sunday. The Board of Estimate and Apportionment is authorized to appropriate this sum if it sees fit. The bill passed by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ainsworth, James S. Allen, A. H. Baker, Barnes, Bates, Berry, Binder, Bowe, Brennan, J. A. Brown, Bruns, Buckley, Bush, Cantor, Chase, Cheney, Cole, Collins, Conlan, Connelly, Craft, Dalton, Demers, Dickson, Dickey, Dinkelspiel, Donald, Doyle, Farrell, Finn, Fitch, Freligh, Gallagher, Gardner, Giese, Gordon, Greene, Hagan, James Haggerty, Henry F. Haggerty, Hamilton, Hardin, Hall, Hayes, Hill, Hotchkiss, Howe, Kiernan, Knapp, Kraus, Lawlor, Leete, Lindsay, Longley, Mable, Maher, Manville, McCann, McCarthy, McClelland, McEwen, McLaughlin, McMahon, McManus, Newton, O'Brien, Porter, Power, Shea, Sheehan, Shelley, Charles Smith, Wafer, White, Windolph, Wolf—76.

NAYS.—Messrs. G. Allen, E. P. Babcock, J. Babcock, Batcheller, Cutler, Curtis, Davis, Decker, Edson, Erwin, Hadley, Hogeboom, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Kilby, Kruse, Parsons, Peart, Pierce, Platt, Rea, Robinson, Seaver, Sime, Clark E. Smith, R. H. Smith, Stacey, Tuck, Van Allen, Wood, the Speaker—31.

That the museum authorities are opposed to Sunday opening, and will do everything they can to prevent it, is shown by their opposition to this bill, which does not force them to open, but only removes one of the obstacles upon which they hav laid great stress—the expense. They evidently do not wish the obstacle removed, preferring that the museums shall suffer rather than that their religious hobbies shall be overridden. We trust, however, that the Senate will take as wise a view of the matter as has the Assembly, for with a reward of twenty thousand dollars in front of them the managers of the museums may be more amenable to reason.

The Tax Bill.

Bishop Doane of Albany, the same who told the New York Sabbath Committee that open museums on Sundays meant open factories as well, has come to the help of the Lord against the mighty to evade payment of taxes on his property. Tuesday, March 30th, Mr. Doane addressed the Assembly Committee on Ways and Means in antagonism to the bill we printed last week forcing impartial taxation upon all property alike.

However, the bishop did not hav things all his own way. Just as he had put into full view of the committee that noble right leg of his, covered with the Episcopalian silk stocking, Mr. J. J. McCabe, secretary of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, walked into the committee room armed with bundles of printed proofs, from this office, of the addresses of Messrs. Duryea, Wakeman, and Hawes, which he presented to each member of the committee. Mr. Doane then proceeded with his speech. He said the Freethinkers were undoubtedly behind the bill, which he considered cowardly, insolent, and illogical in its provisions. He was not opposed to Freethinkers. They had undoubtedly existed in all ages. But the bill is a blow at three great interests, education, Christian charity, and religion. As a great many hospitals and charitable institutions had been erected with the understanding that such property would be exempt from taxation, to impose taxation now would undoubtedly be unconstitutional. Bishop Doane knew that some of the one hundred and twenty places of worship in the northern part of the state, which he visited, would hav to be closed if this tax were imposed. He recognized in this measure a preparatory attack on the principles of the religion of Christ. It was on the same line with that impious legislation of France which prohibits the name of God to be written in a text book. The bishop then read a letter written by the late Governor Dix on a similar measure, in which that gentleman declared his belief that such a law was virtually a tax upon the worship of God. If the bill could be treated as he would prescribe, it should be reported adversely by the committee, killed in committee of whole of the Assembly, sent to the Senate and be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, reported adversely, killed in committee of the whole of the Senate, and lastly, sent to the governor and vetoed by him.

When Bishop Doane had concluded, Mr. McCabe had the floor. He pointed out to the committee that the bishop was in error in attributing the bill entirely to the Freethinkers. Freethinkers, said Mr. McCabe, had a bill of their own, but as they found that this bill would accomplish all the purposes they had in view in regard to taxing the churches, they had adopted this bill. Bishop Doane's claim of the moral and civilizing influence of the church is not supported by history or statistics. Mr. McCabe claimed that the moral and civilizing influence of the New York State Freethinkers' Association is much greater than that of the church, yet its members did not ask to hav property which the association might hold exempted on that account. Nor did they ask for appropriations from the state. Mr. McCabe said that the bishop's reference to French legislation was unwise, for that country was only trying to keep pace with the march of progress—it was a good example for this country to follow. People had been under the control of priests too long in every country. The struggles of the poor churches were no concern of those who did not believe in religious dogmas, but yet were taxed to support them. Governor Dix, whose letter the bishop read, was an interested party. His son presided over the richest Protestant church corporation in this country, Trinity church, New York. General Grant was at least as good a patriot, and it is now admitted that he was one of the greatest of America's sons, yet he was in favor of taxing church property. Grant said that if church property should increase in the future as in the past, in the year 1900 its value would be at least three billion dollars, and that confiscation would follow. Therefore, if the legislature and the church were opposed to taxing church property, taking General Grant as a prophet and a statesman Mr. McCabe personally was not interested in Mr. Duryea's bill. He could afford to hopefully wait for the year 1900. There were a great many people who would not drop many tears if property which had been obtained by illegitimate means should meet the fate predicted by General Grant.

Thus the matter rests with the committee. Whatever their report upon the bill may be, there is small chance of its passing this session. But if the supporters of the measure are persistent, the year will undoubtedly come when this bill or a similar one will grace the statute books of the Empire state.

A Medal for the Methodists.

Recently in comparing the tendency of the different Christian denominations in Canada to get into jail, we wrote: "The Presbyterians and Methodists are about equal, though the comparison would be more edifying if we knew the proportion each sect bears to the total population of the province." A friend from Kansas sends us the desired figures, as follows:

"The Roman Catholics, with 16 4-5 per cent of the population, furnish 37½ per cent of the criminals. The Church of England, 19 3-10 per cent of population, and 31 14-100 per cent of the criminals. Presbyterians, 22 per cent of the population, and 12 85-100 per cent of the criminals; and the Methodists, 33 13-100 per cent of the population, and 12 4-10 per cent of the criminals."

According to the percentages, therefore, the results would be as follows: Roman Catholics, 25,500 commitments; Church of England, 18,435; Presbyterian, 6,673; Methodists, 4,468.

This is good showing for the Methodists, and we congratulate Dr. Buckley upon the immunity from punishment of his Canadian brethren. We would willingly concede that the Methodists are more virtuous than the Presbyterians were it not so well known that the sin most affected by Methodists is one not the oftenest found out. The Presbyterians are robust rogues, the Methodists effeminate.

Liberalism in Pennsylvan a.

"Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake."

Messrs. Plack, Kline, and Kemp are members of the Altoona, Pa., Liberal League, and are all extensivly engaged in business. Like other business men, they occasionally become involved in lawsuits. Blair county is a Christian community, and some of the tricks resorted to by their legal enemies are worthy of Christians. Recently Mr. Kemp was sued by a Mr. Piper for the recovery of a wagon. That Mr. Kemp's cause was righteous is evidenced by the jury finding a verdict in his favor after being out less than half an hour. Mr. Kemp being known as an officer of the League, the plaintiff's attorney tried to use that fact to exclude Mr. Kemp's testimony, and probably would hav succeeded had not Mr. Kemp been too shrewd a polemicist to be caught. The following conversation between Mr. Kemp and the assistant counsel to Mr. Piper, and the court (Hon. Judge Dean) is interesting:

"John R. Kemp sworn to make true answers.

"By Mr. Baldridge: Do you believe in the existence of a God? A.: I thought this was a court of knowledge; the judge has told everybody here he don't want to know what people believe, but what they know.

"Q.: I want to ask you whether you believe in a God or not?

"By Mr. Nervine: Do you believe in a supreme ruler of the universe?

"By Mr. Baldridge: Do you believe in God? A.: Which one?

"Q.: In a God? A.: Every man has his god; mine is a power; I never saw it, to the best of my knowledge; I don't know anything about it; it is a supreme power; I don't believe in the Jew God, I don't believe in the Mohammedan God, nor I don't believe in the Christian God.

"By the Court: Do you believe in a state of future rewards and punishments? A.: Yes, sir.

"By the Court: I think he is a competent witness.

"By Mr. Woodcock: If you believe in future punishment, where do you believe it will be, in this world or hereafter? A.: I don't know where it will be; you say man is eternal; if so, he would hav to liv before he was born; an eternity with the end cut off wouldn't make an eternity.

"Q.: Do you believe in any hereafter at all? A.: Yes, sir.

"By Mr. Baldridge: Do you believe in the Bible? A.: Yes, sir; what is true.

"Q.: You don't accept the whole of the Bible as truth? A.: No, sir; I don't.

"Q.: Do you believe in a future state of rewards and punishments? A.: Yes, sir.

"Q.: Do you believe in the existence of a God who will punish you if you swear falsely? A.: I don't know anything about him."

"Q.: Do you believe in the existence of a God who will punish you if you swear falsely? A.: If you explain what you mean by the word 'God' I will tell you; every man has his own idea.

"Q.: Don't you know what I mean by the Christian God, the God of the Bible? A.: I don't need to believe that. I don't believe he was ever as wicked as the Bible purports him to be.

"By Mr. Nervine: Do you believe in a supreme power? A.: Yes, sir.

"Q.: That will punish and reward according to your acts here? A.: Yes. sir; if you do wrong you hav got to suffer the punishment.

"By the Court: I think the witness is competent.

"The witness was then sworn generally."

In the jury-room, one of the jurors brought up the question of Mr. Kemp's religious belief as affecting the credibility of his evidence, but the foreman sat down upon him by saying, "The jury might as well consider Mr. Kemp's political affiliations."

In the case of Mr. Plack the same inquisition was begun, counsel asking him if he believed in God. Mr. Plack retorted by asking, "Which one?" The court cut the matter short by ordering the counsel to take the evidence.

There are two morals in this, or rather one immoral and one moral. The immoral is that Christians who hav poor cases can now abandon the practice of abusing their opponent's attorney, and, instead, begin an inquisition into their opponent's religious beliefs. If the opponent is known to be a member of a Liberal League, and a good Christian jury can be obtained, the "religious racket" can be used to good effect. It is not always that juries are manly enough to ignore prejudices in arriving at their decisions. The moral is that there is much work to be done in Pennsylvania as elsewhere before human rights are attained. Why cannot the Pennsylvania State Secular Union take this grievance to Harrisburg? A little persistent and well-directed work will make an impression upon the judges of the state, even if the statutes discriminating against Atheists are not at once repealed.

Editorial Notes.

A short time ago we recorded the suspension of the Auckland, N. Z., Rationalist. The last mail from Australia brings several copies of the revived paper. We hope that this time it has come to stay, for it must, from its ability, do much good in New Zealand.

The appeal of Mr. Bailey's heirs for money for a tombstone for the grave of their father has been answered generously. A life-long Boston friend of Mr. Bailey's has signified his intention of putting up a monument at his own expense. If the generous friend is the one we suspect, it only adds another to a very long list of praiseworthy acts.

We hav forgotten to mention that the argument for opening the museums on Sunday is printed in neat pamphlet form for distribution wherever it will do good, and our friends in this city are requested to aid in the work. Copies will be supplied upon application at this office. We trust also that New Yorkers will feel inclined to do what they can toward paying the cost of printing. A little from each would make the cost of this Sunday opening movement inappreciable to any.

The Burlington Free Press devotes a whole column to the consideration of the health of country clergymen. The Free Press finds this trade to be much overworked, poorly paid, ill-fed, and not sufficiently appreciated. This state of affairs worries the country minister into a decline. The remedies the Free Press givs are to preach less, eat more, work less, and exercise more. Another remedy which did not suggest itself to the writer is one that we hesitatingly make public. It is that if the business of preaching does not agree with the minister he might get out of it. There are many honest channels in which he may be useful.

Last Friday was a beautiful spring day. The air was mellow and the rays of the sun shed a cheerful warmth over New York. Yet it seemed to be the forecast of a cold day for the clergy. One paper published on one page three separate indications of a drop in the ministerial mercury: "Dr. Bristor to be tried on Ida Downe's charges by a committee of his brethren." "A church trial for Pastor White. Two other clergymen mixed up in the Miss Robertson scandal to be tried also." "Another preacher gone wrong. A scandal involving the Rev. Dr. Philip Krohn, formerly of Troy." Just now, the poor preachers are in extraordinarily hard luck.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. Jamieson, after a two weeks' rest at home, is at lecture work again. March 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th, and 31st he was at Mapleton, Good Thunder, and Sterling Center, Minn. He may induce the Adventists to debate, but it is doubtful. April 6th, 7th, and 8th he is to lecture in Iroquois, Dakota, the first Freethought lectures they will hav had. The latter part of April he will giv five lectures in Alexandria, Minn. He will then proceed on a lecturing tour eastward. His address is Lake City, Minn.

Gopal Vinayak Joshee, a nativ of Bombay, Hindostan, will deliver two lectures under the auspices of Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, in Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday, April 11th, 1886, at 2:30 and 7:30 P.M. Afternoon subject, "Missionary Labor in India;" evening subject, "The Manners, Customs, and Religions of India." The public are invited. Mr. Joshee has given lectures to large audiences; but as he is too radical for the churches the Philadelphia League has opened its hall to him.

The opening of the new Secular Hall in Toronto appears to hav been been a great success. The place was crowded on Sunday, March 28th, to listen to Mr. Watts's first lecture of his present course in Canada. On March 30th and 31st Mr. Watts lectured in Listowel to good audiences. Next week he speaks as follows: Sunday, April 11th, Toronto; Monday and Tuesday, April 12th and 13th, Galt; Wednesday and Thursday, April 14 and 15, Ayr; Friday, April 16th, Woodstock; Sundays, April 18th and 25th, Toronto; Thursday and Friday, April 29th and 30th, Greenwich, Mass.; Sunday, May 2, afternoon and evening, Boston.

On Sunday, April 4th, Mr. Sereno Edwards Todd, of Orange, N. J., author and editor for twenty years past in New York city, lectured in Newark, N. J., in the hall 177 Halsey street, on the subject of "Science Better than Orthodoxy." Mr. Todd recently stated to the editor of The Truth Seeker that all his maternal relativs, clear back to the great Jonathan Edwards (who was Mr. Todd's great-great-grandfather), were Presbyterians, and he was bred, born, and educated in the Presbyterian faith, but is now a member of the Congregational church. The only difference between Presbyterians and Congregationalists, he states, is that when disciplin is to be exercised in the Presbyterian church over a recalcitrant member, the deacons, elders, and minister, take a rope and hang the offender; but in the Congregational church they giv the refractory son of Adam a rope, and let him hang himself. Mr. Todd has been a lecturer on scientific subjects for many years past, but now proposes to turn his efforts more particularly to Secularism and secular philosophy, as eminently superior to orthodoxy.

Letters from Friends.

MORRIS, MANITOBA, March 16, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $5.75, to be applied as directed in inclosed list. I am of the opinion of the majority of your correspondents, that THE TRUTH SEEKER is the very best Freethought paper published. I know I could not do without it. The illustrations speak to the minds of those that do not read, and I hav seen many orthodox Christians laugh in appreciation of the facts they portray so well. L. F. MATHÉ.

ELBA, OHIO, March 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find list of subscribers for your paper, and money order to pay for same. These are all thorough Liberals in belief, and will probably stick to your paper.

We hav a Methodist Episcopal church, ignorance, and indifference to contend with here, but hope the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER will awaken people to the issues, which is all that is necessary to spread our doctrins. If we had a few Liberal lectures delivered here it would do much good, and had we a hall or other suitable place we would hav them.

We like the illustrations very much. Success to you.

Yours truly, W. J. DUTTON.

BUTTE CITY, MON. TERR., March 18, E.M. 286.

MR. EDITOR: The books came in good condition. Thanks. The "Story Hour" was a pleasant surprise. Freethinkers ought to be proud that such a fine book can be produced by us. As to the contents, "Our Susie" is well worth the price.

H. Clay Luse don't like your pictures. His reasons as stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER, March 13th, seem to me flimsy. The pictures are favorably commented on by my Liberal friends and attract attention from Bible-believers.

Respectfully, FRED. COOKE.

PINEGROVE, PA., March 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I can't do without the best paper in the world, to my knowledge. I hav tried to get some new subscribers, but the times are so hard that it is impossible. There are a great many people here who favor Freethought as far as talk is concerned, but when it comes to helping the cause with money they are willing to be counted out. I wish Mr. Reynolds could come here. I think he could stir up the latent energies to an equality with the situation.

Yours truly, W. THOMPSON.

ORTONVILLE, MICH., March 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: H. Clay Luse, of Waynesburg, Pa., says you hav gone and spoilt THE TRUTH SEEKER with cartoons, and wants an expression from your readers on that subject. His idea to me is as lightning out of a clear sky. How could he think of such a thing? But there is no accounting for tastes, don't you see? For me, I think Mr. Luse's vote will stand nearly alone, believing as I do that almost everybody else's vote will be for them. The last, Uncle Sam bestowing the dollars at one door while the Irish Biddy is poking them out another into the pope's bag, is immense. The gifted Watson Heston is a prodigy, and his original designs and excellent skill are beyond all praise, while the Jonah-whale man is old persimmons! Just glorious!

Your old friend, DR. T. S. ANDREWS.

BIG BEND, KAN., March 15, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I again ask that my date of subscription be set back to January 1st instead of February 1st. The little amount that I sent over my subscription on a former occasion was credited all to me, making a month over. The little amount I only sent for the benefit of THE TRUTH SEEKER. You will please find stamps, thirty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. The illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER are the most stunning hit of the times. The one where the clericals are tooting their religious foghorns for appropriations is certainly the hardest hit I ever saw. Credit me with two years' subscription and send along the ANNUAL, and ever believe me, Yours for Freethought (not Liberalism),

S. M. TRAVIS, M.D.

MIDDLEBURY, IND., March 20, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.25, for which please renew my subscription to the greatest champion of Freethought published in the world, and send me a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1886.

I find great pleasure in reading the many good articles which come each week in the paper, and I will never do without it so long as I am able to raise the subscription price. The illustrations are immense. They convey the idea to many who would otherwise take no notice. I think Brother Blakeman's suggestion of an anniversary of the "event when Bennett drove the first wedge of Liberalism into the old cross-grained log of Christian superstition" is good. Such events should be kept sacred by Liberals. I feel particularly interested in the controversies of the writers of the "Letters from Friends" department. The benefit and information to be derived from this department is great indeed. Wishing you success in the glorious cause of Freethought, I am, Yours for the right, ISAAC IVINS.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., March 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Being desirous of acquiring reliable information on the question of planetary distances, and perceiving that some of your correspondents are willing to giv us such information as they hav on the subject, I will invite attention to some apparent discrepancies that I am unable to comprehend.

I will also invite attention to the fact that the Polar stars are always on a line with the center of our earth; the constelations, of which the seven stars and the milky-way are familiar to everybody, are nightly in view when our atmosphere is clear. How could that be possible unless they revolve around the sun in unison with our planet? How could they possibly revolve in unison or at all, unless the globular circle of expanded matter in which they are suspended revolves around the sun carrying those bodies around with it?

I hav assumed that the sun is at the center of our planetary system, but shall protest against that evident delusion. Mr. Higbie asserts that the central body is an electric battery. That has been my view for the last half century. Mr. Higbie being the first man I hav met who has the courage to indorse it, if the intelligence to comprehend it, I will congratulate him. Openings hav been observed in our sun through which vapor is passing always from the observer. Does vapor usually gravitate toward the center of the body in whose atmosphere it is generated? When I look at the flame of a lamp or gas-jet, though less than the sixteenth of an inch in thickness, its density obstructs my view of objects on the other side. Then how can human vision possibly penetrate a mass of densely illuminated atmosphere from thirty to forty miles in depth? J. A. TUTTLE.

GREELEY, COL., Feb. 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I want to ask R. G. Ingersoll if he iutends to continue advocating and supporting a financ al superstition that is a greater curse to civilization at the present day than all the theological superstitions he so manfully and ably denounces. I think the mistakes of Moses are slight compared to his at Cincinnati, June, 1876, when he said the people wanted a man for president who knew enough to know that money was not made by law but by labor. If he still believes that is true, he ought to giv us his reason for it. I certainly would like to know. In 1837 I ran away from home to go whaling, and hav wandered from 60 degrees north latitude to 60 degrees south, and over every degree of longitude on the earth's surface, yet I hav never been able to make money. I would like him to tell me how to do it. I am one of your old subscribers. SAM GRAHAM.

NEW ERA, MICH., March, 8, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar and fifty cents, which credit on TRUTH SEEKER account, also twenty-five cents for TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, also ten cents' worth of Putnam's "Ingersoll and Jesus." I would be glad to send you a donation to assist the late improvement in the paper, the object lessons. I hav made two enemies since the illustrations began; one was a Canuck Catholic, the other the Protestant type of bigot. Is it uot a little odd that so long as the illustrations show up the Catholic in his true colors, Mr. Protestant applauds, but reflex the picture and you make an enemy forthwith?

In a lyceum, lately, in which I took part, some of the speakers broadly charged Infidelity with all the crime now cursing humanity. When my turn came to speak I offered five dollars for the name of every bona fide Infidel found on the records of any penitentiary in the United States, and all I asked was that the person be known to be an utter disbeliever in Christian theology as a reforming power.

I hav it a little better now than I had it six or eight years ago. Then it was tar and feathers and threatened burnings, and no place to lecture in; but now the old Atheist can get a hall in either village if he chooses to pay for it. This taking it up and playing alone at all times and under all circumstances is quite a load in a country where everybody is a Christian, but my horizon is getting brighter.

Your well wisher, J. M. LOGAN.

PORTLAND, OR., March 18, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: My admiration for Mr. Putnam, and the work he has done and is doing, as presented in the issued of March 13th, is great. He is a smart, capable man, and just the one to push such work right through to a glorious triumph. May success and its attending blessings ever be his. is my wish. With the receipt of every TRUTH SEEKER my liking for it increases. It is a grand paper, and doing a noble work. The pictures are splendid, and a great addition to its attractivness. The cyclonic wave is already on the roll, and its roar, as it sweeps irresistibly on in its course, can now be heard by all men that will listen. I wish some lecturer could come out here and wake the people up, and organize Secular Unions.

Yours for the advancement of humanity, READER.

LEXINGTON, KY., March 28, E.M. 286.

MR. EDITOR: As so many of your readers hav expressed opinions concerning your illustrations, will you allow me a little space in your valuable columns to say that I approve most heartily of your new departure? The pictures are practical and effectiv, admirably executed and artistically got up, and as a school of instruction, to use a slang phrase, they "take the cake." They are original in design, and a valuable addition. They present our cause in a new but none the less attractiv light, and at the same time embrace all that can be said or written about the hypocrisy and falseness of the church. That they receive the highest encomiums from all quarters I am truly glad to note, but that a few should dislike them is also to be expected. H. Clay Luse is of the latter class. He seems to think that pictures mar the appearance of the paper and says it "must be a perverted taste that enjoys such caricature." Perhaps so, but I should think that those who are unable to appreciate art, even in its simplest forms, are incompetent to judge. Indeed, they display such little taste in their criticism as to require the aid of a powerful microscope to discover whether there was any "taste" displayed at all.

In the department of "Letters from Friends" appear many peculiar epistles from many peculiar people, but the most peculiar of all, perhaps, are those from the wise sage of Newport, Maine, Seward Mitchell. This modern Solomon appears to believe in the doctrin of the Anarchist, and like the two Boston gentlemen, Tucker and Appleton, is full of zeal for individual law and no government. He says in the last TRUTH SEEKER: "Those who liv for others will not be bound by, or conform to, man-made laws, but will be a law unto themselvs." This doctrin of self-law will never do, Mr. Mitchell. As the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER says, government is a necessary evil. As long as we hav those around us who are ready at any moment to invade and trample under foot the rights of others, just so long will "man-made laws" be of absolute necessity. The murderer, robber, thief, and seducer are a "law in themselvs," and do what in their eyes seems their right to do. Bah! Away with your so-called self-law! It is impracticable, and will not stand the test of reason, common sense, and experience.

Another thing, our wise philosopher asserts that money is the "one devil to be destroyed." Oh, my! But suppose we destroy this alleged devil, what is the result? Stagnation of business would set in, progress stop, and enterprise and improvement would come to an end. No one would hav the least ambition to work, or to better his condition, simply because there would be nothing with which to reward him for his toil, care, and trouble. Money, instead of being a devil, and man's worst enemy, is his best friend, I think. But admitting Mr. Mitchell's "important truth" to be a fact, I would ask him why he insists upon using what he considers a devil. Why not dispense with money altogether and work for the love of glory only? But it is useless to argue further with this wise Anarchistic philosopher, since he doesn't appear to be desirous of learning anything new, cupidus discendi.

At the end of his peculiar letter this peculiar man adds a peculiar postscript. He says that he has read the account of the arrest of saviors of the world in the ANNUAL, but that the name of the greatest of all, Seward Mitchell, is omitted. Now, Mr. Editor, this is a sad mistake on your part, for which you will doubtless go to sheol. It's a pity you failed to mention the "arrest" of this "savior" in your ANNUAL! His should hav been the first name in the list, for his "services for humanity" are too great to be so carelessly omitted. What say you, suppose you republish the ANNUAL and mention his "honored name," together with his "arrest?" I think it would be a good idea. D. B. COZINE.

NEW ALBANY, PA., March 10, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: My son, John Heverly, died the fourth of this month. He was thirty-five years of age. He had been sick a great deal through life, and bore his affliction very patiently, making no complaints. He died without a struggle. If he had been a member of some church the preachers would no doubt use it at revival meetings to make converts; but he was not a Christian, and they would rather he would hav left the world in distress that they might hav something out of which to make capital. I would not hav had a sermon preached if I could hav had my choice; but my wife belongs to the church, and I let her hav her way.

I get so tired of hearing people pray that I sometimes think I would rather hear a man swear just for a change. This is the most gospel-ridden place I was ever in. We hav three preachers and two churches, and yet our borough has only about four hundred souls all told.

Now, Mr. Editor, if you can read these few lines and publish them in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will be very thankful. The papers about here are so filled up with religious items that I presume they would feel themselvs disgraced by publishing the death of an Infidel. A. HEVERLY.

OXFORD, NOVA SCOTIA, Feb. 28, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Methinks Mr. Neilson, of St. Thomas, Ont., is rather rough on an anointed assistant of the almighty. For, if through Archie's repeating some stereotyped lies, the glory of a God of truth more abounds, why should he be judged a sinner? Parrots and priests get and repeat so much by rote, are so innocent of honest, intelligent thought, it seems almost unreasonable to ask them for a reason for the faith that is in them, or the balderdash that comes out of them. Archibald may not be what he seems; likely he is a member of the most holy sermon exchange association, and got that sermon per post and knew nothing whereof he spoke. Judging by the specimen presented, we had that same clerical stink-pot fired at us last fall by a callow cleric who, for the glory of God, and so much filthy lucre per annum, breaks the bread of life to a chosen few of Christ's sheep. Occasionally for a change from the ordinary innutritiv theological flap-doodle, he doses them with some second-hand scurrilious composition, such as has disagreed with Mr. Neilson's mental digestion. We promptly produced an Investigator of the previous week, printed and published at Paine Memorial Hall, Boston, showed it to some of his jubilant admirers, and asked for explanations, at the same time gratuitously giving them our opinion that their oracle was either an ignoramus or a liar. When God's mouthpiece was brought to book he mumbled something about Joe Cook being authority for the statements. They hav cheek enough for three rows of teeth who circulate untruths and take shelter under such shady authority, and are mendacious enough to assert that Moses and Munchausen are models of veracity. When blatant Christians boast of Christian liberality in building and maintaining hospitals for the sick, asylums for their insane, poorhouses for the poor, they are only proclaiming their own shame; their unbelief, Infidelity, hypocrisy. That is, if Christ is any authority amongst modern Christians; if he knew what he said or said what he meant. In the gospel according to Mark, xvi, 17, Christ says: "And these signs shall follow them that believe (in Christ). In my name shall they cast out devils. They shall take up serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them. They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover [good tests."] What do they want with such materialistic affairs as hospitals when genuin believers can cure all by simply laying on of hands? If they don't cure the sick by such a pleasant process, the obvious inference is that they can't because of their unbelief, and that they are head and tail howling hypocrits. And why should there now be any poor to provide for if Christ's commands were obeyed or his threats feared? "Sell all thou hast and giv to the poor." "From him that would ask of thee turn thou not away." "If any one ask thy cloak, giv him thy coat also." "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven." "Lay not up treasures upon earth." "Take no heed for the morrow," etc., etc. There is now plenty of wealth in the world; a superabundance of power to producc enough to make all comfortable. If it were a little more equitably distributed, if none now laid up treasures on earth superfluously, riches would go a begging without takers.

Though the church is not, as of old, a safe sanctuary for the vilest criminals, it is yet a refuge for clerical moral assassins, reputation thieves. An iniquitous law throws its ægis over the church and pulpit. Therein the professional priest is safe from correction, however grossly he lie, however vilely he may insinuate, however he may blast the lives of those who will not subject the intellect, bow the knee, or be subservient to him. Great Scott! What a travesty of justice, right, truth, to endow with such powers and privileges a class that has ever been the virulent foe of every new truth of science, of progress, of oppressed men; who do nothing useful, who produce nothing but discord; who toil not, except to spin some tough, immaterial yarns; who contribute nothing toward the expenses, nor risk their sacred carcases in defense of the state. It is strange that an almighty God, who created all things (including his pet man), and pronounced all good (yet man alone is vile), who controls all events, cannot control man; who foreordained whatsoever should come to pass, is thwarted by man, and gets mad about it, too; who, tireless, wheels the mighty orbs through space; whom the winds and waves obey; at whose nod the seasons come and go, trees, grass, grain, flowers, fruits grow, animals act according to the nature he endowed them with; yet he cannot fix his crowning handiwork, man, so he will go to his satisfaction. The Christian religion, his latest invention for improving the perverse worm, don't seem to reduce the pesky back-action worth a cent, and is not self-acting, like all his other mighty works. So he has to call tens of thousands of man-servants to come to his help against the mighty. He impresses them into his service, and expects they shall work with a single eye to his glory, yet he don't pay them for their work, but turns them loose on man, to wring their pay out of poor duped wretches, who sometimes hav enough to do to eke out a miserable existence, miserable sinners who hav to tighten their own belts whilst helping to increase the rotundity of belt of wallowers in blood, blazes, and brimstone. And the priests do liv on the fat of the land, with the help of God, women, pious knaves, and some questionable devices. Yet we are told God can do anything quicker than wink. So he could make fifty tons of gold eagles as easily as minister or missionary could a lie, and so foot his own bills. God's way may not be as men's ways; that is no reason why they should be meaner ways. Pay for all you get, and if possible pay as you go along, is a good, honest rule. God should not be dishonest, if only for appearance's sake.

God don't need any devil, so long as the multifarious levites are on earth. They can raise hell ad libitum. How long, common sense, how long will men desire to be humbugged, or submit to be traduced, wronged, robbed, by ravenous religious reptils? WM. GRAY.

ANOKEE, MINN., March 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since D. M. Bennett was stabbed with the dirk of Christianity. I hav not a half-dozen papers on hand, having mailed them to all parts of the United States where I thought they would be food for a well-balanced mind. I hav had some sent back. Then I thought of a passage in that book of myth: "The sin of ignorance is winked at."

Inclosed find $4.35 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, "Bible Morals," one ANNUAL, and "Religion of Humanity," by M. Babcock.

W. S. KING.

WENTWORTH, D. T., March 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to renew my passage for another voyage, and also one new subscriber. Could not think of doing without the old flagship. Professor Jamieson has just closed another course of six lectures here to crowded houses. We threw out challenges on every side, but our Christian friends lost again the opportunity to demolish us. The arrant cowards can only stand in the fence corners and throw mud. The professor's small guns were brought to bear directly upon them on every occasion, and at times one of his solid shot would pierce them through and through. But all we could get in response was a little orthodox dirt in the shape of far off "what we could do if we had a mind to." They never get in the right frame of mind. We hav a start here now that all the orthodox creeds on earth can never stop. There is a strong talk of building a liberal hall here the ensuing summer. If we do we will hav a hold they can never shake off. Other towns around about us are beginning to see the necessity of doing something for the cause. The Christian bigots hav seen that their spleen will not kill us, and so they begin to respect us. We intend to hav a grove meeting some time in June next, and want to get about three speakers for the occasion. Professor Jamieson will probably be one of them. The people never tire of listening to him. The longer he talks the better pleased they seem to be. The bigots tried to drive me out of town last summer, but I seem to survive some of them, and hav very good health yet. The professor delivered three lectures at Madison, our county seat, while here, and although the Christians did all they could to defeat us, we had good houses. We went right among them, and hired a hall and gave them three lectures. It cut them terribly, but they had to take their medicin as dished out by the Infidel. It was a bitter pill.

I hav a great deal more to say, but do not want to take up too much of your space, as others can do more good than I can. Let me say to friend Jamieson, Again we thank you; and to the old TRUTH SEEKERS, Sail on to victory! With Brother Heston in the art gallery the ship is well armed.

Yours fraternally, L. W. HORTON.

KEOTA, IA., March 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $8 for my yearly subscription, two new subscribers, one TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL of 1886, one Remsburg's "Sabbath-Breaking," and Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses."

I am a prisoner of that terrible enemy, asthma. I hav been marching around the grave a good many years, and am well-drilled in dying; but when the swallows call again I may be able to be out some, and will undoubtedly drive some more subscribers to surrender to your gallery of pictures.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 20th I read a letter of the Rev. S. B. Hurlburt, that wonderful preacher who takes no pay for preaching (honor due to him as a teacher), stating that in the battle at Atlanta, while lying on the ground, he had a sort of spirit-warning to "get out there," and as he swung himself on his neighbor, Nelson St. John, Company G, 8th Iowa Infantry, a shot raked the full length where he had lain. Now, there is either a mistake by the printer or Comrade Hurlbut forgot his regiment. I hav served in Company F, 8th Iowa Infantry, and I know that that regiment was not at the battle of Atlanta. [It was a typographical error, which Brother Hurlbut has since corrected.—ED. T. S.] But to his spirit-warning. I guess that every soldier who comprehends the situation will hav minutes of such feelings (which may become the mother of panics), but brave boys will soon calm, and resolve to "hold that ditch." If a ball passed that instant when his emotion moved him on to St. John's back, it can only be an accident. Currents of thought may be carried by magnetic currents among the living. Although bullets are rather lively sometimes, I hav never seen them correspond with a brain before entering.

Thanks to Otto for his "Pessimism by an Optimist," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 27th. He is a Wettstein, indeed, allegorically, and Spiritualists will whet their quills on him for a time, but their weapons will remain dull. There is no mid-air depot between the ethereal light of science and the dark aisles of creed. The Agnostic says, "We do not know whether or not," and the Spiritualist, "We do know," yet his illusion of eternal, individual, conscious existence can not shake the Materialistic granit of truth.

Keep the ball rolling. CHARLES NAUMAN.

BRONSON, FLA., March 17, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4 to apply on subscription. THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a mental necessity with me, and I can no more do without it than I can do without my breakfast. Its illustrations hav greatly enhanced its value and interest to me, and I hav no doubt that all its readers agree with me on that point. The eye is easier reached than the ear, and its electric flashes upon the mind are far more vivid than telegrams from the ear. Hearing is understanding, but seeing is believing.

The mental atmosphere of this region is thick with superstition, on which priestcraft thrives and fattens and Liberalism languishes. Yet I can see that some progress has been made since I settled here five years ago. I pass THE TRUTH SEEKER round and several of my neighbors are becoming interested in it, particularly now that it is illustrated. I sometimes wonder that Liberalism is so slow of growth, but when I remember how long it took me to outgrow my early religious education I am no longer surprised. My eyes were first opened to the inconsistency and tyranny of the church and clergy forty years ago when I was pleading the rights of man on the antislavery platform in Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. Nearly all the churches shut their doors against me and I was obliged to speak in school-houses and town halls. Human rights could get no hearing in a house that had been educated to the worship of that prince of slaveholders and tyrants, the Christian's Bible God. The priests and levites of that period were too busy saving souls and getting a fat living for themselvs to take any notice of whipped and shackled bodies.

By comparing that time with the present, progress is plainly visible. Slavery has been crushed beneath the tread of an indignant people in their onward and upward march to a higher and grander civilization. The pioneers of that great civil revolution won also mental liberty for themselvs, and since slavery went down many of them hav labored to break the chains of religious superstition, and a harvest of Freethinkers has rewarded their noble efforts. Instead of retreating and hiding from public view Liberals are now moving upon the enemy's strongholds, and the enemy are now defending instead of assaulting. But the old soldiers who were my compeers of the "long, long ago" hav nearly all succumbed to our common but invincible enemy, Death, and soon, very soon, there will be none of us left to recount to younger minds the stirring incidents of our early struggles for freedom. A review of those days so stirs the blood of age and quickens every pulse that I sometimes yearn to again step upon freedom's platform and again let loose a tongue that has long been silent there. O. RICHARDSON.

VERSAILLES, IND., Feb. 28, 1886.

Mr. EDITOR: Our Mr. Remsburg, in one of his trips to Michigan, said: "The priests run the women, and the women run the church."

A young man from here, not a Catholic, loved a Catholic girl, and wished to marry her, but the girl had been raised and trained up as a Catholic, and refused to proceed with the courtship unless the priest was satisfied. The young man was then compelled to go to the priest and prepare himself to become a Catholic. He was placed upon a three weeks' course of Catechism, while he paid his board at the hotel. He was baptized and went to the confessional, and then his intended and himself promised the priest that their children should be strictly brought up in the Catholic faith. They received the host (a little square piece of bread), which they were told was the actual flesh of Christ, and after the priest was paid the two were married in the church.

Every truth seeker will see that the priest used the woman to gain the additional member, and the assurance of whatever children they may hav as additions to the church. This is a true bill, the facts having come under my own observation.

The pictures of THE TRUTH SEEKER are certainly good, but they fall far short of doing that infamous church full justice. Indeed, it is not in the power of pencil or pen to do it justice as it deserves. I am, however, glad to see there are more men and women through the country who are Infidels than I had dared to hope for a few years ago. The people are fast becoming emancipated from the church and the priest. In some families he is only tolerated as a necessary evil, and when the priest leaves they count their chickens.

Will you send me for the inclosed a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1885 and 1886? ADAM STOCKINGER.

VISALIA, March 18, 286.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed a copy of a letter sent by an absent father to a D.D. running a revival meeting near his home. It tells its own story:

"REV. SIR: I learn that my wife is the victim of a religious epidemic started and conducted by you at Three Rivers. Now I would most respectfully request you, as a gentleman, not to approach my children in the interest of him for whom you do business (Christ), and further, since there are over three hundred preachers now up before the civil courts, mostly for crimes against women, I most emphatically request you not to approach them at all. And I hope my request will be respected. But if not, if you should attempt to baptize or otherwise monkey with those girls, you will surely make of my wife a widow; of my children, orphans—the result of filling your hide so full of holes that it would not hold black-jack brush. T. J. CONLEY."

Some men take kindly to Christianity, others do not. The author of this letter evidently is one who does not.

SUBSCRIBER.

BURR OAK, MICH., March 29, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 20th "A. B. B." givs Mr. Wettstein a vigorous overhauling, showing the repulsivness of the latter's dogmatism.

The criticisms are just and timely, but there is one statement in "A. B. B.'s" article upon which light is required. He says: "What is called spirit, or mind, is but a form of matter, and among its infinit possibilities may there not be one that the thinking and remembering faculty which constitutes this personality?" etc. He says that the question of survival of personality after death is a scientific question, which is true, but does he hold that spirit and mind are identical?

I think he will find few among the believers in spirit life who claim this identity.

Will "A. B. B." please name one modern scientist who affirms that "mind is but a form of matter," and quote the arguments given to prove the truth of that affirmation?

Is "A. B. B." himself prepared to prove it? If so, he can bring relief to thousands of anxious hearts, and I think he can engage in no task that would be of more importance. Again, is it a fact that the thinking and remembering faculty "constitutes this personality?"

Is he prepared to prove this? If so, I hope we shall be enlightened on the points named.

In the same issue, on the next page (183), is a criticism of Miss Gardener, by E. A, Stevens. Mr. Stevens says that Miss Gardener's "particular claim for distinction consists in having been introduced by Colonel Ingersoll as a lecturer," etc., and in "the fact that our distinguished president has been amiable enough to write a preface to her book."

I think that the majority of Liberals will agree with Mr. Stevens that it would hav been better if Miss Gardener had stated frankly that the League had changed its name and that Colonel Ingersoll is its president, but surely, the above-quoted ungenerous and irrelevant remark might well hav been omitted.

Besides, is it true? If Miss Gardener's work merits distinction, the fact of the president's introduction and preface is of comparativly slight importance; if her work is unworthy, is not Mr. Stevens's remark rather a reflection on the colonel than an honor to Miss Gardener?

Let charity prevail in our counsels.

Mr. Editor, doubtless I ought to feel highly flattered to learn that "A Woman" had always considered me a "person of average good sense," etc., but truth constrains me to say that the judgment displayed by "A Woman" is far below the average, for either man or woman.

I did not say nor imply that because the Christian article was foolish it must hav been written by a woman. I had good reason to think that a woman wrote it, and I said just what I thought. I did not write to please "A Woman," "A Man," "A Society," nor anybody else, and "A Woman" may rest assured that I shall never retract a word.

What "A Woman" has considered, now considers, or may hereafter consider about me is a matter of supreme indifference to me.

The brassy but irrelevant remark that I hav never "been able to persuade" a lady to change her name may or may not be true, but I hav reason to feel profoundly thankful that I hav escaped a life union with one of the class represented by "A Woman." N. G. W.

Children's Corner.

Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Address to a Robin Redbreast,

SEEN ON THE GREENHOUSE ROOF IN ESCANABA, FEBRUARY 14, 1886.

Ah! robin redbreast, thou'rt far astray
In Escanaba this wintry day;
Where the cold of zero, and far below,
Envelops the world in ice and snow.

Art thou an explorer, ordered forth
To study the realms of the frozen north—
Some Kane or Greely of feathered tribes?
Your tales will awaken jeers and jibes,

When you report to the summer lands
What you beheld on these frozen sands;
How, under the snow in an icy cave
That managed a patch of summer to save,

You saw from your snowy perch above,
The tangled branches and vines you love,
With roses and blooms, and deep-green leaves,
As fair as the mildest summer weaves;

Tall ferns and mosses, and spreading palms,
And, when you tapped your request for alms,
How you sipped from the roof the overflow
Distilled from their homes beneath the snow.

But the honey bells of Abutilon,
And the leafy branches they hung upon,
With Fuchsias and Heliotropes, all and each
Were terribly, tauntingly, out of reach.

About you the howl of a winter storm;
Beneath your feet was a summer warm,
Where ripe, red cherries in clusters hung
(Solanum berries) to tempt your tongue;

And making though never so much ado,
Its icy top wouldn't let you through.
You could only look and wing away,
But liv to tell of the tale to-day.

Then chattering jay, and twittering wren,
And croaking ravens, like owlish men,
Will declare your story exceedingly nice,
About the summer patch trapped in ice,

But add as a caution, with vote of thanks,
"We've heard your story of northern pranks;
You mustn't expect we shall swallow such.
You're as foolish as man, and hav seen too much."

I hav also learned that a doubting race
Demand for themselvs the foremost place,
Offended if others dare to know
Of things they imagin can't be so,

But ever insisting their fancies crude
Mark the only course that should be pursued.
Yet I know that the message you will sing
To your mates in the far-off land of spring

Is every word and note of it true,
For I was within and looking at you.
Adieu, dear bird, good cheer of mine;
I remember you as my valentine.

Escanaba, Mich. Isaac A. Pool.

That Noisy Boy.

His name is Charley, and he goes about the house, clattering, clamping, dancing, whistling, and singing. He is a bright, manly little fellow, is Charley, with rosy cheeks, black eyes, and curly brown hair. He is a great skater, likes to play marbles, and sometimes runs away to kick foot-ball. His pockets—oh, you ought to see Charley's pockets! Strings, a jackknife, lead pencil, slate-pencil, bits of colored glass, shingle nails, a penknife with a broken blade, marbles, broken crayons, some crumpled pictures, parts of a puzzle, a dried frog's leg, a "lucky bone," some shells, a couple of fish-hooks, a mud turtle, a piece of gingerbread, and ever so many more articles are crammed and stuffed into that boy's pockets. He is always whittling; making boats, spoons, and rolling pins, and sometimes tries his knife on the chairs and table legs. He "talks back" sometimes when reasoned with, and jumps up and shrieks—such unearthly, boyish shrieks—equal to the shout of a wild Indian. He sings songs in the highest key, and once in a while will tell all he knows to visitors, thinking he is entertaining them charmingly, as he probably is.

Charley is not a goody-goody, Sunday-school boy; but, ranting, wrestling, tearing his pants, and kicking out his boots, he is just a hearty, healthy, harum-scarum Yankee boy, who will grow up into one of the best of men.

How do I know that? I'll tell you. He keeps his word every time. If Charley tells you he will do a thing, you can depend upon him. You can trust him. Charley stays in evenings, reading and asking the drollest questions imaginable. He is a bit saucy sometimes, but he is obedient and truthful. He loves his mother and father, and when spoken to he does not say, "Ya—as—guess so," but "Yes, sir," and "No, sir."

He teases his little sister; but, at the same time, he thinks there never was just such another sister quite as good as she. He has a good deal of self-respect, and is honorable. He is worthy of confidence, and by all these signs I know Charley will grow into a good and noble man. S. H. W.

A Turnip Story.

A farmer was once told that his turnip field had been robbed, and that the robbery had been committed by a poor, inoffensiv man, by the name of Palmer, who many of the people in the village said had taken away a wagon load of turnips.

Farmer Brown, much exasperated by the loss of his turnips, determined to prosecute poor Palmer with all the severity of the law. With this intention he went to Mollie Sanders, the washerwoman, who had been busy in spreading the report, to know the whole truth; but Mollie denied ever having said anything about a wagon load of turnips. It was but a cart-load that Palmer had taken, and Dame Hodson, the huckster, had told her so over and over again.

The farmer, hearing this, went to Dame Hodson, who said that Molly Sanders was always making things out worse than they really were, that Palmer had taken only a wheel-barrow load of turnips, and that she had her account from Jenkins, the tailor.

Away went the farmer to Jenkins, the tailor, who stoutly denied the account altogether; he had only told Dame Hodson that Palmer had pulled up several turnips, but how many he could not tell, for that he did not see himself, but was told it by Tom Slack the plowman.

Wondering where this would end, Farmer Brown next questioned Tom Slack, who, in his turn, declared he had never said a word about seeing Palmer pull up several turnips; he only said that he had heard say that Palmer had pulled up a turnip, and that Barnes, the barber, was the person who had told him about it.

The farmer, almost out of patience at this account, hurried on to Barnes, the barber, who wondered much that people should find pleasure in spreading idle tales which hav no truth! He assured the farmer all he had said about the matter, while he took off the beard of Tom Slack, was that, for all he knew, Palmer was as likely a man to pull up a turnip as any of his neighbors.

Games for the Children.

"Emperor of Morocco."—This is one of those games in which the art consists in preserving an immutable gravity under every provocation to laugh. In "The Emperor of Morocco" two of the players, generally one of each sex, advance with measured steps into the middle of the room, ceremoniously salute each other, and the following dialog takes place, the players being compelled to look one another full in the face.

First Player—The emperor of Morocco is dead.

Second Player—I'm very sorry for it.

First Player—He died of gout in his great left toe.

Second Player—I'm very sorry for it.

First Player—And all the court are to go into mourning, and wear black rings through their noses.

Second Player—I'm very sorry for it.

They then bow again and retire to their places, while another pair comes forward to go through the same impressiv dialog, and so on till the game has gone all around the circle, a forfeit being the penalty for the slightest approach to a giggle.

Shadow Buff.—A large sheet is stretched across one end of the room, and one of the party sits on a low stool between it and the light. He is to look right at the sheet, and neither sideways nor behind him. The other players then pass between the light and the seated person, disguising themselvs by action or clothing as much as they please, while he is to guess, by their shadows, who they are. When he guesses correctly the person whom he names must take his place.

The Mammoth Sneeze.—If there are enough people to take part, "the mammoth sneeze" will hav a laughable effect.

Divide the company into three divisions. The persons in the first division are to say when the signal is given, "Hish!" emphasizing the first "h;" the second division say "Osh!" The leader counts, "One, two, three," and at the last word the three divisions shout their syllables with all the force they can muster.

Quotation Party.—A pleasant entertainment for a few friends is called a "quotation party." When the invitations are given the request accompanies them that the recipient will come to the party with three quotations memorized. When these quotations are given the name of the author is to be given by any one of the company who can do so. The one who first guesses or givs the name receives a favor, usually a flower; if this is not practicable, a bit of narrow, bright ribbon that can be tied in the buttonhole is substituted.

7.—Answer to Amethyst prize charade by I. A. Pool in Truth Seeker of March 6th.

A pale dyspeptic, pressed for time
Wherein to leave his desk and dine,
Plain mush and milk might choose!
A light repast leaves room to take
Some tidbit for the stomach's sake.
Wilt hav it? Don't refuse!
Sweet, tender, juicy—shall it be
Fish, flesh, or fowl? Well, let me see,
Oh, now I hav it—neither one,
But a mushroom, and nicely done!

Impatient idling while 'tis brought,
A trembling mouse the cat has caught
Excites a thought of pain.
Then musing on the various ways
How one kind and another preys
He turns to sup again.
Waiter, how long—ah, here it is,
Vanish all gloomy thoughts at this!
This bottle? Waiter, when I dine
You know I never order wine!
He turns it round nor needs reply
As Mushroom Catsup meets his eye!

Correspondence.

Streator, Ill., Feb. 21, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav often thought of writing to you, but never hav got started until to-day. Papa takes The Truth Seeker and he likes it very much. I hav one sister and we like to read the Children's Corner. I am sixteen years old, and go to school every day.

The other day one of my schoolmates and myself were talking about the churches, and I told her I was growing up to be an Infidel. She said she was too, that her papa and mamma were very strong Infidels, and I said mine were too; she said her father took The Truth Seeker, and she loved to read the Children's Corner; she said she was going to write you some day. Her name is Ella Nelson.

I make out some of the puzzles, but never send them, but I always find them to be correct. I will send the ones I hav solved this week. Hoping my letter will be a pleasant one to you, I will close.

Yours truly, Katie Lansing.

Moody, Tex., March 14, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I will try to write, as I never hav written. My father and mother are both Liberals, and hav been ever since I can remember. They hav taken The Truth Seeker four years. I read the most of it. I think it is the best paper I ever read. There is a big Cambellite meeting going on about a mile from us. Parson Jones is the preacher; he has about twelve members, and has been holding his meetings about fifteen days. He got three or four grown members—all the rest were little children who could not hav told what they joined for if they were to be killed the next minute. The preacher says that Infidels hav no sense, and that they are liars and thieves, and all sorts of things like that. Ma was there the night that he preached that; she said that she was so disgusted that she could hardly listen to him. He said that the Infidels would come up to the preachers grinning like possums with their contradictions. After all they were not contradictions. I will close for this time. Excuse bad writing and spelling. Yours truly, E. L. Simmons.

Perrysville, March 13, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I read the letters in the Children's Corner of The Truth Seeker, and I thought I would write one, too. We are sorry for Cora M. Howard and her sisters. I am seven years old. I go to school every day. I am in the Third Reader. I hav a little brother; his name is Harry Humboldt. He is five years old, and goes to school sometimes with me. We hav a little dog—we call him Tip—and two cats. We call one Maggie and one Belcher. We hav four bantam chickens. We call one Susie, one Buff, one Pet, and one Charley. Grandma Beveridge gave me the "Story Hour" for a present. If this is good enough I would like to see it published in the Children's Corner.

From your little friend,

Effie Jane Pearce.

Sunlight, Neb., March 12, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I go to school every day. I am sick to-day. Papa went to town to-day, and mamma is sewing. I hav a bad cold. My little sister had the croup last night. My little brothers and sisters went to school. We hav been practicing our pieces, and I know mine all by heart. I see you spelled my wrong; you put m in the place of w. We are to hav an exhibition the last day of school. We hav lots of snow here, and it is thawing to-day. Yesterday I put my little sister Hattie on the sled, and turned the corner too quick, and she pitched off head first in the snow, and stuck straight up.

Well, I guess you will think I hav written too much. Good-by, my friend.

Yours, Estella Sowers.

Poetry.

My Cathedral.

Like two cathedral towers these stately pines
  Uplift their fretted summits tipped with cones;
  The arch beneath them is not built with stones,
Not Art but Nature traced these lovely lines,
And carved this graceful arabesque of vines;
  No organ but the wind here sighs and moans,
  No sepulcher conceals a martyr's bones,
No marble bishop on his tomb reclines.
Enter! the pavement, carpeted with leaves,
  Gives back a softened echo to thy tread?
  Listen! the choir is singing; all the birds
In leafy galleries beneath the eaves
  Are singing; listen! ere the sound be fled,
  And learn there may be worship without words.

—Longfellow.

What is "Orthodoxy?"

From the London Truthseeker.

An industrious American has taken the trouble to collect from authoritativ documents the chief Articles of Belief of "orthodox" churches. The result is somewhat curious, not a little melancholy, and eminently instructiv:

DECREES; FOREORDINATION; EVERLASTING DEATH. By the decrees of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestinated to everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death.—Constitution of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, second edition, published by authority of the General Assembly, 1846; or, Westminster Confession of Faith, chap. ii, sec. 3.

All who will be saved were the objects of God's eternal and electing love, and were given by an act of divine sovereignty to the son of God.—Art. xiv of Declaration of Faith of the Congregational Union of England and Wales.

THE FALL; ORIGINAL SIN; TOTAL DEPRAVITY. We believe, teach, and confess that original sin is no trivial corruption, but is so profound a corruption of human nature as to leave nothing sound, nothing uncorrupt in the body or soul of man, or in his mental or bodily powers.—Lutheran Confession of Faith, the Formula of Concord, art. i, sec. 3.

Our first parents, being seduced by the subtlety and temptation of Satan, sinned in eating the forbidden fruit; . . by this sin they fell from their original righteousness and communion with God, and so became dead in sin, and wholly defiled in all the faculties and parts of soul and body; . . and they being the root of all mankind, the guilt of this sin was imputed, and the same death in sin, and corrupted nature, conveyed to all their posterity, descending from them by ordinary generation. . . From this original corruption, whereby we are utterly indisposed, disabled, and made opposit to all good, and wholly inclined to all evil, do proceed all actual transgressions.—Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church, pp. 38–40.

GOD'S WRATH AND CURSE; AN ENDLESS HELL. All mankind by their fall lost communion with God, are under his wrath and curse, and so made liable to all the miseries in this life, to death itself, and to the pains of hell forever.—Westminster Shorter Catechism, Answer to Question 19.

The fall of the first man involved that of all his natural descendants; all men are consequently sinful by nature and are under the wrath of God.—Baptist Prize Catechism, 1866.

ETERNAL TORMENTS. The souls of the wicked are cast into hell, where they remain in torments. . . The wicked shall be cast into eternal torments.—Confession of Faith of the Presbyterian Church, pp. 161 and 165.

SMALL SINS. There is no sin so small but it deserves damnation.—The Westminster Confession, chap. xv, art. 4.

THE ATONEMENT. As sin cannot be pardoned without a sacrifice, Christ gave himself a sacrifice for the sins of the world, and thus made salvation possible for all men. He died for us, suffering in our stead.—Confession of the Free-will Baptists, chap. vii, 1868.

Christ's work of atonement consisted in his perfect obedience to the law of God, and in satisfying divine justice by suffering in the place of sinful men.—Baptist Prize Catechism, 1866, question 23.

A DEITY COMPOSED OF THREE PERSONS; BELIEF IN THIS NECESSARY TO SALVATION. Whosoever shall be saved, before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholic faith, which faith, except everyone do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly. And the Catholic faith is this: That we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity; neither confounding the persons nor dividing the substance. For there is one person of the Father, and another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost. . . So the Father is God and the Son is God and the Holy Ghost is God. . . He therefore who would be saved must think thus of Trinity.—Athanasian Creed.

BELIEF IN THE DEITY OF JESUS NECESSARY TO SALVATION. It is necessary to everlasting salvation that we also believe rightly the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the right faith is, that we believe and confess that the Lord Jesus Christ is God, . . God of the substance of the father. . . Perfect God, . . equal to the Father as touching his Godhead. . . This is the Catholic faith, which, except a man believe faithfully, he cannot be saved.—Athanasian Creed.

INFANTS SUFFER AND DIE BECAUSE ADAM FELL. Infants are a part of the human family, and their sufferings and death are to be accounted for on the ground of their being involved in the general moral ruin of the race.—The Auburn Declaration, 1837, sec. 5. [The highest doctrinal authority in the Presbyterian church of America.]

THE DEITY OF CHRIST; CHRIST DYING TO RECONCILE GOD TO MAN.—The Son, who is the word of the Father, is the very and eternal God, of one substance with the Father, . . who truly suffered, was crucified, dead, and buried, to reconcile the Father.—Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, chap. i, sec. 2.

REGENERATION. As man is a fallen and sinful being, he must be regenerated in order to obtain salvation. This change is an instantaneous renewal of the heart by the holy spirit.—Confession of the Free-Will Baptists, chap. xi, 1868.

AN INFALLIBLE BIBLE. We believe that the holy Bible was written by men divinely inspired, and is a perfect treasure of heavenly instruction; that it has God for its author, salvation for its end, and truth without any mixture of error for its matter.—The New Hampshire Baptist Confession, art. i, 1833. [This confession is more generally accepted than any other among Baptists in America.]

INFANTS LOST UNLESS REDEEMED BY THE BLOOD OF CHRIST AND REGENERATED BY THE HOLY GHOST. All infants, as well as adults, in order to be saved, need redemption by the blood of Christ and regeneration by the Holy Ghost.—Auburn Declaration, sec. 6.

RESURRECTION OF THE BODY. They (Congregational churches) believe that the bodies of the dead will be raised again.—Art. xix of Declaration of the Congregational Union of England and Wales.

CHRIST ASCENDED INTO HEAVEN, BODY, FLESH, AND BONES. Christ did truly rise from the dead, and took again his body, with flesh and bones, wherewith he ascended into heaven. Articles of Religion (art. 3) of the Reformed Episcopal Church of America. Adopted 1875.

Christ did truly rise from the dead, and took again his body, wherewith he ascended into heaven.—Methodist Articles of Religion, art. iii.

DOCTRIN OF ALL THE EVANGELICAL CHURCHES. The American Board of the Evangelical Alliance, which represents all the leading Evangelical churches of this country, adopted in 1867 as its doctrinal basis, among others, the following doctrins: The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the Fall. The justification of the sinner by faith alone. The resurrection of the body.

Catholicism in the City of Mexico.

A few days ago I stopped before the door of the chapel of the Third Order of San Francisco, in Cholula, to read a "religious announcement" posted thereon. It was to this effect: "In the drawing of the lottery of souls, which took place in this chapel last Thursday, the soul of Don Miguel Fulano drew the first prize. Funeral honors will be paid him in this chapel on Thursday of this week." Horrified, I asked for an explanation, and this is what I learned: In every church is an altar called the "altar of souls;" near it is a collection-box into which the faithful put their money. When a sufficient sum—from one to five hundred dollars—has been collected, the names of four or five poor people who hav died are shaken together, and the one whose name is first drawn obtains the first prize; that is, his soul is entitled to a solemn mass for the purpose of getting him out of purgatory!

Yesterday morning a grand requiem mass was sung for the repose of the soul of a wealthy lady who died two years ago. To everyone present was given a card containing prayers which could be applied in either one of two ways—to shorten one's own days in purgatory, or those of the lady whose funeral rites were in progress. "My Jesus, mercy!" shortens one's length of time in purgatory one hundred days for each time it is said—only one must indicate, before beginning to pray, whether it is for his own soul or that of the lady for whom mass is being said. "Sweet heart of Mary, be my refuge!" takes off three hundred days each time it is said; and "Merciful Jesus, giv me eternal rest!" takes off seven years.—Fannie C. Snow.

A Confucian to a Christian.

The following letter was written to the Portland Oregonian by a Chinaman in answer to an attack on his countrymen by a minister of the town. Judging by the dignified, if sorrowful, tone of the letter, Chan Hon Fan is better qualified to civilize the preachers than they are to do "missionary work" in China:

PORTLAND, ORE., Feb. 24, 1886.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE OREGONIAN, Sir: I was asked by many of my countrymen "whether any respectable, law-abiding citizen in this city has anything to do with the 'anti-Chinese movement' or not."

My answer was no; but on seeing a short article in the Oregonian of the 18th inst. in answer to Rev. E. Trumbull Lee, it led me to look for his article.

Having read over and over carefully the article of Mr. Lee, I am convinced that the sentiment of it is not only "calculated to make riot and bloodshed," but it also misrepresents a class of law-abiding citizens of this fair city. When Chinese riots occur in China, attempting to injure and annoy the foreign missionaries, the Chinese converts do their best to conceal and shelter them from harm until the power of the government can come and protect them. I never heard that the Chinese converts ever exposed their foreign missionaries or inflamed the rioters to injure them. But at such a time as this, when the Chinese are everywhere exposed to danger and annoyance, both in property and in life, what benefit can it be for Rev. E. Trumbull Lee to write such false things about the Chinese?

This is too mysterious even for those whom he termed the "almond-eyed, unclean, and immoral pagan Chinese" to comprehend. A man like him brag about "our better civilization" and glorious religion that the Chinese cannot compare with! Why not use his time and brain to write about what the meaning of the word civilization is, and how to liv to be called civilized people? Does civilization include the following words: "Be good to strangers?" Or he might preach a sermon on the "golden rule," tell what the savior said, that, "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you do ye even so to them," which was taught, though negativly, by our sage Confucius about 2,400 years ago, and not only preach it, but take pains to practice it himself. By so doing, I think the Chinese might be Christianized easier here than in their "own lands," because here they they hav a great deal more good teachings by example of good Christian people!

But if Mr. Trumbull Lee thinks the idea of Rev. William B. Lee, of Olympia, is right because he thinks that the "Chinese are far more likely to be made Christians in their own lands by our devoted missionaries there, than they are here in contact with the lowest orders of American society—gamblers, speculators, profane men aud women, and commercial and political scoundrels of every sort"—of course any man with common sense knows that it is not the fault of the Chinese that they are surrounded by the "lowest orders of American society;" and if such is the case how can the Chinese see the beauty and excellency of Christianity? For they are not fools nor idiots. The intelligent Chinamen are like any other class of sensible men. If anything comes to them that is contrary to their reason and observation, they are by no means willing to accept it. For this reason, and this alone, I want you, Rev. E. Trumbull Lee, and you, Rev. Wm. B. Lee, to know that you, being preachers of Christianity, and men that enjoy that "better civilization" in enlightened America, hav, by your unkind words, become great stumbling-blocks before a race of benighted souls whom Jesus came to save.

If some of the intelligent pagan Chinamen should take up Rev. E. Trumbull Lee's article and translate it into their own language and send it back to China to be circulated there among the Chinese, then you would find out what a hard time your "devoted missionaries" would hav there in Christianizing them.

I know that you do not care for this, because you are too good to be sent as a missionary to convert the "pagan Chinese," but this is a fact. Therefore, in the name of God and humanity, I entreat you, Rev. Mr. Lee, to not lower yourself by sympathizing with the lawless persons on the Chinese question, but let the true beauty and excellency of Christianity be more seen through your good sentiments and Christ-like example, and then the "pagan Chinese" can better comprehend and better appreciate, and may adopt, your "better civilization" and Christian religion, but not otherwise. Yet why should the Chinese go? For "God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth." We are here by the invitation of the United States government, and will be protected here by the stipulation of international treaty rights, as the American citizens are protected by our government in China. CHAN HON FAN.

Book Notice.

THE ORDER OF CREATION: The Conflict between Genesis and Geology. A Controversy between the Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Prof. T. H. Huxley, Prof. Max Müller, M. Réville, E. Lynn Linton. New York: The Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place. Pp. 178. Price 75 cents.

These essays, which attracted wide attention and were read with deep interest when they first appeared, collected and reprinted in a neat volume, are now in a form convenient for reference and suitable for the library. They are of great value to all who would know the latest word contributed by eminent writers to the discussion of the old question whether the order of Genesis and the order of geology are in harmony or in conflict, and other cognate subjects suggested by the controversy between Mr. Gladstone and Professor Huxley. We do not believe that the defenders of Genesis will care to assist in the circulation of this volume, although the religious press of the country hav quoted freely from Mr. Gladstone's article presented in the same volume with the replies and criticisms here reproduced.

They make a work which, so far as read by intelligent minds, must be effectiv in destroying the faith still surviving in the inspired and authoritativ character of the so-called Mosaic account of the creation.—Index.

Everybody Should Read it.

Through the courtesy of the Truth Seeker Company, of New York city, the Gazetteer is in possession of a handsomely bound copy of "The Order of Creation, the Conflict Between Genesis and Geology." This volume contains "Dawn of Creation and Worship," by W. E. Gladstone, in reply to certain strictures in "Prolegomena to the History of Religions," by Dr. Réville; a reply entitled, "The Interpreters of Genesis and the Interpreters of Nature," by the celebrated scientist, Prof. T. H. Huxley; a further reply to Mr. Gladstone's article, by F. Max Müller, written as a postscript to his last work, "Solar Myths;" a rejoinder by Mr. Gladstone to these articles of Professor Huxley and Professor Max Müller, which he entitled, "Proem to Genesis; a Plea for a Fair Trial;" "Dawn of Creation," an answer to Mr. Gladstone, by Albert Réville, D.D.; another article from the pen of Professor Huxley, entitled, "Mr. Gladstone and Genesis;" closing with "A Protest and a Plea," by Mrs. E. Lynn Lynton. No controversy of a religious character has attracted more attention than this since the celebrated discussion between Robert G. Ingersoll and Judge Black. The volume before us is a handsomely-printed book of 170 pages, and all these articles are given without comment, or even a preface. The reader is furnished with the learned arguments pro and con and is left free to decide as to the merits of the arguments presented without an attempt to bias opinion on the part of the publishers. The price of the book is 50 cents in paper covers, or 75 cents handsomely bound in muslin. It deserves a wide circulation.—Denison (Tex.) Sunday Gazetteer.

News of the Week.

SECRETARY MANNING is getting better.

THE law is making sad work among New York aldermen, and numerous arrests for corruption hav taken place, with more to follow.

"AN entertainment and hop, under the auspices of the congregation 'Gates of Prayer,'" was recently recorded as having taken place in Boston.

M. PASTEUR, the French chemist, has lost another patient whom he had inoculated for hydrophobia. The patient was a Russian mujik bitten by a wolf.

THE annual boat race between the Oxford and Cambridge university crews took place on the Thames river last Saturday. The Cambridge crew won by half a length.

GARRETT MAYBEE, one of the victims of Rugg, the negro who murdered Mrs. Maybee and her daughter in Brookville, L. I., and who almost killed Mr. Maybee, died on the 2d.

DURING the month of March 469 vessels of all kinds entered this port from foreign countries, of which 152 were American vessels and 209 British. The German flag was third on the list, with 35 arrivals.

WHILE he was offering prayer on Friday night of last week, in the First Methodist church, in Union Hill, N. Y., James Russell, a member of the congregation, fell back into his seat, and died of heart disease before a physician arrived. He was forty-eight years old.

JUDGE ALLEN, of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, has just decided that the bishop of a diocese is not liable for moneys deposited with a priest. The case was one of several growing out of the collapse of a Catholic society at Lawrence, by which depositors were swindled out of more than $200,000.

WILLIAM ACKERMAN, of Ackley, Ia., was a promising "boy preacher" until he got into a scrape with a girl and came to New York and tried to commit suicide. The doctors fixed him up, but he says he will never preach again. If he keeps his word, it must be acknowledged that adversity still has its sweet uses.

THIS time it is from Canada. The dispatch is dated April 2d and says: "The wife of Nathan Griffith, of Westchester, cut her husband's throat with a razor while he was asleep this morning. Her mind became unbalanced by religious excitement. She says she wanted to kill her husband and go preaching."

THE Rev. William Hammond, Freewill Baptist, at Franklin Falls, N. H., recently married a widow with $2,000 in the bank, induced her to let him draw out the money, and then decamped. He has been arrested and forced to disgorge, but his wife, who is worth $20,000, refuses to hav anything more to do with him.

THE Rev. Dr. Philip Krohn, of Abilene, Kan., and Miss Anna Staenhoeffer, of the same place, went to a hotel at Junction City one day last week, engaged a room, and prepared themselvs for rest. They were disturbed by the young man to whom Miss Staenhoeffer was engaged, and the minister was ejected and the girl carried home.

SEVERAL Israelites were arraigned last Sunday before a New York justice charged with keeping their places of business open on Sunday, and the justice discharged them, saying to the officer: "The statute is plain that these men hav a right to keep open on Sunday if they do not sell on Saturday. You can't expect them to keep two holy days in one week."

THE railroad strikes in the Southwest are still unsettled. There was a riot at Fort Worth, Tex., last Saturday, and a collision occurred between the strikers and the militia. Several men were dangerously wounded. The strike was at one time last week supposed to be settled, but the men refused to go to work unless they could be taken as a body. This the railroad refused to do, and is filling their places with other men.

AN arbitration bill has passed the House of Representativs at Washington. The bill provides that when any controversy arises between a railroad corporation and its employees in any state or territory, or the District of Columbia, the differences may be submitted to a board of arbitration of three members, one selected by the corporation, a second selected by the employees, and the third selected by the other two, the government to pay the expenses of the same.

Odds and Ends.

IT is now beginning to be understood that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still until he could wind up his Waterbury watch and set it by solar time.

A NEW YORK judge has decided that it is not a crime to be poor. This may be true, but certain investigations in New York show that in a great many cases it is a crime to be rich.

A SAN Francisco family recently engaged a young girl from the East who advertised that she had been "four years in her last place." The family subsequently learned that she would hav remained longer than four years in her last place if the governor had not pardoned her when he did.

TALMAGE did not preach yesterday, which was decidedly hard on our esteemed contemporaries who get advance-sheets of his sermons, and hav them in type ready to publish as soon as they are delivered in Brooklyn.—Pittsburgh Chronicle Telegraph.

NOW, suppose the wives of the Knights of Labor were to strike for fewer hours of labor and more wages! Their husbands would either hav to grant the demand or take their meals at a restaurant, to say nothing of sewing on their trousers buttons and darning their own hose.

"DON'T you think this story is a little hard to believe?" asked the Horse Editor. "What story?" queried the Snake Editor. "That a girl in Chicago is in the habit of sleeping five or six days at a time." "Oh, no, not at all strange; she is probably a saleslady in a store that doesn't advertise."

THE newspapers say that General Logan receives two hundred letters every day. Ha! as there are only twenty-six letters in the alphabet, it is evident that there is a good deal of tissue ballot in the general's mail. What ho! without there! An investigation committee for one, please. Hav it hot, and send it up right away.—Brooklyn Eagle.

THE historian doesn't know where this story had its actual origin, but it was "told for true" on a recent ocean voyage to enliven the company. A gentleman who had indulged quite too freely, and hadn't had the discovery made for him in season to get a carriage, was helped home by a very good Samaritan. He was very grateful in an exhilarated way, and asked his benefactor's name. "My name?" said the gentleman from Samaria. "Oh, I'm St. Paul." The inebriate steadied himself by a final effort, and looked dreamily at his departing friend. "I shay," said he, "St. Paul! Did you ever get any ansher to that damned long letter you wrote the Ephesians?"

"MARIA," said the preacher Saturday afternoon, after having read his sermon aloud to her, "what do you think of it? Hav I not portrayed the evils of Sunday newspapers in a way that must affect the congregation?" "Indeed you hav, John," was the reply. "I thought so," said the preacher. "I feel that in this sermon I hav fully demonstrated the iniquity of Sunday publications. I trust there will be a large congregation to-morrow. By the way, Maria, did you attend to mailing the notice of my sermon and its subject to all the newspapers so that it will appear in the morning?" She said she had attended to it.

"PLEASE, sir, will you help a poor woman with five children and a sick husband? Please, sir, we havn't tasted food in two days." "I'm sorry, my poor woman, very sorry; but I really can't do anything for you. You had better apply to the public charities. You see, we are sending all our money to the starving fishermen of Ballahoo, and we havn't a cent to spare."

HE FIRED ON TIME.

They engaged a new porter at the Lahr House. Eyerybody liked him, he was so cheerful, so obliging, and so rigorously and scrupulously exact in carrying out every order given him. On last Tuesday Mr. J. B. Johnson, the vice-president of the Omaha Chilled Plow Works, put up at the hotel. Mr. Johnson is a very dignified and polished gentleman, and extremely particular about his room and service. That evening a very extraordinary thing occurred. Some say it was about 9 o'clock; others place it as late as 10:30. At any rate, somewhere near that time Mr. Johnson was amazed to see the door of his room open and a man step in.

"Who the devil are you?" inquired Mr. Johnson.

"Oi am the porter," replied the stranger, deliberately removing his coat and rolling up his sleeves.

"Well, what is the meaning of this singular intrusion?" inquired Mr. Johnson.

Thomas did not reply. He spit upon his hands, executed a rapid and fantastic jig, and leaped suddenly upon the astonished guest.

"Help! Murder!" bellowed Mr. Johnson; "crazy man killing me!"

"Shut up, ye dhirty spalpeen!" exclaimed Thomas, obtaining a firm grip upon the bust of his trousers, and propelling him rapidly out of the room. "It's none of the loikes of ye that's wanted in a dacent house."

"But, my good man!" gasped Mr. Johnson, his words coming by excited jerks, "there is some mistake! Let me explain!"

"Niver a ward, ye hoodlum!" replied Thomas, rushing him toward the stairs; "we're onto ye! The house has had ye spotted."

The next instant the guests in the corridor were amazed to see two figures, one spluttering and kicking and the other grim and determined, shoot down the stair-case, plunge through the lobby, and disappear into the outer darkness. In a few moments Thomas returned panting and rolling down his sleeves.

"What in the name of heaven were you doing?" asked Mr. Weekly, the proprietor, when he recovered sufficiently from the shock to speak.

"I was firing that dhirty blackguard Johnson," replied Thomas.

"Firing him? Hold me, somebody! Who put such an infernal idea into your head?"

"Here she is," replied Thomas, with an injured air, holding the slate before the proprietor's eyes.

"By—the—great—horn—spoon," gasped Mr. Weekly, and swooned away.

This was what he read:

"No, 40: fire at 10:30."—Lafayette Comet.

Gems of Thought.

IF God wrote a letter or book to his children to giv them the information they needed, he should not mislead them by talking about the foundations, the pillars, the ends and corners of the earth, when it has nothing of the kind.—D. M. Bennett.

NATIONS, like individuals, hav their periods of youth, of manhood, and of decay. Religions are the same. The same inexorable destiny awaits them all. The gods created with the nations must perish with their creators. They were created by men, and, like men, they must pass away. The deities of one age are the bywords of the next. The religion of our day and country is no more exempt from the sneers of the future than others hav been. When India was supreme, Brahma sat upon the world's throne. When the scepter passed to Egypt, Isis and Osiris received the homage of mankind. Greece, with her fierce valor, swept to empire, and Zeus put on the purple of authority. The earth trembled with the tread of Rome's intrepid sons, and Jove grasped with mailed hand the thunderbolts of heaven. Rome fell, and Christians, from her territory, with the red sword of war, carved out the ruling nations of the world, and now Jehovah sits upon the old throne. Who will be his successor?—R. G. Ingersoll.

CHRISTIANS make a great deal of fuss about faith in a future life, and if one does not hav this faith, he is considered a bad person I do not know whether man livs after he dies out of this body. I do know that he livs here. I am not sure that I can do anything to make man happier beyond the grave; I know that I can help him now. Whether there be or be not another life after this does not affect our duties to mankind. When Thoreau was dying he was asked if he had faith in another world. "One world at a time," he said. That should be the motto of every man. Make this life better instead of living for another. We hav heard enough about our earthly existence being a season of probation, an opportunity to prove our character and qualify ourselvs for another state. I believe this life is to be lived for itself, and to be made good without reference to the future. We cannot do business in another world while living in this. I say help men all we can here, and, if we meet in another world, do the same there.—L. K. Washburn.

THE DELIGHTS OF LITERATURE:

OTHER recreations do not belong to all seasons nor to all ages nor to all places. These pursuits nourish our youth and delight our old age; they adorn our prosperity and giv a refuge and solace to our troubles. They charm us at home. They are not in our way when abroad. They go to bed with us. They travel about with us. They accompany us when we escape into the country.—Cicero.

WHILE we grant one origin to all religions, we cannot insist that all shall hav the same issue. So long as an opinion remains strongly rooted in the feelings, it gains rather than loses in stability by having a preponderating weight of argument against it. For, if it were accepted as a result of argument, the refutation of the argument might shake the solidity of the conviction; but when it rests solely on feeling, the worse it fares in argumentativ contest, the more persuaded its adherents are that their feelings must hav some deeper ground which the arguments do not reach, and while the feeling remains it is always throwing up fresh entrenchments of arguments to repair any breach made in the old.—J. S. Mill.

ON all hands of us there is the announcement audible enough, that the old empire of routine has ended; that to say a thing has long been is no reason for its continuing to be.—Carlyle.

TRUTH is the only Messiah. Reason has reclaimed the human family from barbarism, and will complete the work of redemption. If I speak of reason as the highest authority, I do not mean my reason or your reason; I mean reason itself, universal and eternal, in which and through which the human family is a unit, and God is revealed to man. Reason is the connecting link between God and man.—Rabbi Isaac M. Wise.

That we hav all of us our human heart.

Notes and Clippings.

A PRESBYTERIAN paper says that the number of Americans ruined by Chinese opium is greater than that of Chinamen "converted."

ACCORDING to the Jewish Messenger, there is "not a single synagog in this city founded by an American-born Israelite; not a single pulpit occupied by an American-born minister."

THE noisy and empty-headed preacher, named "Jo." Cook, has proclaimed war upon the Knights of Labor, who interfere, says John Swinton, with his mutton by their opposition to quackery.

THE representativs of the woman suffragists hav followed their remarkable letter to the pope with another to Mr. Gladstone, thanking that gentleman for his "glorious stand for justice, freedom, and peace in Ireland." The effusion was signed by Clemence S. Lozier, M.D., Hamilton Willcox, and Ida Louise Dildine.

THE Rev. Dr. Rust, of the Freedman's Aid Society, recently addressed the Newark, (N. J.) M. E. Conference on the work of his society. In giving some instances of the anxiety of young colored men to preach, he said that one young man, who was considered unsuited for preaching the gospel, said that he knew that he had been called to preach, because in a dream he had seen the letters "G. P. C.," and that meant "Go preach Christ." An old colored brother arose in the conference and said: "Young man, you no doubt saw the letters 'G. P. C.,' but you did not interpret them right. They meant for you to 'Go pick cotton,' or 'Go plough corn.'" This equals a well-known sculptor's interpretation of the Catholic monogram "I. H. S." which he holds stands for "Ignorance, Hypocrisy, and Superstition."

A DEVOUT but weary worshiper in St. Joseph's church, on Sixth avenue, fell from the gallery during a nap, smashed an image of St. Joseph, created a panic, and nearly laid an officiating priest up with nervous prostration. The moral, says the Mercury, against falling asleep in church is a little weakened by the fact that the man who took the tumble was not injured, whereas he ought naturally to hav broken his neck. Yet those who are inclined to grumble in his case should remember that if all who go to sleep in church were to break their necks the mortality among Christian people would amount to a first-class epidemic.

THE remains of Nelson M. Barlow, who died here recently, were buried in his nativ city, New Haven, on Tuesday. At his request, no religious services whatever were held, but his old friend, R. G. Bronson, read a paper in which were these words: "His mind was too broad to be occupied entirely with mundane subjects. It went out through space to the contemplation of eternal questions. He was not blind to the errors taught in the name of religion. He could sympathize with the troubles of others, and he was always ready to assist a man in distress. As to his companionship, it is said truly that a man may be known by the company he keeps. His mind's companions may be known from the following verses found in his pocket at the time of his death." Here the speaker read two poems, the burden of which was that self-approval was the only encomium a man should seek, and that good deeds were better than prayer.—Sun.

A METHODIST clergyman of St. Paul, Minn., recently expressed himself as follows: "I am so much better satisfied with this country than my old position in the East. There the members of my conference were so close and narrow-minded that it did not seem as though I drew a full spiritual breath during all the time I was there. Here the people are so much broader and so much more liberal-minded. Why, if I were to go into my old conference and enunciate the views I hold here I would be tried as a heretic. I tell you when our conference meets next year I believe it will be the most heretical conference in the United States. The ministers here are broad, liberal, and strong-minded, and do not hesitate to enunciate their views when called on."

HOSTILITY still characterizes the relations of the church and the government in France. One of the results of the last budget debate was the suppression of a large number of incumbents' stipends. Mgr. Freppel, bishop of Angers, who has a seat in the Chamber of Deputies, or lower house of the Parliament, feels especially indignant. Eighty-two incumbents of his diocese had been suppressed. At a recent meeting of the Chambers the bishop called upon the government to supply stipends for incumbents when recommended to do so by the local municipal councils. This was opposed by the Minister of Worship. The bishop became indignant, reproached the government with being unconciliatory, charged ministers with a purpose to destroy the Catholic church in France, and assured them that, if that was their purpose, "as well might a mouse attempt to swallow Mont Blanc." The comparison did not improve the situation, for the Chamber immediately, at the request of the government, voted by 369 to 175 the order of the day, pure and simple.

A PREECHER wich had been a wicked gambler fore he was a preecher, he seen a feller wich was a gambler, too, and he said, the preecher did: "Ile jest play cards with this pore mizable sinner and win ol his munny, and when he is busted maybe he will listen to the divine truth and be saved." So they played, and the preacher winned ol the feller's munny, every cent, and then he sed: "Now, see how wicked you hav been to lose yure munny, and yure whife and baby havn't got no bred for to eat." And the gambler he sed: "That's so," and he bust out cryin'. Then the preecher he sed: "Pore sinner, if you prommice me onto your onner to not play cards again Ile giv it all back, cos I'm a preecher." So the gambler he was a stonish, and he sed: "I never see such a good man; I prommice, yes, indeed, and haven bless you!" and he burst out cryin' agin, the gambler did. Then the preecher he giv him back ol his munny, and the feller he put it in his pocket, and wiped his eyes and blode his nose gratefle, and then he thot a wile, and pretty soon he coffed, and he sed to the preecher: "I feel mity mean taking back this hundred dollars from a man wich has rescewed me from card-playing; tell you what Ile do; you put a other hundred agin it, and weel toss up for the pile, heds tails, best two out of three." —San Francisco Argonaut.

Boston Metaphysics.

HOW TO THINK, HOW TO FORGET, HOW TO CURE A FEVER, HOW TO BE BURIED ALIVE AND DUG UP ALIVE, HOW WE SLIP OUT OF OUR BODIES BY NIGHT, HOW WE SLIP IN AGAIN BY DAY.

There are half a dozen schools of metaphysics in Boston. Most of them are private. They say they are learning unutterable things.

The Boston metaphysicians say that our thoughts are things as real as air, or gas, or electricity, or any unseen element. Where the bottom dropped out of the old system of metaphysics was in the unconscious assumption that our thoughts were myths or as near nothing as possible. The new system says that a thought and a stone, or a flower, hav in them the same elements, only those of the thought are infinitly refined. A man or woman is only a bundle of thoughts, and this bundle of thoughts uses the body as its instrument. It seems that for ages we've been under the wrong impression that what we saw of ourselvs or each other was all there was of us. Not so.

The Boston metaphysician says we havn't yet found out the art of thinking; that we don't think at all when we try to; that when we try to think we can't get an original idea at all, but only the same old ones going round and round in a circle; that our new thoughts always come when we don't try to think; that if we want bright, fresh thoughts we must set our minds in a certain attitude or condition to receive them, not exactly as we set a trap to catch a mouse, but something analogous; that when we try to think we are putting out a force to drive new idea from us; that when our minds are held passiv or when we don't try to think, the mind becomes the open trap for new idea, or in other words it's the magnet which attracts the thought, i.e., the real thing or element in the air. This is the reason why you can never remember a name you've temporarily forgotten when you try to, and why it always comes when you stop trying. So long as you tried you made of your mind a magnet which repelled or drove the memory of the name away; when you stopped trying the mind reversed itself into a magnet which attracted the remembrance of the name.

Boston metaphysics wipes out all disease and all necessity for pills, powders, and physicians. It says all disease commences in the mind or spirit, and must end or be cured in the mind or spirit, or it won't really be cured at all; that, though pills, powders, and plasters can cure, they only do so temporarily; that when any complaint is cured in the mind it is cured for good and all, and can never come again; that there are people even now living up to this principle who never take cold, no matter how wet their feet may get, or how many draughts they sit in; that if any interested person will study their colds, they will find they do not always catch cold from sitting in a draught, and do catch cold when they can giv no reason for it; that the real reason is, and they will acknowledge this when they see it, that the cold came when the body was from some cause weak and exhausted, and going back of this they'll remember that their minds were disturbed from some cause, and that this disturbance of the mind disturbed and weakened the body, and that, in short, this attempt to cure the body of any imaginable complaint, from a cold up to a cancer, without curing the mind first, is the putting of the cart before the horse. Doctor your mind, they say, and your mind will doctor your body. You can fret yourself into a fever. This proves the law. You've erected a frame of mind which weakened the body and brought on the fever. Fretting does weaken the body. A fever is nothing but the lack of strength in the body to throw off its dead matter through the closed skin pores. Lack of that strength closes the pores. The efforts of the internal force (the real self or spirit) to force this matter out sets the blood in rapid motion, causes some friction, and this friction causes the fever heat. When the real self is exhausted the blood ceases so rapidly to circulate. Hence the chill. It gathers new strength from without and starts in again. Hence more fever. Such is the metaphysical view of a fever. Change the state of mind that caused the fever, and you'll cure it in as many hours as it now takes days; and more, soon be beyond the power of fevers to affect you. The metaphysical view of our bodies is that they are about the smallest part of the real us. The real "I," or "you," he or she, as the case may be, is the unseen organization, the spirit. This is not wholly inside the body, and never was or is. It acts on and uses the body as its instrument. The more you put of your thought on any one thing, the more do you put of your real self on that thing. If you are lifting a heavy weight you put your thought, and with your thought your real self, in the arm that lifts. If you stand on one leg for any length of time your force, or strength, or spirit (all really the same), will be in that leg. There is, they say, no such thing as a mechanical or physical act apart from mental act. Every step you take in walking has to be planned in mind before it is taken. When mind or spirit is knocked out of the body there is no walk in that body. Every walking-match champion is, they say, unconsciously a metaphysician. That is, he works his racket through a mental and not a physical law. He does it by unconsciously calling more spirit or unseen vitalizing element to his body. That is, his spirit, while walking his body, has the power to draw to itself from the elements about it more power. So do we all. The body, they say, is not sustained or nourished altogether by the food we put in it. It is nourished in part by our unseen self—the spirit which draws strength from without. Your spirit, they say, leaves your body every night and wanders about. Sleep they call a self-induced mesmeric trance. In this state you slip out of your body, though tied still to it—go as far as you may—by a fine electric chord. It's not the body that is rested at all by putting it to bed. It's your spirit that is rested by getting its forces together. Every one of your thoughts represents a part of your spirit, your real self. When you send these thoughts in ten thousand different directions during the day you are actually sending your unseen self in so many directions. In this way you "scatter yourself." During sleep your spirit slowly pulls itself (its thoughts) together again. When it is so together it is strong. Then it awakes and again takes possession of the body. If you could so pull yourself together in half an hour, you would be as much rested as though you had slept four.

Some persons hav this faculty. One was the first Napoleon, the other is Ben Butler. It amounts simply to this: focusing all your thoughts to a center, say a spot on the wall, thereby making the mind a blank for a few minutes. In so doing you collect your scattered forces, i.e., thoughts. It rests the mind. To rest the mind is to rest the body. People are working while they think. Every thought, be it what it may, costs an outlay of force. People now need to know how to stop thinking as well as to think. There is an art almost unknown—the art of temporarily forgetting anything you want to forget. There is no sense or profit in remembering a trouble. This focusing the mind or spirit to a center is just what the mesmeric operator does to his subject. He puts a coin in his hand and tells him to look at it. When in so doing the subjects thoughts are gathered to this one center, the operator has the power to draw his real self from the body it uses. He (the operator) then takes possession of that body by the power of his will. It is not the subject at all that sings, dances, tastes, and is pleased or scared as the mesmerizer wills. It's the mesmerizer's thought thrown into the vacated tenement, the body of the subject. So when in India the "adept" is buried alive, kept buried for months, and then dug up and resuscitated, it's not the adept that is buried at all; it's only his body. The adept has himself the power of drawing his spirit from his body as the mesmerizer wills out his subject's spirit. During the burial the adept's real self may be in spirit hundreds of miles away. The electric chord between his spirit and body keeps enough life in the body to prevent it from decay. The Boston metaphysicians make short work of the old mystery about one's spirit. They say it's as material as are our bodies—composed of real elements and subject to chemical laws, only there's lots of laws in nature we know nothing about. We are, as to our real selvs and the powers in our real selvs, on the verge of a new world. Boston metaphysics says we hav five, if not more, very superior senses of which we know nothing. Our unknown eye, for instance, can see miles where the one we now use sees inches. The trouble is, it's not opened. As to that part of our being we are as blind and deaf puppies.

Contraction.

In the article, "A Lesson of the Past," which, like everything of Mr. Holt's, is vigorously penned, I am surprised at the conclusion, where contraction of currency is not only regarded as inadequate to explain the tightness of the money market, but absolutely denied.

Without inclining to one-sided views which exaggerate the force of any one factor in the economic troubles of our age and country, I cannot see why contraction should be left out of the question.

Given an equal amount of currency with that of more prosperous times, yet either an increase of population or increased demand for exchanges would hav the force of a contraction. Besides which, it is evident that contraction exists to the extent of the money coined and locked away, instead of liquidating the national debt with it.

How is it possible to know the amount actually in circulation, since private capitalists may hav the same motivs as Mr. Manning for withholding it from circulation? I do not refer to his personal speculations, of which I know nothing, but to his theoretic bias in favor of the exclusiv gold basis, consequently of creditors against debtors, and especially of bondholders privileged by payments in gold.

Let us consider certain causes of increased demand for currency which are practically equivalent to contraction.

Of all classes, the farmer least needs money, because his consumption forms a local circuit with his production. Pioneer farmers may for years do without money altogether. Need of it comes with taxation, and then with the culture of tastes fostered by the merchants for store goods. Near Guntersville, Alabama, though there is no extreme poverty, few farmers handle as much as fifty dollars in the course of a year. Well, now, since the war, taxes hav been increased, the internal revenue has ruined many farmers. Thirsty ones especially hav stood a bad chance. And as merchants and lawyers liv easier and make more money than any other classes, their numbers hav increased proportionally at the expense of the farmers. Mortgages and usury, though not reducing the quantity of farm prodnce, hav very greatly lessened the proportion of self-sustaining farmers. Now a floating population needs more currency than a fixed population.

The operativ also, though less paid, uses more money than the artisan did, because he cannot exchange services or produce with other producers directly. Neither of these classes, the agricultural nor the manufacturing laborers, enjoy practically the faculty of the commercial, i.e., of dispensing with money by bills of exchange.

Labor exchange banks, in conferring this faculty, would in a measure obviate the present distress. They would enable those who are still independent to remain so by keeping out of debt, though they might not touch the case of operativs enslaved to the capitalist and his truck store.

To expand and contract naturally with the needs of exchange, a currency must represent impartially all exchangeable values. This cannot be while any one value, variable and arbitrary, is assumed as the standard, to the exclusion of others. The intervention of government now defeats spontaneous adjustment. Finance becomes an art of trickery, sustaining toward values a similar relation with law toward justice.

EDGEWORTH.

Our Great Non-needy and Non-deserving U. S. Paupers.

As readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of course, all know, a pauper is any person who, without rendering to the public any equivalent service for such support, is "supported by some public provision."

As a rule, paupers are understood to be poor persons who, from some physical or mental disability, are incapable of earning their own livelihood. That condition of extreme poverty and helplessness, however unavoidable and undeserved it may be, which renders a public support necessary to its victim, has always been regarded, though unjustly so, as in some way a reproach to that victim. The word pauper, therefore, involving as it does the idea of this condition, has come to be regarded as a term of reproach. A poor man would almost as lief be called a rascal as to be called a pauper.

Paupers, however, are not necessarily thus poor and thus incapable of earning their own livelihood. On the contrary, many of our most noted and most burdensome paupers are persons of great wealth and excellent health, and it is of this class of paupers that I now wish to write. I wish specially to notice those of this class who are supported by alms drawn from the treasury of the United States, and whom for this reason, I call the U. S. paupers. Of this class of paupers, the notorious New York banker, the late U. S. Grant, and Mrs. Grant, are now the most prominent examples. For this reason, and this alone, I will notice them in a special manner. The other paupers of this class, however, are not to feel that I hav neglected them. They are to take to themselvs respectivly all of this article that is applicable to their respectiv cases.

It is true that, from fear of offending the pride of these aristocratic and consequently highly respectable recipients of unearned public support, they are never, as a rule, called paupers. So also, as a rule, the princely but mistaken charities bestowed upon them are never called alms; and their palatial residences, in which they fare sumptuously every day upon the proceeds of these mistaken charities, are never called almshouses. And yet the name really makes no difference. Since the recipient of an unearned public support is certainly a pauper, and since they are the recipients of such support, they are certainly paupers, no matter what they may be called, and no matter how little they may need this support. So also, since unearned money given by the public for the support of any person is certainly alms, and since the money received from the public by these parties is not earned by them, it is certainly alms, no matter what it may be called, no matter how great may be its amount, and no matter how little it may be needed by its recipients. So, finally, since the house in which persons supported gratuitously by the public reside is certainly an almshouse; and, since these parties are thus supported, their residences are certainly almshouses, no matter how palatial they may be, and no matter how little the inmates may need the public support received by them.

If these persons who thus, without returning any equivalent, receive from the public a yearly sum sufficient for their support, be not paupers, will some one of their number please, in reply to this article, explain what paupers really are, and in what respect himself and the other members of his class of public beneficiaries differ from real paupers? Will he also please giv, from some standard lexicon, some word which is more applicable to himself and to each of the members of his class than is the word pauper? Can he do either of these things?

These public burdens may claim to be pensioners. But what is a pensioner? "One," says Webster "to whom an annual sum of money is paid (not given) by government in consideration of past services." The italics and parenthesis are mine. But, in consideration of what "past services" are these parties being "paid?" That which is paid must first be owed. And for what services do we, the people of the United States, owe these extravagant consumers of our hard-earned money? Mrs. Grant, for instance, is receiving from the treasury of the United States an annual allowance equal to twenty-five times the pension of a first lieutenant for full disability, and to over fifty times the pension of a totally disabled private. And can she, or some friend for her, name the extremely valuable "past services" for which she is being "paid" this munificent sum of the people's money? Do we not all know that she never performed any services at all for the public? "But," it may be said, "she draws this pension because she is the widow of a deceased soldier." This may be a good reason. Let us examin it.

The widow of any soldier who falls in battle or who dies of disease contracted, or of injuries received, while in the line of his duty, is legally and justly entitled to a pension. Having deprived her of her supporter, the government is in law and in justice bound to make her some amends for the great injury it has inflicted upon her. And this it does by giving her some pecuniary aid, generally very little, in the form of a pension. Had Mrs. Grant been thus deprived of her supporter, in the person of her husband, she would hav been entitled to the pension fixed by law for the widows of officers of his rank. In this case she would hav applied, as does the deserving widow of any other soldier, not to Congress for a special act, but directly to the pension department. No one, however, pretends that, through any injury to her husband, the government ever deprived her of any portion of her support, or that it owes her anything on his account. On the contrary, we all know that through him the government increased her means of support a hundredfold. No one pretends that her husband, for any injuries received by him in the line of his duty, was himself entitled to a pension. No one, then, can claim that she is entitled to a pension on his account. That he was a soldier no one pretends to deny. That he faithfully performed his duties as such few will venture to dispute. But that he was more faithful or more deserving than any other good soldier has never been made to appear. And that he was as fully paid for his services as was any other soldier for his no one will venture to deny. No one, then, can possibly claim that the government owes his widow anything on account of his military services.

Since, therefore, Mrs. Grant is certainly not entitled to any of the people's money on account of her husband's military services, and, since he never performed any other services, except as president, it must be for these latter services that she claims "pay," if, indeed, she claims her so-called pension as "pay" at all. She surely would not claim pay from the people of the United States for his services as a financier. But was he not fully paid for his services as president at the close of every month? Did he not sign a bill doubling his own pay for the four years of his second term of office? Did he not also sign a bill giving himself fifty thousand dollars outright, facetiously calling his act of robbery—for such it certainly was—the taking of "back pay;" as if there could be any "back pay" on services for which he had received full pay already? Did he ever even pretend that he had ever performed any services for this immense sum of the people's money? And what was the nature of his services? Was not the signing of the above bills a fair sample of a great portion of those services? Did he not veto a bill that was intended to benefit the soldiers? Did he not sign that most damnable of all damnable bills—the bill to change the payment of the five-twenty bonds from greenbacks into gold? Did he not by that unspeakably cruel and wicked act increase the people's almost intolerable burden of debt by about the prodigious sum of eight hundred millions of dollars? Did he not thus add that amount to the enormous profits of the Shylock bankers and gold merchants? Did he not thus financially crush more men than were ever before crushed by any single act? Did he not thus drive multitudes of men to crime, to insanity, and to suicide, and multitudes of women to despair and to prostitution? In short, for political corruption, did not his administration constitute the "dark ages" of our country?

And is it in consideration of these services that we are forced to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars to "boom" him, as a pauper emperor, into his last resting-place? And is it for these services that we, the poor toilers who produce all the wealth of the nation, are to be still further bled to giv immense sums yearly to the wealthy Mrs. Grant? Do we owe her any such sums? If not, can they constitute a pension? If not, what can they be but misappropriated alms? And if, under the circumstances, she receives them, is not the fact that she does so a good proof that she does not deserve them? Can she receive them thus unearned, and not be a pauper? A pauper in her sense of right as well as in the ordinary sense of that term? Can she giv any reason why she should receive this money? Is it not entirely on account of her husband's great notoriety that this immense donation of the people's money has been made to her by those well-paid instruments of the bankers, the bondholders, the great monopolists of our country—those well-paid but faithless "servants" of the people, the Congress of the United States? And if notoriety alone entitles a man to be doctored, prayed for, buried, monumented, etc., at great expense by the taxpayers of the country—if it also entitles his widow, no matter how wealthy she may be, to vast sums of the people's money—then Mrs. Jesse James should come in for her "pension" and for her late husband's funeral expenses. Frank James, John L. Sullivan, and many other persons of great notoriety, should also be buried, and soon, too, at the people's expense, and their widows should be placed on the "pension roll" with Mrs. Grant and others of her class.

As to that maudlin, man-worshiping sentimentality now so prevalent among the American people, which holds the characters of noted persons—especially if those persons happen to be dead or condemned to die—as too sacred for adverse criticism, I regard it with the utmost of contempt. These are the very parties, above all others, whose defects of character we should hold up to the public view in adverse criticism. Are they not public property? And is the man who has suffered death any more entitled to our sympathy than is the man who has yet to suffer death? Is the man whose aching tooth has been pulled any more entitled to our pity than is the man whose aching tooth is yet to be pulled? Let every public man, whether living or dead, appear in his true character. Of their private lives only we should seem to know nothing.

Of Mrs. Grant, as a woman, I know nothing and I say nothing. I suppose that she, like most other women, is, in the highest sense of the term, a true lady. In any case her private character, like that of every other person, is too sacred for public discussion. When, however, she appears in the character of a public charge—a very expensiv pauper—for whose benefit we are all, by tax and tariff, forced to contribute, then she becomes a proper object of public discussion; and if she prove to be receiving more alms than she is entitled to receive, we, the furnishers of the alms, certainly hav a right to object, even if in so doing we do wound her pride.

To her I would say: Sister—for all women, no matter what their errors may hav been, are my sisters—come and go with me, and let us see how the five thousand dollars or more a year received by you is collected. See that poor cripple toiling in yonder field. Does he contribute to your so-called pension? He does. He is a disabled soldier. He receives only ninety-six dollars a year, and has to pay a part of that for the making out of his vouchers; less in a year than you receive in a week. He faced death in over fifty battle-fields. He is honest and sober. He is dressed in rags, and yet he is proud. He wants a new suit of clothes in which he can attend church, and without mortification visit his friends. By great self-denial he has saved the price of the coveted suit, twenty dollars; but a tariff laid by your husband and other wealthy men for the benefit of the wealthy, has added ten dollars more to that price. For this ten dollars he is now toiling, shortening his life in pain, and a part of this ten dollars goes to you, my good and wealthy sister. There are thousands upon thousands of such toilers, each of whom is compelled to contribute of his life's blood to the maintaining of yourself and your class in ease and splendor. I myself am one of these disabled toilers, and in the above description I hav nearly pictured myself, only I receive a little larger pension. I was an officer, and as such I receive as much in a month as you receive in a day. For a soldier I am fortunate.

It is midnight. See that pale, sickly woman sewing in that cold, cheerless garret. Is she taxed for your benefit? She is. She wants another blanket to cover her little ones who lie shivering on the floor. At three cents an hour she is working out the tariff on the blanket, and—rejoice, my dear sister—a part of that tariff goes to you!

But, see there! In the other end of the same cheerless room is another poor, pale woman also sewing at three cents an hour. Her only child lies upon a little table near her. It is thin and cold. Its pinched lips tell why it died so young. It seems to be silently prolonging in death it's last cry in life, which was for food that it did not receive. It needs no blanket. No blanket could ever again make it warm. Then why does its mother work so late into the night? She knows that her little darling, now so cold and so still, in all its life never enjoyed a single luxury. Now she is determined to afford it one luxury—the luxury of a nice little coffin in which to be buried. But luxuries are taxed. She is now working out the tax; and—rejoice again, my dear sister!—a part of that tax goes to yourself and your class. There are tens of thousands of such toilers, all of whom are thus adding to the contents of the well-filled coffers of the great protected capitalists of this, "the best government under the sun," and of yourself and other non-needy and non-deserving United States paupers. You can find some of them near your own door.

But, see there! See that pretty young girl! Why is she out so late at night? She is scarcely fifteen years of age. Yes, hold your dress away! She might brush it with her polluted garments—not polluted yet—she is still a virgin; but they will be polluted before morning. Begin, then, in time to crush her with scorn! She will soon be what, under similar circumstances, one of our own dear sweet daughters "might hav been," a prostitute. She has been long struggling to buy bread for herself and medicin for her sick mother, her only true friend. She has from no fault of her own been thrown out of employment. Her own hunger and her mother's sufferings hav made her desperate. See that "gentleman" with the splendid dress, the cane, and the cigar! He has caught her eye and he is following her. To him for a few dimes she will sell all that she has, her "joy of earth and hope of heaven;" her virtue. She will pay the tax on what she needs, and—rejoice once more, dear sister—a part of that tax thus earned will, without being earned at all by you, go to swell the contents of your well-filled coffers. She is only one of hundreds of thousands who thus earn their share of your so-called pension. Most of them, driven by want which the president of a dozen years ago helped to produce, twelve girls each hour on an average, day and night, are thus added to the vast army of fallen women who tread to the music of the dead march to the lowest depths of ruin and despair. And these are all my poor sisters!

Now let us go—what! are you "sick?" No wonder! Then, sister, we will go no farther. These are nothing to what we would still hav to see. But, O sister, be brave! Rise to the highest plane of womanhood! Return to the source whence it came all the unearned public money you hav received. Severely reprimand the unfaithful servants of the people who hav dared to insult you by placing your name on the list of our great non-needy and non-deserving United States paupers. Only do this, and instead of being cursed as you now are by many of the overtaxed, toiling millions, as an unjust and grasping woman, a burden to the poor, you will be hailed as their savior, and your name will go down into history equal in the glory of its brightness to any other name of the nineteenth century.

Reader, the scenes which I hav drawn are not fancy pictures. They are real. I hav seen them and many more like them. Hav you never seen anything of the kind? If you hav, then, oh! join with me in helping to remove those causes which render such scenes inevitable. JOHN R. KELSO.

Fair Play is a Jewel.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am requested by Friendship Liberal League, No. 257, of which I hav been secretary ever since it has been organized, to notice the letter which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 20th, in reference to a member needing assistance, and signing his name Harry G. Crisswell. Now, I hav carefully looked over the book which contains the members' names, and I find there is no such name in the book. I may say here, in behalf of the League, that not one of its members would suffer want knowingly. Although our League is not a charitable institution, we believe, as far as practicable, in assisting the needy, even if persons are not members. We hav no millionaires in our League, and the membership consists chiefly of hardworking mechanics. There is one thing I hav noticed. Occasionally a perfect stranger comes along, makes application for membership, and the first or second Sunday after joining makes application for relief. This is hardly fair, but such has been my experience; and, considering that the League has been duped in the past, it is absolutely necessary that we act more cautiously with strangers in the future. I could, if it were necessary, giv several instances wherein the League has been greatly duped, but it is not necessary here. Suffice it to say that if there is a needy person who is in our meetings, and will come forth and lay the case before the business meeting of the League, they will be heard, and I venture to state they will be assisted; if not direct from the treasury, the membership will help individually. GEO. LONGFORD, Secretary Friendship Liberal League No. 257.

The Liberal Club.

The "Silver Question" was up for discussion before the 408th regular meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club, and when the writer went in he contributed ten cents to that subject. Mr. Blissert stood at the door giving out cards announcing that W. A. Croffut, Esq., would shortly deliver before the Constitution Club "A Plea for Capital and Corporations."

A large and intelligent audience was present. Before introducing the lecturer, Prof. Van Buren Denslow, Mr. Wakeman spoke of the death of George McWatters, which occurred on Wednesday. Mr. McWatters, he said, though never heard upon the platform, was always ready with his means to help on the cause of Liberalism. Then Mr. Wakeman presented Professor Denslow, "formerly of Chicago, but now, fortunately for us, of New York."

Professor Denslow proceeded with his address. According to Archibald Allison, he said, the fall of the Roman empire was caused by the exhaustion of the gold and silver mines of Greece and Spain, which restricted the amount of money in circulation, causing low prices on goods and high values on the precious metals. From this the speaker argued the beneficence of a copious circulation of money. It need not necessarily be specie money. The specie dollar was fulfilling its best use when lying in some bank with ten dollars of paper money in circulation based on it. Specie was the substance, credit money the shadow; one the cause, the other the effect. A paper dollar represents hope; a specie dollar, realization. Rome was disenthralled by the discovery of gold in South America, but the thousand years that followed the ascendency of Christianity was exactly the opposit of the millennium that had been prophesied, being a thousand years known as the Dark Ages—the age of superstition. The speaker showed how prices of commodities had depreciated during the last few years, with times growing harder as a result. The cause is the separation in bullion value between silver and gold. What is needed as a remedy is the free coinage of silver. No matter if a silver dollar is worth only eighty cents as bullion, the government stamp makes it worth its face value as coin. Besides, if it induces foreigners to bring their silver here to be coined into dollars, they must spend it here also, because nowhere else would eighty cents' worth of silver buy a dollar's worth of goods. Mr. Denslow's address was more than an hour long and very interesting. It was eloquent as well, being closed, as all speeches should be, with a well-rounded flourish, in which the speaker said that the eagle of prosperity would lead the hosts of industry on to success.

Mr. Langerfeldt led the opposition. In the first place he referred to the speaker of the evening having exceeded his time without remonstrance from the chair. Mr. Langerfeldt had observed that this occurred only when the speaker agreed with the chair. In such instances, said Mr. Langerfeldt, growing more unparliamentary, the chair sits like a painted Chinese idol and wobbles its head. Then Mr. Langerfeldt said he would pluck a feather or two from the eagle with which Professor Denslow had taken a flight in his peroration. The professor had cavorted about like a circus horse in the midst of a jingle and had not touched the truth except when he talked wiser than he knew. Mr. Langerfeldt then introduced his argument. The same was bulging with significance, but the writer did not catch any of it.

Mr. Sutherland took up the statement that the stamp of government makes any substance worth its face value, and inquired why such was not the case with United States paper money during the war. Money, he maintained, was valuable only when based on gold. Prosperity would be brought about only by the stoppage of the coinage of silver.

Dr. Eccles arose to a definition of value. Labor had nothing to do with it. Value was based on human desire. The more a thing was desired the more it was worth. When the desire ceased or was satiated, Dr. Eccles explained, the thing went down. He also said that too much money was to be avoided, at which the audience laughed in a way that confused him.

Mr. Willy occurred next. This speaker said to Professor Denslow that he (the professor) had never addressed a more intelligent audience in his life. Yet he had not been understood and his argument had not been touched. For the information of Mr. Sutherland, Mr. Willy explained that the paper money of the United States was below par during the war only for the reason that it was not made a full legal tender by the government. No money bearing the legal tender stamp of this country had ever been below par, but it had been at a premium over gold.

Mr. Bouton, an old member of the club, and a Greenbacker from the ground up, as he said, assured Professor Denslow that all the criticisms that had been passed upon his lecture were as tallow candles beside the meridian sun. The very men who decried the silver dollar as a fraudulent coin would take it for debts at its face value and pay it out to their employees. Mr. Bouton saw no necessity for any other than paper money.

The discussion closed with Mr. Bouton, Professor Denslow merely remarking that the critics had answered one another. Thus passed another most profitable evening. The lecture was dignified and scholarly, the discussion was mainly of the same character, the audience was intelligent and attentiv, and Blissert kept quiet. Next Friday Mr. F. F. Cook will lecture on Labor Strikes. At which, by paying fivepence at the door,* the badge-pin man will fetch his writing things, to make a note of what the speaker sings, and print the same as hereuntobefore.

*Admission to the meetings of the club remains but five cents.

Canadian Notes.

The Toronto branch of the Canadian Secular Union held their regular monthly meeting, the first in their present quarters, last Sunday, April 4th, President Risser presiding; the members showing their appreciation of their improved surroundings by a large attendance. Matters of considerable importance were dealt with, among which may be mentioned the naming of the new hall. It will be known hereafter as the "Toronto Hall of Science," the second of its kind in Canada; the first, as most of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers already know, being in Alton, Ontario.

The meeting also decided to engage Mr. Watts for three week-night lectures during his present stay, the first to be delivered on Thursday evening of this week, and the two weeks following on Saturday evening. The clergy will be publicly invited, particularly Drs. Wild and Potts, and from past experience it is safe betting that they won't attend. Still, there is a possibility of their turning up, and advertising the lectures in this way shows the public that Secularists make no "coward's castle" of their platform, when they extend a privilege to the orthodox party which they, the clergy, dare not accord to Secularists.

In the evening at 7 o'clock, Mr. Watts delivered the second Sunday lecture of the present course; subject, "The Old Testament; Its History and Teachings." This lecture is entirely new, never having been delivered before, and ranks among Mr. Watts's best efforts. It is one well adapted for pioneer work, being destructiv in nature, and simply unanswerable in logic, and should be utilized by the friends everywhere who employ Mr. Watts, and who appreciate the value of the destructiv side of Secularism.

The hall was crowded to the doors with a splendid audience, the largest that has yet assembled in the Hall of Science, who listened to the lecture throughout with marked attention, and who manifested their approval by generous applause, the general verdict at the close being that "it was a grand lecture, and one that should be heard again and often."

If there is any truth in the old saying that "there is no rest for the wicked," Mr. Watts must be a very wicked man, at least he will hav but little rest for the next two weeks. He lectures here as usual next Sunday evening, then Monday and Tuesday in Galt, Wednesday and Thursday in Ayr, Friday in Woodstock, and Saturday again in Toronto, when he will reply to a sermon delivered by Rev. Dr. Wild last Sunday evening, in which the reverend gentleman makes a most unreasonable, illogical, and untruthful attack upon those whom he is pleased to call Infidels and Agnostics. Among other extraordinary statements he said: "The record of Infidelity and Agnosticism had been a black one. There was not an instance in history where Infidelity, in the third generation, had not produced Anarchy and bloodshed." He cited the French Revolution as a case in point.

The writer has heard this reverend humbug "wager his reputation as a scholar" that he was right in a certain point which he was trying to establish, but he can make a more substantial wager with "yours truly" that he won't dare to meet Mr. Watts in debate, and attempt to make good the above statement.

He will be invited by letter and through the press to attend the lecture on Saturday evening of next week, or to meet Mr. Watts at any other time or place, or under any conditions (in reason), and giv his credulous congregation and the public generally an opportunity of hearing both sides of the question. The writer don't wager his reputation as a scholar (perhaps in that case the loss of the wager wouldn't affect him any more than it would the doctor), but he will wager—say, $25—that this self-alleged scholar can not make good his allegations in that sermon in public debate with Mr. Watts; or he will subscribe that amount towards paying Mr. Watts's expenses, and allow the proceeds of the debate to be given to any charitable institution that the doctor may name. The doctor will receive this offer, and if he fails to respond, the public, or at least that portion of the public who hear Mr. Watts lecture for the next few weeks, will be able to form their opinion of a man who preaches nothing but bald assertion, and who can be neither coaxed nor bought out of his coward's castle.

Referring to the mayoralty trouble mentioned last week, it may be well to state that the matter has been quietly settled. The mayor has properly qualified, and, nobody coming forward to oppose him, he is reëlected by acclamation, and so the horrors of another religio-political election campaign hav been averted, Deo gratias.

The Listowel Banner, speaking of Mr. Watts's lectures in that town last week says: "Mr. Charles Watts, of London, England, who is at present on a visit to this country, delivered a lecture on Secularism and kindred subjects, in the town hall, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings. The first lecture was to show what unbelief from a religious point of view has done for the world, and the second was to prove that the scriptures of the New Testament are not divinely inspired. Apart from what may be said about the lecturer's views on these subjects, he is a remarkably fluent speaker, a keen debater, and treats both the arguments and those who hold different opinions with courtesy and respect—a very marked defect in the majority of those who differ in their religious sentiments."

Such testimony from an outside source will, no doubt, be as pleasing to the friends of Mr. Watts as it must be gratifying to himself. TORONTO.

Obituary.

When President Wakeman said, in opening the last meeting of the Liberal Club, that there was a vacant chair that night which had been occupied but two weeks ago, everybody knew that he had the venerable George McWatters in his mind. Mr. McWatters was one of the most regular attendants at the club, a long-time subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and a liberal contributor to all good ends. He died of pneumonia at his home in East Eighteenth street, after an illness of five days. The following particulars as to the life of Mr. McWatters are given by the New York Sun:

Mr. McWatters was seventy-four years old. For nearly a quarter of a century he was a marked figure in the busy haunts of the custom house, a loved visitor at the soldiers' homes, and could count his personal friends by the hundreds among the policemen, veterans, and newspaper men of the big city.

He was born in Scotland in 1812, and came to this country about 1847. He settled in Philadelphia at first, and served as an officer in the city courts. He became deeply interested in the Brook Farm enterprise, and, after living at Brook Farm for a time, he went to Long Island with a number of followers and established a similar community at Brentwood, which was called "Modern Times."

He came to this city in 1856, and joined the police force under Captain Caffray. Then he went to Captain, afterward Inspector, Thorne's command, and was one of the squad of brave policemen who backed Captain Thorne up in the repulse of the rioters who were bent on setting fire to the old Tribune building. He was wounded in the fight with the rioters. He attracted the attention of Superintendent Kennedy, and was transferred to police headquarters to take charge of the "Bureau for the Search of Lost Persons."

He established the system of sending out photographs and descriptions of the missing. In his leisure moments he wrote a description of the interesting experiences of a detectiv's life, which was afterwards published by subscription, under the title of "Knots Untied." It attained an extraordinary sale throughout the country, and was republished in England and Australia. It still finds readers and a sale.

When the war broke out he got many recruits for the police regiments, and after the war he exerted himself constantly for the bettering of the condition of the old soldiers and their widows and orphans. General Butler and Vice-President Wilson were his friends, and through their aid he had several bills put through Congress to secure more frequent payment of pensions to the war pensioners.

When he left the police force twenty years ago, General Butler and Vice-President Wilson secured him a place as inspector of customs, and he held it to his death. He was the only activ male member of the Ladies' Union Relief Association, and as almoner visited the charges of that association, and distributed the relief funds. He was a well-known and well-liked member of the New York Press Club. He leaves a widow and two sons and three daughters.

The Press Club trustees passed resolutions of condolence, and President Cummings appointed these men to attend the funeral: Charles H. Bladen, William N. Penney, Thomas Bonar, James Pooton, John A. Greene, Gideon J. Tucker, and George W. Pearce. The funeral services were at the house, Robert Collyer officiating, and the remains were taken to Brentwood for burial.

DIED—In Syracuse, on Friday, 26th of March, Mrs. Aurelia F. Danforth Raymond, widow of Capt. Eben Raymond, who perished by shipwreck in 1845.

Mrs. Raymond was born in Lenox, Mass., Dec. 7, 1819, and married to Captain Raymond, of Taunton, same state, 17th of July, 1843, a person of fine culture, and every way of excellent qualities. She was sister to Mrs. Lucy N. Colman, whose name has often been seen in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal journals in recent years, as it was in the antislavery papers a long time ago, when her earnest and often eloquent voice was heard in the antislavery meetings and conventions, both in the eastern and western states. Mrs. Raymond and herself were Abolitionists in those early "times that tried men's souls" and bodies too, and the bodies and souls of women as well. The temperance cause, also, and woman suffrage, found in them brave and consistent advocates, and in due time the labor problem no less.

Mrs. Raymond, after the death of her husband, studied medicin, graduating at a homeopathic medical college in New York, where she resided for some years, subsequently removing to Syracuse, where she and Mrs. Colman lived together during her last years. Her disease was consumption, a younger sister dying of the same many years since, she also under Mrs. Colman's sisterly attendance and care. Mrs. Raymond resisted disease during three lingering years, much of the time in great suffering; so that death, when the hour came, was a most happy release, and her sister and all her friends who knew her best could but rejoice with her. She was all her life one of the most quiet, undemonstrativ persons I ever knew, though possessing powers of mind, especially reasoning faculties, seldom surpassed. A reader, too, she was as well as reasoner, beyond most women, discriminating wisely among books, but making the contents of the chosen volumes her own. And over all her faculties and forces, conscience and love of humanity ruled supreme. P. P.

The Jobstown Secular Society hav experienced a very sad bereavement in the death of their highly esteemed and efficient librarian, Mrs. Emily Borden. Since the lectures at Jobstown by Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds, Mrs. Borden, a lifelong Baptist, made rapid advancement out of the bonds of superstition, and was an activ and zealous worker in the interests of the Jobstown Secular Society Library. She died March 30th, of pneumonia, after a sickness of only eleven days. The Liberals of Jobstown afford evidence of what good results very small numbers can accomplish by earnest, united effort. It is less than two months since the library was first started, and they hav already eighty volumes, which are kept in activ use, and help greatly in giving influence and interest to the society and advancing the cause of Secularism. C. B. Reynolds.

The Challenge Criticised.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker: Sir: The letter of R. M. Robinson in The Truth Seeker of April 10th has the appearance of fairness; but it by no means follows that its non-acceptance would hav any significance. To begin with the last paragraph, first comes the question of cost. I would like to be on the committee, and am familiar with photography, having made a variety of imitation spiritual photographs myself; but time is an element of cost, and if the "conditions are unfavorable," my loss of time is without avail. The next preceding paragraph, allowing methods of prevention of fraud to be resorted to, may be subject to the two preceding paragraphs, which imply that the medium artist is to manipulate and develop the plates, while the expert photographer is merely to watch. What can he see in the dark room?

Going back still another paragraph, we find the saving clause of the whole offer in the word "sittings." If this means that there are to be several meetings, at each of which several pictures shall be taken and developed, giving the committee opportunity to consider and devise methods of preventing fraud, it will giv a much fairer test than I hav ever known to be allowed in an investigation of thirty-five years. With that understanding I think the investigation well worth making. Critical watching would not be required; there would be no opportunity for changing the plates or other skilful manipulation, for I do not believe there can be any fraud committed of any description which photographers cannot find certain means of preventing, and such means as other photographers would see to be decisiv.

173 Gates av., Brooklyn. Henry M. Parkhurst.

REPLY TO THE CHALLENGE CRITICISM.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: By the final clause in my challenge in The Truth Seeker of the 10th inst., I certainly intended everyone interested to understand that no plan human ingenuity could devise would be left untried to satisfy any reasonable skeptical person as to the fact of the genuinness of spirit photography. It reads as follows:

> In short, every method that can be thought of by your committee to prevent fraud will be resorted to, and the details of the various experiments and the results published in The Truth Seeker.

Surely this is comprehensiv enough, and certainly its non-acceptance would hav a significance.

As to the question of cost, I do not propose to pay any or every member of the committee for time consumed in making the tests.

Doubtless there are enough earnest inquirers after knowledge to offer services in its interest for the purposes of establishing the truth or falsity of any asserted scientific fact.

If spirit photography is a fact at all, it is so scientifically, and can be proven, and so I affirm.

I trust Mr. Parkhurst will act as one of the committee, and accept my assurance that it will take but very little of his time to make him desirous of giving considerable. Certainly no test will be good for anything which leaves a possible chance for deception.

It is asked: "What conditions do I impose—there must be some?"

Well, yes, if the following may be called a condition: The committee must not try only such methods as they think will prevent a satisfactory result, and refuse to try methods suggested in the interest of Spiritualism and in conformity to the laws which are understood by Spiritualists to govern; but giv both sides a fair chance.

It is asked: "Will a member of the committee be allowed to watch the inside of the camera while the exposure is being made?" Certainly, if the expert artists consider it practicable and necessary.

The following questions are also asked: Will you allow me to bring the plates? Will you allow me to develop them myself? Can I develop them at home? To all of which I reply, Yes.

Question. Must you, or some one for you, be present when the plates are developed? Answer. No; but both ways can be tried.

Q. Can you bring the spirits with you to be taken by my camera at my house? A. Yes, if they are willing to go. It will be tried, and no doubt they will accommodate you.

Now, skeptical friends, send in your suggestions, and don't leave a stone unturned to settle this matter once and forever. R. M. Robinson.

Greenpoint, L. I., N. Y.

[We think that an extended discussion of the preliminaries of the test in our columns is unnecessary. Mr. Robinson is honest in his desire to convince skeptics, and Mr. Parkhurst is an honest skeptic. The committee should be appointed and proceed to business. If any results are arrived at of interest to the public we will print an account of them.—Ed. T. S.]

News and Notes.

If we had more bold pioneers like Messrs. Quimby and Rothwell, of Creighton, Neb., we should soon hav our forces in organization. The fact is, however, that many Liberals are still afraid of the churches, and while in private they frankly express their intellectual beliefs, when it comes to public action they are not ready; and the reason is that they fear the social ostracism of the church. The clergymen are now so far subdued by the spirit of the times that they will allow one to hold his radical opinion in peace. All they ask is not the "new birth," but a five or ten dollar contribution to their support. But the moment organization is proposed, and the funds of Liberals are likely to be diverted from the channels of the church and pockets of the ministers, then the dogs of war are let loose, and just so far as possible ecclesiastical persecution is begun. Many Liberals do not care to meet the storm and so do not show their colors, and this is one great difficulty in the Freethought organization. Even when Liberals are a clear majority in the community this tyranny of the priesthood prevails. However, there are some bold spirits, and protest is made. Two years ago the churches started a furious revival at Creighton. Mr. Quimby sent for Jamieson, who came and spoke to crowded houses for a few evenings, and so the revival gave up the ghost. This winter the ministers put their heads together for another revival, when Mr. Quimby told them he would send for Jamieson again. They prudently refrained, having a very wholesome dread of the agitation of Freethought lecturers.

At Stanton I found a splendid worker in Philip Helmerick, who has always been outspoken and done such effectual service that now there are many in Stanton who are earnest for the advancement of Liberal ideas. I arrived on Wednesday, and having a leisure evening went to an orthodox revival meeting; for instantly when it was known that the Infidel lecturer was coming, two revival meetings were started, one by the Congregationalist church, and one by the Methodist. Christians can't even work together against the common enemy. They must hav separate revivals, fearing that one might gain an advantage over the other. Christians of different sects hav a profound distrust of each other, even in the matter of saving souls; and the Methodist always keeps his weather eye open for the Congregationalist. I went to the latter's meeting, and a curious medley I heard. The preacher said, "Come, let us reason together," and the following is a specimen of his "reason:" "To do right is not to be moral." "To do right is not to be kind to your neighbor." "Commit ten thousand murders and you can go straight to the gates of heaven fling your sins upon Jesus, and forever be happy." Such are Christian ethics, and yet I hear some Freethinkers say, "Intellectually the church is all nonsense, but morally it is a very good thing, a police influence." How can it be when it thus upsets the very foundations of moral truth?

I had large audiences at Stanton in spite of the revivals. Mr. Helmerick, Mr. Lamb, and others who constitute the most intelligent part of the community and its leading business men will make Stanton a very strong point for the growth of Liberalism in the future.

I left Stanton at midnight for Fremont in order to arrive at Seward for Saturday and Sunday. But the Union Pacific train was two hours behind time, and thus I was unable to make connection, and was obliged to remain over Sunday at Lincoln. The railroads of Nebraska are not run altogether for the benefit of the traveling public, but rather to cut each other's throats and giv custom to the hotels. Belated travelers are rather frequent. Thus it took me three days and nights to travel one hundred miles, when with proper connections I might hav made it in a few hours. I do not believe in sectarian railroads any more than in sectarian churches.

Heaven helps those who help themselvs, but there is always an exception to the general rule. I did my level best, but I could neither walk nor ride, for the mud was knee-deep, and I had no special train and no special providence, and so I submitted and took a Sabbath day's rest. However, I met some Liberal friends at Fremont and Lincoln, and made arrangements for lectures on my return trip. I got to Seward on Monday. The town was full of election excitement, and there seemed no chance for a lecture. The citizens' caucus for the nomination of officers was to be held at the court house in the evening. It was proposed I should make a speech after the caucus to those who would like to remain. This I consented to do. The caucus lasted until half-past nine o'clock and the court house was crowded. Very few departed, and I spoke to three or four hundred, and under the circumstances many orthodox people were present who might not otherwise hav listened to a radical discourse. I simply said enough to show what the platform of Freethought is. The statements were well received by the miscellaneous gathering. I shall come back to Seward on my return and make up for loss of time. I anticipate, however, great pleasure in so-doing, for there is a dominant Liberal element here; the churches are in a discouraged condition, and two of the ministers hav to preach for nothing. Mr. H. L. Boyes has been for over sixty years a working Freethinker, and he is one of the leading citizens of the place, and elected to offices of the highest responsibility without opposition, for in spite of his outspoken Infidelity even the orthodox hav to acknowledge his stainless integrity and vote for him. This town is beautifully situated on a lofty rolling prairie, and I suppose that accounts for the Liberal spirit that prevails and the destitution of the churches. The fresh breezes and the broad horizons are too much for the latter. I hav met C. M. Clark, author of that interesting pamphlet, "Good Sense; or, The Religion of Christ is the Religion of Reason." I don't exactly agree with my friend, although he is a stanch Infidel. It is a question of definition. If the religion of Christ is the Golden Rule, well and good—that is reasonable. I think, however, that as a matter of history the religion of Christ is something else. For modern days the religion of Christ is very poor political economy, and for the last eighteen hundred years the world has much improved upon what Christ said and did. Of course friend Clark is writing of primitiv Christianity, which is a much different affair from ecclesiastical Christianity. It was a democracy and an enthusiastic brotherhood. Still, however, it was mixed with much ignorance; and however good in feeling, was quite unscientific, and can furnish no model for present action. Christian communism will not make a perfect society. What is far better is scientific coöperation. That alone will solve the problem of human happiness. We can't depend on mere feeling or the Golden Rule simply as such. Scientific information is necessary as well as good intentions. Mr. Clarke's plea for Christianity is a plea for an imaginary Christianity. The Christianity we hav to deal with practically is a different affair. It is not the Golden Rule; it is despotism and fanaticism and ignorant faith. However, one good point Mr. Clark makes—it is not those persons who hold the tenets of Christianity that we must condemn, but the tenets themselvs. It is against a system of belief that we must strike. We war not with individuals but with the injurious doctrins they profess. It is a battle of ideas in which we are engaged, and not of persons.

I wish to call attention to Professor Cottinger's books, "Youth's Liberal Guide," and "Universal History." Professor Cottinger has spent a long life in the service of Freethought. He has read much, and from the standpoint of Liberalism he givs much valuable information to those who desire a compendious view of man's history.

From Seward I go to Plum Creek, North Platte, Laramie, Rock Spring, and then for Utah, according to route published.

Bible Temperance.

THE BIBLE AND THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

PREFATORY NOTE.

This investigation was entered upon in the interest of temperance, and of moral and intellectual honesty. The author believes that whenever a good cause is supported by an appeal to supernatural authority it is put upon an insecure basis, and is liable to serious injury when men discard the creed embodying tenets affirming the existence of said supernatural authority. Especially is this true when, as in the case of the Bible, the creed is directly the opposite of what it is claimed to be by its advocates. Did the Bible really teach temperance we should regard this as one of its human excellences, and cherish it accordingly. But the overwhelming weight of its argument, precepts, and the examples of its saints is against temperance. Therefore, so long as it is regarded as of divine origin, or as wholly humanly true, it is an obstacle in the path of temperance reform. But its dangerous character is not fully perceived until we recognize the fact that Christians, driven to hypocrisy and rank dishonesty by the absurd claim of their church that the Bible is the infallible word of God, proceed to support their plea for temperance by an appeal to the Bible, claiming that it is the true basis of all abstinence and temperance propaganda, even going so far as to say that temperance is impossible so long as the teachings of that book are ignored, declaring that it must be kept in the schools as the great fountain of morality, and be made the basis of our civil law.

Now all these claims and assertions are false, hypocritical, and dangerous—false as to fact, hypocritical in intent, and dangerous to morality, to character, and to temperance. Dangerous to morality, because they are false; to character, because they destroy moral fiber by making men insincere and deceitful; and to temperance, because they rest the demand for it upon a book which does not teach it, and when men shall discover the cheat they will be very apt to throw temperance principles into the rubbish heap along with the book which it is falsely claimed inculcates these principles.

No one who has not made a careful study of the Bible has any conception of the paucity of temperance precepts and examples which it gives to the world. In view of these truths I respectfully ask for the following paper a careful perusal.

Valley Falls, Kan. E. C. WALKER.

"The education of the children of the republic in temperance principles logically involves the maintenance in those schools of the Bible as the great text book in morals."—Rev. T. P. Stevenson, of Philadelphia, editor of the Christian Statesman, the organ of the National Reform Association, alias the God-in-the-Constitution Party.

This is my text, and I shall discourse upon it somewhat at length. Rev. T. P. Stevenson is a representative man among those Christians who hold that all civil power comes from God, that Jesus Christ is the ruler of nations, and that the Bible is the divinely-revealed rule of faith and practice. He is also a fair representative of that much larger class of believers, and pretended believers, who claim that the Bible clearly and unequivocally teaches the principles of prohibition, and, what is much more important, inculcates the lessons of temperance. In arguing for the retention of the Bible in the schools he but echoes the utterly false assumptions of the W. C. T. U., the Y. M. C. A., and similar and affiliated associations, when he asserts that such retention is necessary for the proper moral training of the children of the land, and especially useful, nay, essential, in impressing upon them the important lesson of sobriety. He knows, none better, that his assumptions have no basis in fact, that the Bible has ten texts in favor of wine-drinking to one that condemns it. It is a useless waste of the courtesies of discussion to assume that such men as Mr. Stevenson really believe that they have warrant in the Bible for the fierce crusade in which they are embarked against the liquor trade, or that they can find any really valuable argument for temperance, much less for total abstinence, in that book. He knows, though many of his ignorant dupes do not, that the cob-house of Bible or Christian temperance is built upon a very quicksand of pretense and hypocrisy. But the church is losing her hold upon the intellect of the world, and it has become necessary to once more appropriate to herself the products of the labor of our common humanity. As she now credits herself with the overthrow of American slavery and the elevation of woman, so does she attempt to make us believe that the temperance movement owes its inception and development to her teachings and labors, and the precepts of her sacred book. No more impudent and unfounded claim was ever made, not even either of those above mentioned, brazen as they are; and I am amazed that seemingly sincere and earnest, though fanatical, men and women can have the hardihood to assert and insist that the Bible is the only sure authority to which appeal can be made in support of the temperance cause. But the claim is made, and it is made by the great majority of the ministers of the Protestant churches of this country, by the majority of the active Prohibitionists, by very many of the temperance workers, by the W. C. T. U., and other similar organizations. An epidemic of falsehood seems to have spread through the ranks of the more or less closely allied armies of temperance and of prohibition, and I hav no doubt that very many of the Christians, and proxy Christians, who, for the most part, read their Bibles by the headings of the chapters, hav come to honestly believe that the term "Christian temperance" is an exceedingly appropriate one, when, in fact, it is a most grotesque misnomer.

It does not come within the limits of this article to show how the church opposed the moral suasion temperance movement; how she only espoused this cause, and the woman suffrage movement as well, when she perceived that she must attach her lumbering and leaky old barge to some stanch steamer of Reform, or else drift hopelessly down the swiftly-rushing stream of events, and be lost forever in the ocean of oblivion. These portions of the work have been attended to by others, and ably attended to, and yet the exposure has not to all appearances checked the flow of the stream of canting fasehood coming from the lips of the accredited spokesmen of the church. I am here reminded by memory of the fact that a few years ago the pastor of the Presbyterian Society at Watkins, Iowa, refused to open the church for a temperance lecture, claiming that such use of the sacred edifice would be a profanation. What he said and did then, almost every Christian minister one hundred years ago would have said and done, and many would say and do to-day if they dared. Really, Christianity has logically nothing to do with practical reform. The logic of its creed would compel it to attend only to the other-world interests of its children, and the fact that many devoted Christians in all ages have labored for the improvement of the race here upon this earth only proves that their humanity was stronger than their religion.

I propose to show, from the book itself, that the Bible cannot in justice be claimed as a text-book of temperance.

In List "A" I shall include all texts which unequivocally condemn the use of intoxicants.

Brought together under "B" are those passages which commend or enjoin the use of wine, or strong drink, or which promise an abundance of wine as one of the blessings to be bestowed upon certain favored individuals or families or tribes, or upon the Israelitish nation, or include the deprivation of it among the punishments inflicted upon the disobedient.

List "C" will include those texts which conditionally or impliedly condemn the use of wine and strong drink; which forbid its use in excess, or by certain persons, or on stated occasions, etc.

Under the head of "D" will be included such texts as mention the use of alcoholic beverages as a matter of course, and evidently with no thought in the mind of the writer that there was anything wrong in such use, or that God had condemned it, or would punish the one or ones who so indulged. Of course, such texts, found in a work for which is claimed a divine origin, can be regarded by the believer as amounting to nothing less than a positive command from God to his children to make use in this way of such portion of his bounties.

Arranged in List "E" are found the texts which show that the wine mentioned in the Bible would and did intoxicate, though this is stoutly denied by the Scripture apologists of our day; or rather by that portion of them who think it essential to the success of the temperance cause, or necessary for the preservation of popular faith in their paper and ink fetich, that the Bible be made to appear to harmonize in its assumed moral teachings with modern ethics; as other exegetists and apologists have tried to harmonize its asserted science with the discoveries of these later times.

Doubtless it will be objected that the Bible does not mean what it so plainly says; it will be strenuously insisted that we do not read it aright; that the translators have not given to us a correct rendering of the original text, etc., etc. But these objections have no possible weight so long as it is believed that the book is the word of God. If an infinitely wise and powerful God wrote it or dictated it, it is just what he wanted it to be, just what he designed it to be. It teaches the lessons that he wants taught; its moral precepts are the outcome of his infallible wisdom and goodness, are the incomparably perfect fruits of the trees of Life and of Knowledge, and it is futile to urge that the translators have made mistakes. We can have no possible guarantee that the volume is the word of God unless we assume that all who have been concerned in its production, translators as well as writers, were under the direct inspiration of God. The common people never had, and have not now, any means of knowing whether the word translated wine means an intoxicating liquor or whether it means only the unfermented juice of the grape, or of other fruits. Unless they depend upon the apparently clear declarations of the book itself they are utterly at sea. Until very recently Christian men have almost, if not quite, universally believed that wine meant wine, a fluid that, drank in sufficient quantities, would intoxicate, and the context proves that they were right. The frantic attempt to make it appear otherwise is only a dishonest dodge to substantiate the assumption that the writers of the Bible were moved of God to write, and that consequently that work is the repository of all truth. To such straits are men driven who start out with an unnatural and therefore impossible theory.

We need not be surprised when a patient and thorough investigation reveals to us the fact that wine was about as common a drink as water among the people of the Eastern land from which the greater part of the Bible came, and that its use was not generally condemned is very natural. These men are not to be idly denounced because they could not see all that modern moralists and scientists have discovered of evil in the use of the stronger liquors of these later centuries, the disastrous effects of their enormous consumption augmented and intensified by the high-pressure life of our rushing civilization. But these Christian priests and editors, these lay mountebanks of the rostrum—what can be said severe enough in condemnation of their trickery and trifling, of their gambling with truth and "wresting of scripture," of their covert insinuations and bold slanders, of their audacious denials of the most palpable facts, and their persistent teaching of the manifestly absurd? Alas! they are the victims of their own creed. "God wrote the Bible," says that creed; and so they are driven to the desperate resort of making it say just the things which it does not, in truth, say; of covering up, evading, allegorizing, perverting; indulging in all sorts of demagogery, unworthy even of the lowest ward politician. Who can estimate the evil of all kinds which this dogma of inspiration has brought upon the world? Behold the spectacle of these cultured ladies of the W. C. T. U., loving and earnest in their labor in behalf of the victims of dipsomania, attempting to lead men to a better life, and themselves marshalled under the banner of "Christian Temperance," a flagrant and flaunting lie! How can they expect us to place confidence in them when we know that in every speech made, in every prayer uttered, in every song given to the air, untruth is rampant and regnant? Are they so blind as not to see—are they so foolish as to think—that we cannot see that if a God exist, and that God wrote the Bible, he will never grant their prayers for the suppression of the liquor traffic?

That the God who is assumed by the ladies of the W.C.T.U. and by Mr. Stevenson to have written the Bible was not a prohibitionist, did not believe in total abstinence, and was not even a friend of temperance, as temperance is defined by the most conservative of its advocates to-day, I now proceed to show, giving first, however, all that the book has to say which can, by the most liberal interpretation, be construed as supporting the claims of the Christian temperance workers and Bible apologists:

LIST A.—PASSAGES UNEQUIVOCALLY CONDEMNING THE USE OF WINE.

Prov. xx, 1: "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise."

Prov. xxi, 17: "He that loveth pleasure shall be a poor man; he that loveth wine and oil shall not be rich."

Our writer must have thought that oil was indigestible, and productive of eruptive diseases, and, therefore, the cause of as much evil as was intoxication; else why did he include it in terms of equal opprobrium with wine? Only temperance people who are eschewers of fat food, as well as of wine, will fully coincide with the author of Proverbs in his opinion of wine and oil.

Prov. xxiii, 20: "Be not among wine-bibbers; among riotous eaters of flesh."

It seems incontestible that this writer was a vegetarian, but when quoting him our disingenuous Christian temperance people do not dwell much upon the anti-meat part of his teachings.

Prov. xxiii, 29–32: "Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? Who hath contentions? Who hath babbling? Who hath wounds without cause? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine; they that go to seek mixed wine. Look not then upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his color in the crop, when it moveth itself aright. At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder."

Isa. v, 22: "Woe unto them that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink."

See criticisms on verses 8, 10, and 11 of this chapter, in list C.

Isa. xxviii, 1, 3, 7: "Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower, which are on the head of the fat valley of them that are overcome with wine. . . . The crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim, shall be trodden under feet. . . . But they also have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way, the priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment."

I think that these verses should have been, in strict justice, included in list C, but I am very willing to give the Bible the benefit of the doubt, and so I have placed them here. It is plain, however, that the censure is visited upon the excesses of the priests and prophets, and is in no sense a condemnation of what the people of that time regarded as a necessary and moderate use of stimulants, and upon which "God" has set the seal of his approval ten times where he has, even conditionally and inferentially, disapproved of it once.

Hos. iii, 1: "Then said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress, according to the love of the Lord toward the children of Israel, who look to other gods, and love flagons of wine."

Hos. iv, 11: ". . . and wine take away the heart."

Hab. ii, 15: "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him, and makest him drunken also, that thou mayest look on their nakedness."

This is the offense of the minister or of the deacon who passes the communion wine!

Four alone of the Old Testament writers utter an unequivocal condemnation of intoxicating drinks, and these only in a very few passages, while in at least an equal number they as unequivocally commend them,* Isaiah and Hosea saying more for than against, while the writers of Proverbs and Habakkuk lean the other way. Of the New Testament writers not one has clearly said that wine and strong drink are curses to the children of men. And yet our ears are continually dinned with an outcry about "Christian Temperance!"

LIST B.—PASSAGES COMMENDING OR ENJOINING THE USE OF WINE OR STRONG DRINK, OR BOTH, OR INCLUDING A PLENTIFUL SUPPLY OF WINE AMONG THE BLESSINGS TO BE BESTOWED UPON FAVORED INDIVIDUALS OR TRIBES, ETC.; OR INCLUDING THE DEPRIVATION OF IT AMONG THE PUNISHMENTS INFLICTED UPON THE DISOBEDIENT.

Jacob, blessing Judah, said (Gen. xlix, 11, 12): "Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes. His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk."

Doesn't look as though Yahweh, the "God of Jacob," thought wine a very bad article.

Num vi, 20: "After that the Nazarite may drink wine."

In Deut. vii, 13, God, through Moses, said to his chosen people: "And he will love thee, and bless thee, and multiply thee; and he will also bless the fruit of thy womb, and the fruit of thy land, thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil," etc., etc.

Just think of it, W. C. T. U. people, God has solemnly promised to bless his faithful children with an especially large vintage, a better vintage than that of their unbelieving neighbors! Rather rough on the heretic French and the Infidel Germans!

Deuteronomy xi, 14: "That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thy oil."

Yahweh is determined that the supply of wine shall not fall short.

Deut. xiv, 26: "And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth; and thou shalt eat there before the Lord thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household."

Rev. Mr. Stevenson to the box! Repeat your testimony, please. "I said that 'the education of the children of the Republic in temperance principles logically involves the maintenance in those schools of the Bible as the great text book in morals.'"

Deut. xv, 14: "Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-press; of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him."

This is said regarding the manumitted Hebrew slave. And so it is a blessing for God to give the fruit of the wine-press to his children? And we are to emulate him?

It seems that God punishes his people by blasting their vineyards, and thus cutting short their supply of wine, as below:

Deut. xxviii, 39: "Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them, but thou shalt neither drink of the wine, nor gather the grapes, for the worms shall eat them."

Verse 51 of the same chapter tells the people that their cattle and wine and oil shall be taken from them if they disobey God's commands. This is the famous "cursing chapter" of the Bible, and is just the reading calculated to make a man believe that God was the first pope of Rome.

Deuteronomy is a very good book for the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and I suggest that it hold a special meeting to pray for the evidently "rum"-loving god who wrote it. There is much other matter in it that helps to make it an admirable work for use in the schools.

Judges ix, 13: "And the vine said unto them, Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?"

Ah! so it appears that God, the "original prohibitionist," according to the W. C. T. U., drinks wine, else how could it cheer him?

2 Sam. vi, 19: "And he dealt among all the people, even among the whole multitude of Israel, as well to the women as men, to every one a cake of bread, and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine."

Query: What would the Christian temperance ladies have done with that wine had they been present when David, the man after God's own heart, dealt it out to all, men as well as women?

2 Sam. xvi, 2: "And Ziba said, The asses be for the king's household to ride on; and the bread and summer fruit for the young men to eat; and the wine, that such as faint in the wilderness may drink."

In Kansas and Iowa many get "faint in the wilderness," judging by the business of the drug stores. No doubt they have all seen this prescription given by God.

2 Chron. ii, 10: "And behold, I will give to thy servants, the hewers that cut timber, twenty thousand measures of beaten wheat, and twenty thousand measures of barley, and twenty thousand baths of wine, and twenty thousand baths of oil!"

The article which Solomon, "the wisest of all men," gave to the servants of the king of Tyre in one-fourth payment for their labor in preparing the temple which he built to the Lord, was probably especially blessed by the Lord for that use, and so rendered non-intoxicating, else we must conclude that he pays those who build houses for him in what friend St. John would call "liquid damnation."

And inasmuch as Solomon was the wisest of all men (or God made a mistake when he so said), and the temple was for the said God, I am justified in concluding that this God regards wine as a legal tender, and so I put the above passage in this category as one in which God has sanctified the use of wine.

Neh. v, 11 (To the usurers): "Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their oliveyards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them."

Neh. x, 39: "For the children of Israel and the children of Levi shall bring the offering of the corn, of the new wine, and the oil, and we will not forsake the house of our God.

Wine, old or "new," seems to have been always acceptable to "our God," whether tendered as a holy offering or otherwise.

"The Lord" makes wine, according to the Psalmist:

Psa. civ, 15: "And wine that making glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart."

If "the Lord" lived in Iowa, Lozier and Foster would have him arrested for violation of the new iron-clad prohibitory law.

Prov. iii, 10: "So shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."

Prov. xxxi, 6, 7: "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that be of heavy heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more."

In these two verses, the author of Proverbs has more than nullified all the good things he said in his earlier chapters, and which I have quoted in List A. I am quite sure that where they have prevented the drinking of one glass of wine or strong drink, these passages have led to the drinking of one thousand. And this is a mild statement of the case.

Eccl. ix, 7: "Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works."

Song of Sol. i, 2: "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth; for thy love is better than wine."

From this we gather that, next to love, wine is the best thing in the world. This is the opinion of most bacchanalian experts, I believe. Solomon seems to have had much experience.

Song of Sol. v, 1: "I have churned my wine with my milk; eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O believers."

Is this the earliest mention of milk punch?

Song of Sol. viii, 2: "I would cause thee to drink of spiced wine of the juice my pomegranate." Metaphorical, undoubtedly.

Isa. i, 22: "Thy silver is become dross, thy wine mixed with water."

Have your wine full strength, as much as you would have your silver unalloyed, is the admonition of God's prophet.

Isa. xxiv, 7: "The new wine mourneth, the wine languisheth; all the merry-hearted do sigh."

One more in the long list of passages wherein it is said that God punished his chosen people by cutting off their vintage. What God regards as a real deprivation to lose must be good to have and to keep, in his opinion, whatever the W. C. T. U. people may think about it. Verse 9 says: "They shall not drink wine with a song; strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it." Verse 11: "There is a crying for wine in the streets; all joy is darkened; the mirth of the land is gone."

God thus punished them by taking away their wine, on the same principle that he punishes us by killing our children, as Christians say that he does. Will they contend that children are inherently an evil? They must if they follow the same line of reasoning that they do in interpreting these texts.

Isa. xxvii, 2, 3: "In that day sing ye unto her, a vineyard of red wine. I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment; lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day."

Figurative, doubtless! So is the next, but all the influence of these passages is on the side of intemperance, necessarily, for the simple reason that the great mass of the people will take them literally, and for the further reason that the constant association of wine with "good news" and symbols of religion familiarize the mind with it and serve to give it something of a sacred character. This last-mentioned fact helps to explain why the church so long opposed the modern temperance movement. But here is the passage above indicated, Isa. lv, 1: "Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath mourning; come ye, buy and eat; yea, come buy wine and milk without money and without price."

Mr. Stewart Might Find a Better Use for His Money.

From the Liberal, Mo., Liberal.

Our friend Wm. Gray wants us to name the "Liberal lecturer who offered $25.00 to help build" a church in Liberal. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER asked the same question through his columns, and others through private letters. We cheerfully comply with their wishes. It was Prof. C. W. Stewart, who is quite a prominent lecturer in the West, and at present located here in Liberal. From the good reports I had heard of his labors in Iowa, during the fall and winter, I must confess I was much astonished at his offer, though, to do him full justice, he said, after the senior editor's paragraph in these columns respecting the same, that he only offered $10 for a church here. But that does not change the principle at all.

However sincere Mr. Stewart may be in his offer, I think it a very serious mistake in anyone, and a strange paradox for a Freethought lecturer, to offer any sum to build a church anywhere on the earth. I am reminded here of an incident. One cold day in 1882 a thinly-clad colored woman called on my friend Mrs. Amy Post, in Rochester, N. Y., and solicited a contribution to build a church for her oppressed race. Mrs. Post, in her pleasant Quaker manner, refused. The colored lady, knowing of Mrs. Post's life-long labor for the negro, became very urgent, and said, "Giv me something, even one penny." I can still see the bright light in that brave and noble woman's eye as she replied with a steady firmness: "Not one penny for a church anywhere on this earth. I will giv you $5 for a public hall for free discussion or to alleviate your personal wants, but never a penny to suppress free speech, as all churches try to do."

I am in full accord with her and with Mr. Gray's article, "Let us hav Justice." All the crimes namable and unnamable are charged upon Spiritualists and Freethinkers by the churches, for no other reason than questioning their dogmas and uncovering the vice and iniquity dealt out to a gullible public under religious cloaks; so with him I say, Let us carry the war into Africa.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: "How great a fire a little matter kindleth!" You hav seen the attack made upon me in the Liberal, and Mr. Walser tells me that you wrote to him inquiring who it was that offered ten dollars toward building a church here.

The facts are as follows: Some time in February a number of us were discussing the narrowness of a certain class of Liberals, and I remarked that I was in favor of building up our town in every legitimate way; that it was about time to quit fighting each other, adding that it would be a good thing to hav a few Christians to combat, instead of elbowing each other so much. I said that I would giv ten dollars towards getting a church here, not that I believed in its doctrins, but because it would produce a healthy mental competition. Immediately the proprietor of the hotel, a radical Freethinker, indorsed the idea, and the entire company spoke favorably of it.

But my remark was carried to Mr. Walser and a well-meaning but misguided man named Chaapel, neither of whom likes me very well, because I do not fall in with the idea of turning our town into a Spiritual Mecca, and the week following the item appeared which caused your inquiry.

Now, I hav this to say, that if my labor in the cause of Freethought during the past fifteen years is not sufficient guaranty of my loyalty to its principles, I am unable to furnish a better one.

The secret of the matter is that I hav struck some pretty hard blows at the "Anarchistic" idea, and the promiscuity hobby, and a few of the brethren, unable to answer me, hav resorted to the bigot's weapon, persecution. I hav also severely criticised the bigotry of a certain class of alleged Liberals, and they are angry about it.

Feeling that you were perhaps unacquainted with the fact that this town has been dominated, to its detriment, by the above-mentioned spirit, and that a one-idead town is, like a one-idead man, generally a failure, I thought it proper to say this much by way of explanation.

We hav an excellent class of people here, many of whom silently agree with me in my opinion concerning the status of the town. And I will conclude by saying that, happily, the backbone of crankism and illiberality is about broken, and soon all inharmonious elements will "pass to spirit life."

Very truly, C. W. STEWART.

Woman Suffrage.

There is a bill before the Senate at Washington providing for the admission to the Union, as a state, of Washington Territory. Under the present laws of that territory women are voters. When the bill came up for discussion in the Senate last week, a mossback Solon from Louisiana, Mr. Eustis, moved to amend by confining the right of suffrage to male citizens. The only argument he advanced to support his motion worth reporting was that if women are allowed to vote in the proposed new state, it might send a female senator to Washington.

Well, what of it? We guarantee that no woman who would be selected could be more incapable than some of the present senators, and the chances are a hundred to one that, whatever woman was chosen, she would be more moral—less given to cold tea and mistresses—more incorruptible, and less liable to pass unconstitutional measures, than the members of the present body. Besides, women hav just as good a right to make the laws they must obey as men hav.

There is one good trait in the character of Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts. He believes in woman suffrage on principle, and not merely to be amiable to the ladies. Mr. Hoar reminded Mr. Eustis that as a Democrat and supporter of state rights he was inconsistent. The proposition to disfranchise the women of Washington Territory was destructiv of the fundamental principles of republican liberty; the power of electing representativs, and of being elected such, was an essential principle of liberty. The senator from Louisiana and his party friends, who had been in the habit of invoking this principle in connection with states' rights and in defense of slavery, now denied it against the free and fair decision of the people themselvs of Washington Territory. According to all American principles of government the people of Washington Territory had a perfect right to regulate suffrage in their own territory.

Senator Platt, of Connecticut, agreed with Senator Hoar that the people of the territory had a right to manage their civil affairs in their own way. Senator Edmunds, also, saw no force in Mr. Eustis's argument. He defended the right of the women to vote in the proposed state, and said it would be as logical to propose that men should be disfranchised, and that only women should vote.

Senators Hoar, Platt, and Edmunds are clear-headed in this matter; we only wish they might talk as sensibly on all other questions. Edmunds can see the unconstitutionality of disfranchising citizens of a territory, but he will not admit the monstrous tyranny of disfranchising and robbing a larger body of people because of a fanatical breaking of law by a small portion of them.

Truly, our law-makers hav curiously-constructed heads.

Philosophical Beasts.

The last issue of Liberty contains a hot defense of the philosophical Anarchists against the practical gentlemen who claim to belong to that school of thought. Mr. Tucker givs currency to the doubtless unfounded report that Henri Rochefort said to an interviewer that "Anarchists are merely criminals. They are robbers. They want no government whatever, so that, when they meet you on the street, they can knock you down and rob you," and retorts, "You lie!" when this definition of Anarchy is applied to those who only "deny all external authority over the individual, whether that of the present state or that of some industrial collectivity or commune which the future may produce." We can scarcely credit the report that Henri Rochefort uttered the words attributed to him, for he is usually thought of as a man of common sense, with the fairness to discriminate between thinkers like Bakounine and footpads who rob foes and swindle friends indiscriminately. Mr. Tucker, however, goes on, in the interest of the mental Anarchists, to expose the practical Anarchists such as Rochefort describes. He says that "in the face of all logic and consistency, the word Anarchy has been usurped by a party of Communists who believe in a tyranny worse than any that now exists, who deny to the laborer the individual possession of his product, and who preach to their followers the following doctrin: 'Private property is your enemy; it is the beast that is devouring you; all wealth belongs to everybody; take it wherever you can find it; hav no scruples about the means of taking it; use dynamite, the dagger, or the torch to take it; kill innocent people to take it; but, at all events, take it.'" Mr. Tucker charges that in carrying out this rather destructiv program the Anarchist-Communists of New York hav engaged in incendiarism as a business. Here is his indictment:

"For nearly two years a large number of the most activ members of the German Group of the International Working People's Association in New York city, and of the Social Revolutionary Club, another German organization in that city, hav been persistently engaged in getting money by insuring their property for amounts far in excess of the real value thereof, secretly removing everything that they could, setting fire to the premises, swearing to heavy losses, and exacting corresponding sums from the insurance companies. Explosion of kerosene lamps is usually the device which they employ. Some seven or eight fires, at least, of this sort were set in New York and Brooklyn in 1884 by members of the gang, netting the beneficiaries an aggregate profit of thousands of dollars. In 1885 nearly twenty more were set, with equally profitable results. The record for 1886 has reached six already, if not more. The business has been carried on with the most astonishing audacity. One of these men had his premises insured, fired them, and presented his bill of loss to the company within twenty-four hours after getting his policy, and before the agent had reported the policy to the company. The bill was paid, and a few months later the same fellow, under another name, played the game over again, though not quite so speedily. In one of the fires set in 1885 a woman and two children were burnt to death. The two guilty parties in this case were members of the Bohemian Group and are now serving life sentences in prison. Another of the fires was started in a six-story tenement house, endangering the lives of hundreds, but fortunately injuring no one but the incendiary. In one case in 1886 the firemen hav saved two women whom they found clinging to their bedposts in a half-suffocated condition. In another a man, woman, and baby lost their lives. Three members of the gang are now in jail awaiting trial for murdering and robbing an old woman in Jersey City. Two others are in jail under heavy bail and awaiting trial for carrying concealed weapons and assaulting an officer. They were walking arsenals, and were found under circumstances which lead to the suspicion that they were about to perpetrate a robbery, if not a murder."

Mr. Tucker complains that the individuals acquiring wealth in this manner do not use the profits "for the benefit of the movement to which the criminals belong," but that the increase "goes to fill their own empty pockets," and is "often spent in reckless, riotous living." John Most, Mr. Tucker charges, while in no wise the originator of this not altogether novel method of making a living, nor in any way a beneficiary of the scheme, is responsible for not denouncing the gang in the columns of the Freiheit. Mr. Tucker allows that for a long time Mr. Most was ignorant of what is going on, but when made acquainted with the facts, Mr. Tucker says, he has refused to repudiate the criminals, but persists in retaining as his right-hand men some of the worst of them. Another count in the indictment of Mr. Most is that he posts Justus Schwab—whom Mr. Tucker labels "an exceptionally honest man"—in the Freiheit as a man with whom no Socialist should hav anything to do. These are the important facts in Liberty's exposé of a wing of the so-called Anarchists.

We hav given this space to the matter for two reasons. The first is that Mr. Tucker calls upon the press of the country to pass the exposure along, that the Anarchistic goats may be separated from the Anarchistic sheep. The second reason is, to defend the Anarchists from this horrible charge of one of their own number, and also to defend the Communists from the same accusation. Mr. Tucker's heading his exposure, "The Beast of Communism," and his direct assertion that these firebugs are "a party of Communists," are as wilfully wrong, as maliciously misleading, and smacking as much of party dishonesty as the assumption by the gang of criminal beasts of the title either of Anarchists or Communists. The true condition of the matter, as we understand it from having been a humble private in the labor ranks of this city for some time, is this:

There are a lot of men in this city, mostly foreigners, who hav for years been more or less conspicuous in the "labor movement," holding meetings in lager-beer halls, and calling themselvs Socialists, Anarchists, Communists. In the vacuum in their heads which they are pleased to term their minds, these words are interconvertible. It is our opinion that they do not know enough to know the meaning of either of these words, and for some reason—probably from selfish motivs—their leaders hav never seen fit to enlighten them. But these men do not in any sense or manner represent the labor movement, nor hav they even a legitimate part in it. Go to any labor leader in the city, from the chief executiv to the most recently initiated Knight of Labor, and ask about them, and the reply will be, "We don't know them; they are none of us." These, then, are the fellows, the Ishmaelites of labor, against whom Mr. Tucker's charges are brought. They are not Anarchists, except as any common thief is an Anarchist, doing what he pleases with impunity. The real Anarchist, as we grasp the meaning of the term, is one who accepts the doctrin of individual sovereignty, with individual effort as the base and means of all progress, but always limiting the individual's right by the equal rights of others. This limitation absolutely precludes any such invasion as the firebugs described by Mr. Tucker hav been guilty of. Rightly, they can no more be called Anarchists than a thief "on principle" can be termed a supporter of the rights of property. For the practical working of Anarchy we are unable to refer to any published scheme.

The Socialist is the man at the other end of the philosophical and governmental cord. He rejects Josiah Warren's doctrin of individual sovereignty, and would create a paternal government, which shall conduct the business of the country and see to it that all hav employment and consequent plenty. An outline of the program of the Socialists may be gleaned from Grönlund's "Social Commonwealth."

The Communist, opposed directly to the Anarchist, and in some measure to the Socialist, lays the greater emphasis upon the brotherhood of man, and believes that in the extension of the family lies the remedy for the labor and other social troubles. The Communist believes in very little government, and that advisory by councils of the communes, but holds that public works shall be owned by all, and individual support guaranteed by all, provided each individual performs his share of useful labor. A comprehensiv and entertaining practical plan of this social philosophy may be found in "Rational Communism."

From the foregoing, if we hav clearly stated the positions of the parties, the opponents of Anarchy may see how unjust is the general public clamor against the Anarchists. And we sincerely hope that Mr. Tucker will also see that his attack upon Communism is equally unjust. The true representativs of these three schools of social reformers in this city—which is the scene of the deviltry revealed by Mr. Tucker—are men of scholarly attainments, of depth of thought, of probity, and many of them possessors of material wealth, gained by their own honest exertions. The author of "Rational Communism" is a gentleman possessing large wealth, a clear head, and a big heart. To connect his social scheme in the remotest degree with the firebugs of the Bowery is as unjust as to lay upon the Anarchistic editors of Liberty the responsibility of the Phœnix Park murders.

But let us for a moment leave aside all this, and suppose there were a society of Communists in this city, some members of which had been guilty of the crimes charged by Mr. Tucker. Even then he would not be justified in saying that for such acts Communism is responsible. These fellows are acting, if the indictment is a true one, in their individual capacity, exercising the individual sovereignty side of Anarchy, but unrestrained by the other side which limits their acts to those not trenching upon others' rights. The main body could not be held responsible for such acts, unless by a vote of the members it had sanctioned them. The commission of crimes by these individuals would only show that their philosophy had made them no better men, precisely as the crimes of professing Christians prove that the Christian religion is not a sufficient restraining moral force. As there is no logic in contending that the peculations of a pious cashier prove the dishonesty of the whole bank directorate, so there is no point gained against the principles of Communism by charging that an individual Communist has been found guilty of arson. Mr. Tucker has been unfair, and he should apologize to the Communists, or the next time a conflict comes between the police and some gentleman who denies "all external authority over the individual," the press of the country can not be blamed if they head the item recording the conflict, "The Beast of Anarchy."

We agree wholly with neither of the three parties whose positions we hav briefly and, of course, inadequately outlined, but fair play is a brilliant of attractiv form and color, and in passing Mr. Tucker's exposure along we could do no less than point out, as we hav often done before, the errors his onesidedness leads him into.

Two Statutes.

"And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt: I am the Lord your God."—Lev. xix, 33, 34.

This statute contains the principle abundantly repeated by Christ in his gospel.—Independent.

"Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shalt giv it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien: for thou art a holy people unto the Lord my God."—Deut. xiv, 21."

What does this statute contain?

Fighting Preachers.

Since the year opened three army chaplains hav been retired for age and three new ones appointed. The treasury, however, is not rid of the retiring men. They will continue to draw pay at the rate of about $150 per month each, while the new appointees will liv in such luxury as $125 per month affords.

One retired chaplain has just caused the House Military Committee some annoyance, if we may judge from the language of its adverse report on his bill for relief:

"The claim has been persistently pressed by a large number of very respectable people, who put their support upon personal grounds, and very largely upon sentiment, because of the clerical profession of the claimant and the supposed sufferings and hardship he has undergone. If Congress was purely an eleemosynary corporation, and its members were selected as public almoners, the reasons presented might hav considerable weight, but to us, as legislators and trustees of the public funds, whose duty it is to see that they are applied to the purposes for which they were collected, the legitimate expenses of the government, they only show how readily people become generous in their sentiments and sympathies when the disbursement recommended is to be made from funds other than their own, and the responsibility for the appropriation falls upon others than themselvs. The Forty-eighth Congress, tired and worn out by the repeated and persistent efforts of the claimant and his friends, passed an act under which Chaplain Blake received and accepted credit for $5,454.55, which sum had before that time been a charge against him for overpayment that had been made to him. This donation seems only to hav whetted the appetite of the claimant, and he now returns, 'like Oliver, asking for more.' Your committee feel that he has been generously dealt by in the past, and are unwilling to reopen his account and extend him further generosity. They therefore report the bill adversely."

Mr. Blake, it seems, overdrew his pay by a few thousands of dollars, and then induced Congress to make him a present of the amount. This is an exceedingly polite way of stealing, and the still healthy state of Mr. Blake's nerves is developed in his request for more. It might be well to giv him the keys of the treasury vaults and ask him to help himself. If the task of carrying off all the money in the treasury proves beyond his strength, there are enough churchmen in the country to help him.

Editorial Notes.

In the course of a lachrymose editorial upon the passage by the Assembly of the bill granting the museums in the park $20,000 annually, providing their doors are open on Sunday, the Christian Advocate reveals that every Methodist minister in this city protested against the passing of the bill, and asks its readers throughout the state to scan the list of those voting for and against it. "In maintaining the institution of a Christian civilization," saith the Advocate, "we need to be supported by the Christian sentiment of the whole state." We should like to ask what a Christian in Buffalo has got to do with the local institutions of this city. New York supports these museums, and New York ought to govern them.

In opposing Sunday opening of the museums, the trustees hav posed as public benefactors, and alleged that their institutions are the property of private gentlemen who are devoting their fortunes to the good of the race. They should therefore be let alone. Yet we notice that what the people get from the museums they are required to pay extra for. For a long time a lecture course has been maintained at the American Museum of Natural History. Professor Bickmore, the lecturer, has instructed thousands in natural history, zoology, comparativ anatomy, physical geography, and other sciences, and the Saturday afternoon talks hav been in every way admirable. But it rather astonishes a public used to the philanthropic claims of the trustees of the museum to find last week a bill passing the Assembly appropriating from the New York school fund $18,000 to pay for such lectures. The trustees should either be milder in their claims or visit the public treasury less frequently.

A certain Michigan clergyman, feeling it incumbent upon him to answer Remsburg, recently addressed a letter to the Rev. Dr. Tevis, of the M. E. church at Atchison, desiring to know what Mr. Remsburg's standing in the community was, what his domestic relations were, etc. Being but little acquainted in the place, Dr. Tevis applied to the editor of the Champion, Governor Martin's paper, for the desired information. He received the following reply: "Mr. Remsburg entertains some theological opinions which I do not indorse, and if your clerical friend can demolish them I shall be glad to hav him do so. But if he has no better arguments than those he is evidently hoping to obtain from Atchison he had better assign the task to a more competent man. Tell your friend that Mr. Remsburg has been a respected citizen of this state for eighteen years; that during this time the people hav elected him to offices of trust and honor, and that, so far as his domestic relations are concerned, he stands above reproach."

What an eye heaven must hav! Actress Maude Stewart died at the rooms of Actor Frederick de Belleville, Sunday night, the 4th inst. Mr. De Belleville's grief over his loss was great and sincere. The couple were not married, though Mr. De Bellville said to a friend that they would hav been "if it had been possible for him to wed her according to law. But there were two women who would make him trouble, and Maude was already the wife of Ed Marble. In the sight of heaven, however, they were man and wife." Miss Stuart, or Mrs. Marble, was Mr. De Belleville's third affinity; he was her second. These folks are not freelovers, but only children of the world and Christians, therefore heaven had its eye upon them, and it was all right. But if they had been "freelovers" what a moral might hav been pointed!

By strict attention to business, Eli Perkins has won the enviable reputation of being a talented liar. He has also won cash. One of his ways of winning the latter article is to lecture for Sunday-schools and churches; and to procure these engagements he sends out a large advertising sheet filled with recommendations and quotations from his writings. A strong point with him is the "showing of the sophistry of the Infidel," in which he quotes a minister as thanking him for telling "how to handle Ingersoll and Infidelity." This is all very well; Mr. Ingersoll and the Infidels can stand it; but Mr. Perkins might hav a more honest title to defender of the faith if he ceased to print among the extracts from his own writings a very much mangled paragraph from Colonel Ingersoll's "Man, Woman, and Child." Dishonest Christians are common enough, and Mr. Perkins's precedure elicits no surprise, but when some of his ministerial friends find him out explanations will be awkward.

Judge Parker, of the United States District Court for the western district of Arkansas, has sentenced some seven unfortunates to be hanged by the neck till dead at Fort Smith, on April 23, 1886. This happens to be Good Friday, the day commemorated as the anniversary of the crucifixion of Christ, and a Southern crank wants the judge to postpone the execution so as to respect the "religious sentiment of the country." Hanging is the worst possible use a man can be put to, but if he has got to hang, Good Friday is as good a day as any. Besides, the man whose execution it recalls was crucified as a seditious person.

With its issue of April 14th, the Investigator entered upon its fifty-sixth volume, and the forty-ninth with Messrs. Mendum and Seaver as managers. We wish our two greatly-esteemed friends many more years of activ work, and all manner of prosperity for the paper. The Investigator is emphatically a good Infidel journal.

There is a general fear among the religious press that if the bill giving the museums extra money for opening on Sundays shall pass the Senate and be signed by the governor the religious fervor of the trustees will not be proof against the temptation to obtain this money. These gentlemen seem to be acquainted with each other.

Upon "Adami and Heva," the Southland says, Mr. Putnam may rest his reputation as a poet. "If Mr. Putnam, the author, had written nothing else, it would entitle him to take rank among the foremost of our living poets." Yet, as ever since its publication, we shall continue to mail the poem for ten cents.

The Mt. Desert Herald, of Bar Harbor, Me., will please accept our thanks for courtesies extended. The Herald, we may add, for the information of our Maine subscribers, is a first-class weekly local journal with an Infidel editor.

The Montreal Witness says that the sacrilegious act of the city of Paris in removing the name of the deity from the primers used in the Parisian schools will certainly meet with divine vengeance. This, of course, is authoritativ.

A new thirty-two page quarto catalog of the Truth Seeker Company's publications has just been printed, and will be sent free upon application.

Friendship Liberal League held a meeting in the hall at Ninth street and Girard avenue, Sunday evening, April 4th. Professor William D. Atkinson delivered a lecture on "Paleolithic Man of the Stone Age." He said: "If it had not been for the discovery of implements of flint, stone, and bone, the paleolithic age would hav been an utter blank and paleolithic man would hav passed into oblivion. These stone sermons show the utter littleness of the dogma of man's recent civilization. The man of the paleolithic age experienced the glacial period. He attained his summit in that period and then passed away and a new man made his appearance. The paleolithic age then gave place to the neolithic age, or more particularly the reindeer period, called so on account of the numerous remains of reindeer that hav been found in England, Italy, and France. As the reindeer never abounds in the tropics, this proves that the glacial period extended far into the stone age. As the glacial period receded the reindeer and the paleolithic man receded with it. I believe to-day that the Esquimau is the descendant of the paleolithic man. The reindeer was to him as it is to the Laplander to-day—the most precious gift of nature." The professor with the aid of the magic lantern showed several scenes from these two periods.

W. S. Bell writes: "I left Chicago on the 5th inst. for the small town of Cherokee, near the northwestern corner of the state of Iowa, where I arrived next morning, and was met at the cars by our Liberal friend, Mr. Charles Goldsbury, a very prominent man and activ Liberal. The people here hav never heard a Liberal lecture, and, as a matter of course, the pious sort are scandalized, and don't see why such persons as Infidels are allowed to speak against the Bible and the church. I hav publicly offered to debate with any of the ministers of the town, but none of them can be induced to stand up for Jesus. If they do they want to stand up in the coward's castle, the pulpit, where they are in no danger. There was a time whan the cloth would show fight, a time when they would defend the church of the living God, but that time now seems to be past. A minister said to me the other day that he did not think any good would come out of such a discussion. I replied, Let me tell you a little fable: A hen went into the stall of a horse and said to him that she would not tread on his feet if he would not tread on hers; 'For,' she added, 'no good can come out of our tramping on each other's feet.' Wise old hen, wasn't she? I hav given three lectures here to crowded houses, which is a source of great pleasure to the speaker. My new lecture on 'Anti-prohibition,' which I hav recently published, creates quite a great deal of discussion in this state, especially where they now hav an ironclad prohibition law. But it does not work. It is not a success and cannot be. I shall return to Chicago in a few days." Mr. Bell's address is 302 State st., Chicago, Illinois.

Letters from Friends.

KENT, O., April 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Having just read Chas. Remhard's strictures upon THE TRUTH SEEKER'S management for introducing "repulsiv" pictures to its readers, I feel impelled to tell our yesterday's experience. Mr. B. F. Conaway, a former TRUTH SEEKER subscriber, who has been influenced to again renew because he appreciates your picture arguments, in company with the writer dedicated the day to TRUTH SEEKER work. Armed with Bishop Spalding's illustrated quotation and the telling cartoon, "Where Moses Was When the Light Went Out," of your last issue, we went forth to win new friends for your paper, and in seven hours we secured as many new subscribers. On another day the writer visited Ravenna equipped with the cartoon, "A Contribution to the Irish Question," which was shown to fair-minded men, and in six half-hours your subscription-list and our club were aided by the addition of six new names and the necessary cash. Without exception, all saw the force and appropriateness of the illustrated argument. Notwithstanding all objections, giv me the illustrated TRUTH SEEKER when I am called upon to work to gain new subscribers, for without their aid the work of canvassing is doubled.

Yours for wise illustration of THE TRUTH SEEKER,

MARIUS HEIGHTON.

FOREST GROVE, OR., Feb. 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.25, for which you will please forward to my address for another year THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1886.

Yes, I intend to take the fearless, outspoken, Catholic-demolishing, Protestant-leveling, grand old TRUTH SEEKER as long as reason holds its seat, and I intend to pay for it too. But if anything should happen that I could not pay for it, I most certainly would write to you and accept your generous offer to pay when I could. But I hope you won't find many reduced to these extremities. There are lots of Liberals here, but somehow or other they do not appear to patronize Liberal papers very well. I can't account for it. It is not for the lack of filthy lucre, I know, for many are in affluent circumstances. I think there must be a power behind the throne or something of that sort. Mr. or Mrs. So-and-So might not like it, and then the devil would be to pay. I hav very little patience with such. Your illustrations are just grand. The idea of Thomas Paine's works outweighing Beecher and Talmage, the old pope, cross and all, is surely good enough; and then the imploring look of Paddy with his knee-breeches and hands clasped in agony looking after the wind-bags is another good one. You hav undoubtedly struck the keynote in thus illustrating THE TRUTH SEEKER. A great many people like to read pictures, and children especially so. The paper will now reach that class, and there is no predicting the results for good and the spread of Liberal views, which I think are the only rational ones, and which I think will hav to come to the front or our nation and liberties will be swept into oblivion. Every TRUTH SEEKER that I get has got to do missionary work. I keep them going. This makes the bigots nervous, but then I am serene and happy. THOS. G. TODD.

WEST WINFIELD, N. Y., March 29, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I will say right here that I am well pleased with your paper, also the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS. I hav taken three years' ANNUALS and bound them together with a small copper wire, and now they make a valuable book—the portraits of our own and foreign writers and speakers make it valuable to me. D. E. F. BEALS.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., April 2, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As the success of any journal depends upon what its patrons think of it, and as some hav taken occasion to speak out against the cartoons, I wish to giv my opinion also, which is in favor of the illustrations for many reasons. First, they show up theology in its true light, and to many that otherwise would never see it as it really is, absurd and spurious. George Krahmer, in No. 14, has some objection to the cartoons and apologizes for them to his friends, one of whom says, "The picture was horrible." "This," he says, "has not encouraged me to solicit much since, especially among the ladies." Now we hav never yet seen any pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER we thought more horrible to ladies than to gentlemen. Horrible! they are, we admit. But is not the thing they represent also horrible? It is impossible to make a nice picture of an ugly thing. The picture of "The Surprise Party" is both horrible and ridiculous, but we think not so much so as the damnable idea and falsehood it represents. "The Journey of Jonah" is not more ridiculous than the Bible account of the same, which is gulped down by many as easily as the fish swallowed Jonah. The picture of the pope is no more horrible than his rule. Brother Krahmer further says (and he has a right to his say and opinion, as any one): "I fail to learn how these pictures are to be productiv of any good," etc. Well, first they reach the eyes of the children, and rouse a curiosity that the paper otherwise never could; they are quickly read and understood. Since the cartoons hav appeared my neighbors' (church-members) children hav been anxious to see them, and come to see "what is in THE TRUTH SEEKER this week;" and such questions as the following are asked: "Could a man liv three days in a fish's belly? What is sheol? Who built it? Who made the devil?" and many other of a like nature which we take pleasure in answering to the best of our ability, and the unanimous opinion is that "the Bible is a funny book and God a mighty mean man or thing." "Why not hav pictures in astronomy, geology, or botany, which would be more instructiv?" In answer we will say that such pictures are numerous elsewhere, and those given in THE TRUTH SEEKER nowhere else, and to make successful students of astronomy or geology they must first unlearn theology, which can be done in no better or speedier way than by studying the illustrations of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Therefore, we vote for their continuance. H. H. HUTCHESON.

ROCHELLE, ILL., April 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: In view of the extended trip our worthy secretary now contemplates making in the "far West" and among strangers, I feel it a duty incumbent on me, for the benefit of those who will soon hav the pleasure of meeting him, to relate shortly the impression he made among all of us while here a few days.

Well, we enjoyed it thoroughly, and his visit was delightful. Our orthodox friends who attended the lectures hav now had occasion to learn that we hav indeed an intellectual and moral basis for our "new religion," something they never dreamed of before. His first lecture, "The Demands of Humanity," was good, but the second one, "The New Heaven and Earth," was grand. His manner of delivery is very agreeable, fluent, and earnest, showing entire self-possession, and using neither manuscript, notes, table, or pulpit. He spoke nearly two hours, holding the entire audience spell-bound. I hav heard Phillips, Beecher, Tilton, Ingersoll, and many other famous orators, but, intellectually, hav never been better entertained in my life. This lecture covers nearly the whole ground of the Liberal work laid out, is bubbling over with sound argument, grand and self-evident truths, clinching logic; meets all the popular clamor and objections against the Secular movement, and presents our aim and philosophy in a light so reasonable and beautiful that, wherever delivered, it cannot help but do a vast amount of good, and largely increase the degree of respect and charity now entertained by Christian neighbors toward us. Wherever only one lecture is to be delivered, I trust our friends "out West" will select this.

Socially Brother Putnam is as genial and interesting as any guest it has ever been my privilege to entertain. He seems to be favored by Mother Nature with a free-and-easy disposition, a sound constitution, and that greatest of all blessings, a good liver, and has the very agreeable faculty of being "at home" wherever he is entertained.

I cordially recommend him, socially and intellectually, to the protection of our Western friends. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

LANTON, MO., March 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: After many months' delay, I once more wish to say a few words to your readers. For the last five months the vicissitudes of life with myself and wife hav been very different from our previous married life, consisting of some over thirty-six years. We left our home at St. Johns, Ill., the 22d of October last, on a visit. We first visited a brother in this (Howell) county, Mo. From here we visited another brother, in Ozark county, Mo. From there we went to Jackson county, Ark., where livs another brother. It had been nearly twenty-one years since I had been with this one, who resides in Arkansas, and near twenty-five since I had seen the one who livs in this county. We landed back home the 16th of December, and commenced to make preparations to emigrate to our present place of residence, which was consummated on the 18th of February.

The design of coming to this rocky, rough country was in order to be benefited in health, our health having been very bad for several years. It is true, we feel somewhat lonely in our new locality, being isolated from all our children, and many Liberal friends left behind. But so is life, and a thought presents itself to me that our experience recently has been similar to one of old, whose perambulating excursions are recorded in that book called the word of God. I now refer to his Satanic majesty, who on many occasions when the sons of the Lord congregated together (no doubt to discuss plans for an expedition of plunder and murder)—any way, Satan was possessed of cheek and curiosity sufficient to present himself also, and, on being asked, "Whence comest thou?" answered, From walking to and fro up and down the earth. So hav we been traveling up and down on the cars, and hav come in contact with many differently-constituted minds, and hav been confirmed in my partially-previous opinion that, if Christianity is not a disease, it is something detrimental to progress, and consequently to happiness.

Saturday, Feb. 13th, at 8 P.M., our able friend, W. S. Bell, delivered an address at the City Hall, Du Quoin, Ill., to the organization of the K. of L., which, so far as I could learn, gave satisfaction. By the way, let me say that Brother Bell is an easy and fluent speaker. In addition to this he is a very congenial companion in conversation. It has been my good fortune to hear him deliver two lectures, seven years ago, at Du Quoin, also two this visit he made us. In February his second lecture was on the afternoon of the 14th, at the schoolhouse of St. John's, Ill. His subject was "Liberty and Morality." An English friend, who is pretty well versed on general subjects, said to me it was the best lecture he ever heard. Being now located in a part of the state of Missouri where no Freethinker's voice has ever been heard in public, I fear that we will not hav the pleasure of ever seeing Brother Bell again in earth life; and as for a prospectiv future, Brother Bell and myself hav not yet learned sufficient to pretend to giv any information, or speculate, or dogmatize. As yet to us that is an unknown region. But I will say this, that, if I am situated where we at present are not benefited by Freethought lecturers, while I hav the gift of speech, and occasion requires it, I will be heard in private conversation maintaining truth against error.

I hav not time to wait to learn whether so-called Infidelity is popular or unpopular in the vicinity of my new location. It is enough for me to know that Christianity is a gigantic fraud to oppose the blighting influence. Neither hav I time or patience to enter into the insignificant fault-finding between Materialist and Spiritualist. Oh, how long will it take for those claiming to be Liberals to be emancipated from the dregs of religious prejudice? At the risk of being thought dictatorial, I will say to my Brother Materialists, we hav no fight, or at least we should hav none, with our brothers and sisters of the Spiritualist persuasion. Are not a great majority of them doing as good and noble work in the field of Liberalism as we Materialists are? It appears to me anyone whose mind is stored with a general knowledge in regard to the matter, and is not contracted with some pet hobby, can discover this fact. Although I hav not yet learned that we will survive the dissolution of the body, or that spirits exist and can communicate, I think it would be presumptuous in me to say no one else has ever learned those things. No, I will leave those responsibilities for more daring ones to perform. I am not yet prepared for such an emergency. I greatly desire to see those claiming the name Liberals grow out and stand above such ostracism. Some among both wings of Liberalism are even so sensitiv as to seem to be jealous of our worthy editor, insinuating that he is partial in publishing letters. Now, I lay no claim to extra insight, but I do take great care to read the items of correspondence, and, for the life of me, I cannot discover wherein Brother Macdonald fails to do his duty as one among the most impartial editors I hav ever read the writings of. On this subject I will now giv you all a rest, hoping never to hav occasion to refer to it again, for to me it is by no means pleasant.

I read with pleasure the letter of our esteemed co-worker, Dr. York, who is battling against superstition in a foreign land; also the letter of Mrs. York. No doubt in my mind we hav hundreds of Liberal women who would be an honor to our cause as writers if they would only apply themselvs to that work. I received two letters from Mrs. Mellie Newkirk, of Illinois, last fall, just previous to starting on our visit. We took the letters with us, and took pride in presenting them to our relativs and friends, in order that they could see the intelligence of women who were developed from the clutches of the church and teachings of priestcraft. I do think that women that are so gifted should feel it at least a duty to giv to the public more of the productions of their fruitful minds.

Dear old TRUTH SEEKER, it has been several months since I hav said anything through your columns, which to me and family hav became so very dear that it seems to us to be essential to our happiness to read its pages, which we hav been doing over twelve years.

My subscription expires the 4th of April. Inclosed you will find $2, which will pay to Jan. 1, 1887; also $1, for which send me the ANNUAL for 1886; also the "Order of Creation" and "Bible Morals," all included, $3.

Wishing you a long and useful life, I remain

Yours fraternally, WM. A. THOMPSON.

ROCK ISLAND, ILL., March 31, 286.

MR. EDITOR: You will see by your books that I hav long been a reader of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER—grand for many reasons. First, because D. M. Bennett, its first editor, was a noble specimen of humanity. He had that integrity of purpose that caused him to face a thirteen months' imprisonment in Albany penitentiary in the interest of truth, science, and a free press, rather than truckle to that iniquity of all iniquities—the Christian church, that fruitful mother of superstition, ignorance, and crime. It was too late in the nineteenth century to pile the green wood about the grand old hero's body, so they did the next best thing they could under the circumstances. I hav been well pleased with the course pursued by THE TRUTH SEEKER editor in this. He seems to giv a respectful attention to all phases of Liberal thought. The reports of the Manhattan Liberal Club, I think, are especially interesting. When will the Christian minister standing in a Christian pulpit dare invite a ten minutes' criticism from his audience of his last hour's mystification of the word of God. I think the Tent enterprise of last season, whether a financial success or not, is one of the best ways of reaching a class of people that could not be reached in any other way. The great misfortune to humanity is the Christian church gets hold of nearly every child, and in their Sunday-schools his mind is perfectly demoralized. They are made to believe that a man can go straight up to heaven with a coach-and-four starting from Wall street, New York. If the little ones of America could be gathered together every Sunday for an hour and be taught by men and women to believe the universe is governed by law, ignorance and superstition would vanish as the mists of night flee before the rising sun. This theme is endless, so I must break the connection here. Inclosed please find money order to renew my subscription and for a few other things, per memoranda.

Yours, for the advancement of truth and science,

J. L. BEAN.

MINDEN, NEB., March 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Several of your valuable papers having come into my hands through Liberal friends, and not seeing any communications from this part of Nebraska, I thought I would endeavor to giv you a few items. I was visiting a Free Methodist neighbor the other day, and while there picked up a paper (the Free Methodist) published at Chicago. My attention was soon attracted to an article entitled, "A Plea for our Denominational Schools." I read it, and was surprised at the outspoken language used in that "plea" against their people sending their children to the common schools. And now I am going to giv you a few facts in regard to the handful of that denomination living in our own school district. Ever since we organized a district we hav had school in a sod school-house, and they held their meetings there without opposition till last fall, when we built a nice frame house, and the school board refused to giv them leave to hold a protracted meeting in it. Now they hav sent off to one of their denominational schools at Orleans, Neb., nearly as much money as our house cost, and they are still dependent on our school-house for their meetings. Not being satisfied with the decision of the board, they circulated a petition in the district to hav the house opened to moral meetings (which meant their meetings, of course), and through misrepresentations of one kind and another got most of the voters of the district to sign it. Then they held a protracted meeting eight weeks with very little effect, and when they got through the house would not hav been healthy for pigs. Each night they would take for their text, tobacco, and hammer away, and, of course, the boys who used tobacco would do their best to use as much as possible while they talked. Now, it does seem strange to me that decent people must be taxed to build and keep up a school-house to be ruined and torn down by Christianity. I do not see why our legislators should not pass a law saying whether or not our school-houses are school-houses or church houses.

Yours, D. S. NEWBOLD.

BARRE, MASS, March 29, 286.

MR. EDITOR: If "A. Bates" (Homer, N. Y.) has "taken your valuable sheet for seven or eight years," he cannot hav read it very carefully, else why does he inquire in March 28th, "I would like to ask Ella Gibson why she is willing to take Mr. Truesdell's statement that he does it, and not put him to the test," since not taking his statement, and putting him to the test, is the very thing I claim to hav done in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 5, 1885; January 23, 1886; February 27, 1886, to which numbers I would most respectfully refer A. Bates, asking him to read carefully and weigh candidly before again accusing me of believing instead of knowing. Is not almost my entire "Barre Seances," in Dec. 5th, test that I saw with my own eyes? He can doubt my word and ability, but how can he doubt my statement? Did not I say in January 23d, in reply to Mr. Burdick's flings and assertions of what he knew that Ella Gibson knew, which made me out a hypocrit and liar, that I "did not take 'Mr. Truesdell's assertions,' but the evidence of my 'own senses instead;'" and then, again, as recently as February 27th, in answer to repeated false statements, similar to the one I am now refuting, did I not restate that I did not take Mr. Truesdell's word alone for my authority, but knew for myself by saying: "I know Mr. Truesdell performed the manifestations himself in the case contested, he did not tell me so for I saw him do them," and then I detail how I saw him do them, and yet in the face of all this authority for my knowledge of these facts, A. Bates calls out: "I would like to ask why she is willing to take his statement that he does it and not put him to the test?"

Verily, verily, A. Bates's taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for seven or eight years has been with little profit, in this case, if he has read so carelessly as not to understand that I did "put Mr. Truesdell to the test," and did not "take his statement," but had him come to my home for the very purpose of this trial, which has satisfied me fully. How many times more shall I hav to burden THE TRUTH SEEKER with my reiterations that I "saw with my own eyes, and tested Mr. Truesdell beyond a doubt, others seeing also." ELLA E. GIBSON.

VESTULA, IND., March 25, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed is for three copies of the last TRUTH SEEKER (March 20th). It contains many articles of merit, as is always the case with every number, but the prize piece is M. R. Teesdale's reply to John Hindman, the twelve-thousand-mile man. One would think Hindman would now let silence proclaim his wisdom (?) for a short time at least. Your readers out here are waiting anxiously for his diagram. The illustrations in THE TRUTH SEEKER are just the thing; they place the paper beyond comparison with any other Liberal journal in the world. Watson Heston is indeed a grand artist. What has become of M. Babcock? Every sentence he used to write was a gem of itself.

I will close by asking some of your scientific readers to please explain why the moon looks the largest when it first rises, and, second, what causes the roaring in our lakes when they are covered with ice. MISS E. M. BERRY.

PARSONS, KAN., March 29, 286.

MR. EDITOR: I see my time is up for the paper. Inclosed find $3. I had the promis of two more subscribers, but times are terribly hard, and they can't send at present.

We had three good lectures here this winter, by J. L. Andrew, that did good work. The next week after Mr. Andrew's lectures Mr. I. E. Wilson, a farmer friend of mine, had a four nights' debate with a Dunkard preacher six miles northeast of Parsons, on the "Inspiration of the Bible." The house was crowded every night. Mr. Wilson is a calm, clear reasoner, and all admitted that he was too much for the preacher. The debate ended Saturday night. Sunday night a Methodist preacher gave a lecture on the same subject, and put in most of his time in personal abuse of Ingersoll. Fine argument to prove the Bible the word of God!

On Monday night another sky-pilot spoke for three hours. Nearly all of his discourse, also, was personal abuse of Infidels, and falsehoods. When he was through I asked for the school-house Wednesday night. Two of the school board gave their consent. One old man jumped up and objected. I got the house, but it rained very hard, and the crowd was not large. I spoke about an hour—every blow square from the shoulder. Mr. Wilson asked for the school-house the next Sunday night, but two of the school board were church-members. They had had enough. So they refused to let him hav the house, and took refuge in the coward's castle.

I write this to let you see we are not idle, and we are gaining ground steadily. When I settled here sixteen years ago I was the only Infidel in the neighborhood. Now I hav lots of Infidel neighbors, and, best of all, nearly every young man and boy here is an Infidel. The old men we can't change, but we are getting all the boys. We should always be kind to the young folks; giv them something to read, and start them to thinking. Get the young with us, and the old will soon die off.

I want to say to our Liberal lecturers that we old Infidel farmers are like John the Baptist—preparing the way before them. Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER. J. F. HARRIS.

MERIDEN, CONN., March 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: More than forty years ago there were but three churches, and two secret societies requiring as a condition of membership a belief in the Bible being a divine revelation from God, and but one fearless, outspoken Infidel, in our town. The disciples of the Second-Advent-mills pitched their tent on one of our highest hills and principal street and hung their prophetic banners on its canvased back walls, warning our people of the second coming of Christ and urging them to flee from the wrath to come and singing:

O ye young, ye gay, ye proud!
When you die you'll wear the shroud.
Then you'll cry and want to be Happy in eternity.

One of the most conspicuous revivalists, a middle-aged Scotchman, after delivering an earnest prayer, rousing the large audience up to the utmost enthusiasm, would wave them to their feet with:

On Jordan's stormy banks I stand and cast a wishful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land where my possessions lie.
O Canaan, bright Canaan, I'm bound for the land of Canaan.
When you hav been there ten thousand years, bright, shining as the sun,
You hav no less days to sing God's praise than when you first begun.

(Only think of Jonah in the last TRUTH SEEKER sitting forever in that hot sun.) Not being content with obeying the Bible injunction of multiplying the earth with about a dozen children, his days were soon numbered here, he having disgraced one of our most respectable widow's families by seducing one of her daughters, then added insult to the outrage by publishing a chapter from divine revelation about harlots betraying the sons of God. Up to the time when Colonel Ingersoll delivered his first lecture here a few years ago about the "Gods" and "Ghosts," the truly good people of God hav had their own undisputed way, and told the same old story, built ten or a dozen churches, organized fifteen or twenty more secret societies, and continue to camp out every year, not on Jordan's stormy banks in the New Jerusalem, but down in Old Haddam on the Connecticut river, to preach about and pray for the coming of that fellow in the clouds to knock everything and everybody into smithers for the especial benefit of the select few that he has fooled so many times.

After forty years of travel through the wilderness of superstition and credulity,

The morning light is breaking,
The darkness disappears,
And Zion's sons are waking
To crocodile's tears over the boys selling papers and the cars running through town on Monday, and the lectures of Ingersoll, Underwood, and Remsburg—the last of which was delivered in the largest hall in town before a large and appreciativ audience two weeks ago, notwithstanding Emma Abbott with her English opera troupe performed at our opera house and one of our prominent clergymen lectured on London the same evening. If either of the gentlemen favors us with his presence again he will no doubt be welcomed with much larger audiences, for instead of one Infidel we hav hundreds of them now, and the people are getting tired of spending their money on monstrous claims as false as sheol and a fabled heaven that has not as much substance as the faintest glimmer of moonshine. Herewith please find draft for $10, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER as indicated, "The Order of Creation," Ingersoll's Tributes, and Watts's Annual; balance to Bruno Fund. Truly yours, N. F. GRISWOLD.

MAITLAND, MO., April 4, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: For a long time I hav been convinced that Liberals as such should take a more decided position and demand the recognition of their principles in such a way as would bring practical results. Our principles and demands are right and just, and for the best good of the most people, and when they are once brought squarely before the people in a way that all will hear them, they will be weighed by them and we need hav no fear of the results. My experience is that when you can get people to hear and read our principles and reflect upon them we are always the gainers. What we want is discussion and ventilation of our principles. And here let me ask, by what means could this be more thoroughly done than by political campaigns? At the next presidential election put our man up for president and make the race with the Nine Demands of Liberalism as our platform. We might not, nor do we expect to, elect him, though the result might surprise many of us very much. Many a man who now goes quietly along doing his own thinking and saying nothing would slip in a vote, and we would find many more to really be Liberals whom we had previously thought to be Christians; while the bringing forth upon the stump in every town and village such facts as are brought forth in the addresses of Messrs. Duryea, Wakeman, and Hawes before the Ways and Means Committee of the New York Assembly would be fraught with such results as would astonish even the Liberals themselvs. Our people are quick to see their own interests when they once hav it brought squarely before them and are equally as quick to adopt them when once seen. And again let me ask, by what means could these things be more quickly and thoroughly brought before the people than by a political campaign? Our first candidate might be beaten, but I do not believe the second one could be. With such a man as Ingersoll at the head, and such men as Wakeman, Remsburg, Jamieson, Bell, Peck, and scores of others that we know, and many others that now we do not know, to stump every state, the results would be a surprise and of vast importance. It might be argued that we are not sufficiently organized, but would not this be the quickest and surest means of organization? Let us hear from others.

H. B. MAXWELL.

BLACK HILLS, DAK., March 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav for the last two years been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and feel a steadily growing interest in it and the cause it defends, I would like to say a few words about this place. Lead City is a little mining town with about 1,600 people, but has in spite of its small size no less than three churches; so you see the church is strongly represented here. But it is seldom any service is held in these churches, from which I conclude that orthodoxy has a far weaker hold on the minds of the people than its buildings are made to show. I hav been distributing some copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and tracts, but not with much effect. With others I hav been arguing on religion, often in a pretty hot discussion, and although they used the best of Bible arguments, common sense has set many of them thinking, and a few hav been convinced of their error. We hav some Liberals, but not many of them outspoken in that line for fear of being disfavored by the Christians. There is also a hall called the Miners' Union Hall, where a Freethought lecturer could speak to a large audience, if we could get the lecturer. I myself was once a Christian religionist, but, being fond of reading, I happened to get hold of THE TRUTH SEEKER and read some of Ingersoll's books, and read them over and thought over them, finding the Bible inconsistent with every principle of science, justice, and common sense, and so I threw the old superstition away, and asserted the Liberal doctrins as expounded in your paper, and which in my humble opinion is the way Mother Nature has destined for her children. How much much more glorious, is it not, how much more pleasant and peaceful to the mind, to believe in her teachings rather than the horrible and cruel creeds of the Christian religion? E. PEDERSEN.

WEST SUTTON, MASS., March 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year, and $2 for "Men, Women, and Gods," the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL," "Sabbath Breaking," and "Bible Morals."

It is quite difficult to obtain subscriptions here for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Most of the people are a short-eared kind of Balaams, who choose to be ridden by expounders of the hard-shellism.

I hope the day will come when THE TRUTH SEEKER will gain the victory, and the people rejoice to experience the freedom of its Nine Demands for equal rights and justice, and when its demands will be extended to the rights of women. Grant strong-minded girls and women liberty and equality, and see how many liv old maids intentionally.

J. E. PHELPS.

SALAMANOA, N. Y., April 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to announce through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER that the April number of the Freethinkers' Magazine contains Thaddeus B. Wakeman's great speech on "The Political and Social Dreams of Thomas Paine," the same as heretofore published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, in clear, large type, revised by the author, with explanatory foot-notes added; also this number contains the able Memorial Address recently delivered by L. K. Washburn, on the life and character of Elizur Wright, in Paine Hall, Boston, before the Ingersoll Secular Society; also an essay by Hon. A. B. Bradford on "The Fall of Man and Endless Punishment," an article by J. Wm. Lloyd on "Religion," and an original poem by Courtlandt Palmer, entitled, "An Easter Rhapsody," besides much more valuable reading matter. The price of the number is 25 cents, and it can be had at THE TRUTH SEEKER office or of the publisher,

H. L. GREEN.

GREELEY, COL., April 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed 75 cents for ANNUAL and "Men Women, and Gods." I hav a good many back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a few numbers of Freethinkers' Magazine, which I will send to any Freethought lecturer for distribution, if the lecturer will giv me his address.

This is quite a Liberal town, and if Putnam, on his way to the far West, will stop here, I think he will meet with a host of friends, and perhaps financial success.

J. W. LEIGHTON.

JUNCTION CITY, KAN., March 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. S. G. Winters, of Miltonvale, Kan., for seven years a subscriber to the old TRUTH SEEKER, passed to the land "beyond the river" on February 26th last, his wife having passed over about three months before. Mr. Winters was one of the few outspoken, true Liberals of Kansas, and would always giv for the struggling cause of universal liberty freely. He was one of the true nobility of nature, and the weary lecturer always found a haven of rest and welcome in his humble Western home. D. C. SEYMOUR.

NEWTON, KAN., March 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: C. W. Stewart, of Liberal, Mo., has just closed a course of lectures here on "Evolution." The meetings were largely attended by the most respectable and intelligent citizens of our city. Mr. Stewart was highly recommended to us by J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, who also gave us a course of lectures last fall. Our expectations were more than realized in Mr. Stewart as a gentleman, a fine scholar, and an able advocate of the doctrin of evolution. He makes strong points and he has the happy faculty of making what has generally been considered an intricate and complex subject quite plain and highly interesting to his hearers. Those who desire to hear truth fairly and convincingly presented will do well to employ this able defender of progressiv principles. Yours for Freethought, J. I. R.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Silver Lining.

A fisherman sat at his door one day
Watching the clouds that, heavy and gray,
Obscured the sunlight's shining;
And he said to Bright Eyes at his knee,
"Look yonder in the west and see
The cloud with a silver lining."

I think when our skies are cold and gray,
And we vainly seek to find the way,
Somewhere the light is shining.
If we bravely resolve to do our part,
And bear our griefs with a patient heart,
And free from all repining,

We shall be led to a higher way,
To a better work than we do to-day,
And find love's sunlight shining;
For truth of spirit and strength of soul
Will make the darkest cloud unroll,
And show its silver lining.

Remember, Boys Make Men.

When you see a ragged urchin
Standing wistful in the street,
With torn hat and kneeless trousers,
Dirty face and bare red feet,
Pass not by the child unheeding;
Smile upon him. Mark me, when
He's grown he'll not forget it;
For, remember, boys make men.

When the buoyant, youthful spirits
Overflow in boyish freak,
Chide your child in gentle accents;
Do not in your anger speak.
You must sow in youthful bosoms
Seeds of tender mercies; then
Plants will grow and bear good fruitage,
When the erring boys are men.

Hav you never seen a grandsire,
With his eyes aglow with joy,
Bring to mind some act of kindness—
Something said to him, a boy?
Or relate some slight or coldness,
With a brow all clouded, when
He said they were too thoughtless
To remember boys make men?

Let us try to add some pleasures
To the life of every boy;
For each child needs tender interest
In its sorrows and its joys;
Call your boys home by its brightness,
They'll avoid a gloomy den,
And seek for comfort elsewhere—
And remember, boys make men.

Androclus.

Androclus was a Roman slave, and is said to hav lived in the early part of the first century.

His master, as the story goes, was very unkind and tyrannical toward him. One day when he could bear the insults and severity of his master no longer, he ran away. A search was made for him, and he was captured and returned to his cruel owner, who to punish him and set an example for other slaves condemned him to be devoured by wild beasts in a circus. Sadly Androclus awaited his fate, from which, it seemed, there was no redress or reprieve. At length the fateful day arrived, and Androclus was led, fainting and trembling, into the arena, where at the same time a hungry lion, almost starved for the very occasion, was loosed from his cage to meet and tear instantly in pieces the unhappy slave. But what was the amazement of the people who had gathered to witness the scene to see the starving lion rush fiercely forward, and then pausing, walk gently toward Androclus and affectionately lick his hand, caressing thus in his dumb way the victim placed there to appease his hunger! The audience sat in speechless bewilderment for a moment, and then cheer upon cheer rent the air as Androclus patted the head of the lion, returning his mute caress.

The story coming to the ears of the emperor, he sent for Androclus, and inquired if he could tell the reason of the action of the lion. Androclus then related that when he ran away from his master he sought refuge in a cave. After awhile a lion came in limping. Something seemed to be the matter with his leg, and he was apparently suffering terribly. Instead of attacking the man, as one would suppose he would do, he held up his paw and moaned. Androclus examined the paw and found it pierced by a thorn, which he carefully extracted. The lion appeared grateful for the relief from pain, and made no effort to hurt him, but, on the contrary, he attached himself to the man, and brought him food, and by his conduct manifested a desire for his companionship and friendship. When Androclus was captured the lion was taken also, but it was not known that the two were friends.

The emperor was so pleased with the story that he ordered Androclus to be set at liberty, and presented him with the lion, who ever afterward followed him everywhere he went, his most faithful friend and attendant.

This story illustrates the fact that kindness and good deeds, done even to animals, hav a wonderful power. We are never sorry for being kind, but unkindness brings not only sorrow to others, but many regrets to all concerned.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—Enigma.

I am composed of 10 letters. My 1, 5, 6, 7, is a part of a house. My 2, 3, 4, a kind of a tree. My 8, 9, 10, 7, 3, is an instrument to handle fire or metals. My whole is the name of a revolutionary general.

2.—Mathematical.

A tree is 100 feet high, and breaks off so the point strikes the ground 60 feet from the root of the tree, the piece that breaks off still remaining connected with the stump. How high is the stump?

Chat With Puzzlers and Others.

H.—When is the time to write? you inquire. Just when you are in the mood, and opportunity offers.

Baker.—Your explanation in last letter is just right, and accords with our own view of the subject. Men and women are not unreasoning brutes, or should not be, but should be governed in all things by judgment and intellect.

Ralph inquires what it means that so large a number of our correspondents are girls. It means that the girls of to-day foreshadow the women of to-morrow, who will be brave, true, intelligent Freethinkers, and not supporters of the church and a false religion.

T. B.—You ask what we consider a good puzzle. To fit our Corner it must not be too long or difficult, and so cleverly and ingeniously constructed that there shall be nothing hidden or ambiguous about the solution. It should be original, instructiv, and not too obscure in meaning.

Our little friends must not be impatient if they do not see their letters in print immediately. They will appear in due time, as space permits.

Dear Miss Wixon: My grandpa has taken The Truth Seekre for three years, and I think the Children's Corner very nice. This is my first letter. I am eleven years old, and go to school every day. I study reading and arithmetic and geography. I think I hav written enough for this time, and if you can read it I would like for you to print it, and I will do better next time.

Yours truly, Sarry Watkins.

Millerstown, March 18, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I saw so many little girls writing I thought I would write too. I am eleven years old, and I hav one brother. He is fourteen years old. I go to school, and am in the Third Reader. Papa got "The Story Hour" for us, and I like it very much. I like the Children's Corner. I hav two birds, one cat, and one dog. Well, I must close for this time. Yours truly, Gracie M. Johnson.

Twin Mound, Kan., March 20, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: Father takes The Truth Seeker and I thought I would write to you. I am nine years old and I go to school and study the Fourth Reader, and arithmetic, and geography, and spelling. We liv on a farm twenty miles from Lawrence and about the same from Topeka. I think the pictures are very funny. This place is called Twin Mound because there are two mounds alike.

Oti Hiatt.

Parsons, Kan., March 23, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am a reader of The Truth Seeker and I thought I would write a few lines for it. I am eleven years old and five feet and three inches in hight. I go to school in the highest room in our building, and am in next to the highest class. We only hav four teachers besides the principal. I like to read the Children's Corner, and I think the pictures of Jonah are very funny. I think I hav written enough this time, and if you think this worth printing I would like to see it in print. From your friend,

Blanche Wellington.

Kerens, Texas, March 19, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: My papa has taken The Truth Seeker ever since the first copy, and I hav never been taught to believe the Bible. I never attended a Sunday-school in my life, but hav been to church through curiosity. I like to read the Children's Corner. I am ten years old, and my name is Tom Paine Vaughn. I hav two sisters older than myself. I hav no pets, but I hav two dolls that I love very much. My mamma and papa and my two aunts that are with us are Infidels, and not afraid to speak what they think. I hav made my letter long enough until I know whether it will be accepted or not.

Tom Paine Vaughn.

Cusseta, Ga., Feb. 14, 1886.

Dear Miss Susan: As I was to-day looking over The Truth Seeker, more especially the Children's Corner, and hav nothing else to do, I will write to you.

We hav a fine school; it numbers sixty. Our principal is married. Cusseta is situated in the southwestern portion of Georgia; it has about six hundred inhabitants. I will attend the commencement in La Grange, Ga., this summer. I will close with much love,

Rosa Nelle.

New Milford, Pa., March 17, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: My parents hav taken The Truth Seeker ever since I can remember. I never took much interest in it until you started the Children's Corner. I think it is very nice. I liv on a farm. We keep sixteen cows, make lots of butter, and send it to New York city. My parents come from the East. I often thought I should like to visit some of the places lying near the water. I think Onset must be a lovely place that you spoke of some time ago.

We hav your picture in the Truth Seeker Annual. I hope I may hav the pleasure of meeting you some time.

I remain yours truly, Cora Grinnell.

New Milford, Pa., March 16, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am a little girl thirteen years old. My father and mother hav separated, and I had no home. So one cold day in February (for it has been dreadful cold in northern Pennsylvania this winter) I started out to find a home. I came to a house that looked so warm and cosy. I went in to see if they would take a little girl to liv with them. I could work some. They were very sorry for me, had me get warm, and gave me some dinner. They said I could come and liv with them. They are Freethinkers and take The Truth Seeker. I like the Children's Corner. I dearly like to read it. I like my new home, for they are kind to me. My new mother has named me May Grinnell. I think when I get to be a big girl I shall be a Freethinker. So good-by for this time. Your friend,

May Grinnell.

Hamilton, March 21, 1886.

My Dear Miss Wixon: We amuse ourselvs on Sunday evenings by reading the Children's Corner and trying to solve the puzzles. I fear that we shall not hav The Truth Seeker much longer, for my father and mother are displeased with the pictures on the front page. I inclose you a puzzle we hav just made up. The answer to Diamond No. 2 is Paris.

I remain, with best wishes,

Sydney C. Littlehales, aged 13.

Vermontville, Mich., April 1, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I hav seen so many little letters in The Truth Seeker that I thought I would like to write one, too. I am ten years old. I go to school. I hav to go a mile. I hav been every day. Our teacher's name is Sarah Bobier. My papa takes The Truth Seeker. I like to read the Children's Corner.

I am afraid I am getting my letter too long, so good-bye. I should like to hav my letter published if you think it good enough.

Yours truly, Ida Muir.

Hartington, Neb., March 26, 1886.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write to you. I am twelve years old. I hav been going to school, but we are having a vacation. My father has taken The Truth Seeker from the first number. He is a Freethinker, and says he likes The Truth Seeker better than any other paper he takes, and I like to look at the pictures and read the Children's Corner. Well, I guess I will close, and if I see this in the Children's Corner I will write again and try to do better.

Yours ever truly, Doy R. Curas.

Havana, Cuba, March 2, 1886.

Our Beloved Miss Wixon: In the Boston Investigator of Feb. 24, 1886, page 4, I observe the following: "The objection is urged against Infidels that, while pulling down another system, they evince no desire to build up one of their own." This reminds me of the old wall that once surrounded this city. Where the old wall once stood are built the finest edifices in Havana, and now there is no wall at all around the city. These finest edifices in place of the old wall are the same as would be colleges and other institutions of science and learning in place of the various systems of humbug called religion; and no wall (religion around the people) at all, in this age of the world, should be built around the city.

The Rev. Kristofer Janson thinks that if a man will get drunk occasionally he can more readily believe in religion. See The Truth Seeker, Jan. 9, 1886, p. 25. As soon as my papa saw it, he exclaimed, "Yes, if a post be set firmly in the ground and tilted in any direction, it can then be more easily tilted in any other direction."

I herewith inclose you a silver milagro (miracle). It represents an eye. In this country the Christian dupe, if he has a sore eye, goes to the Roman Catholic church and makes a promis to a saint, saying that if the saint will cure the eye, he will go to a silversmith, hav a milagro made and present it to the saint. When the eye gets well, he has the silversmith make the milagro for a dollar or so, and he takes that milagro to the church and hangs it upon the saint. The priests collect the milagros from the saints and sell them as old silver, or gold, as the case may be, and thus gull the gawkies out of their money. These milagros are made to represent every organ of the human body, and to represent horses, dogs, and other animals, and in the same way are used for the same purpose. I will here take occasion to say that these milagros used in this way are just as efficient as are prayers, and yield a greater profit to the priest; and then in this country they constitute the principal source of the silversmith's profits. So you see that in this country Christianity is a little more nearly pure than it is in our own benighted states.

I will here take occasion to say to the very many friends from whom I hav received letters that I will answer them in due form before we leave the island.

Because of business, and rheumatism, with which papa is slightly beset, he says he thinks we will remain here till July. All who write me should inclose a five-cent stamp for return postage, and the amount of stamps on the envelope should be five cents. Hoping this may find you well and comfortable, I am for Miss Wixon and the Corner.

Geo. Sam Newton,
Egido No. 2, Havana, Cuba.

[Thanks for the milagro. It is another emblem of the superstition that has enslaved millions, and which I am happy to know our young friend is trying to do his part in wiping out.—Ed. C. C.]

Poetry.

What Then?

Is there a God? "Yes," shouts the parson, hot—
How strange that he should know, while I know not!
But does he know? No more, indeed, than I;
He but believes, and yet "I know!" will cry,
As if belief of knowledge were a well,
All doubting, heresy as black as hell!
Yes, he believes—he says he must believe—
While I cannot, because I can't receive
The writings relativ to God, by men
Who wrote, as is alleged, with inspired pen,
As other than the work of mortals, who,
To hold mankind in thrall, the long bow drew,
And to the very longest arrow's head,
Hitting the mark when reason strong had fled
In fear before the supernatural,
The bowmen's stock in trade and capital.
These archers shot much better than they knew,
Secured a "bag" astonishing to view;
And their successors hav been shooting since.
The peasant bringing down and pampered prince.
But nowadays the evidence is weighed
In reason's scales, by those who can't persuade Themselvs to take, on the mere reading, stock
In stranger tales than those of fabled roc,
Of dodo, dragon, salamander dire—
Reputed it to thrive in hottest fire;
In miracles, so-called—pure jugglery;
In acts of terrible severity,
Committed, says the Word, by the good God,
Who, though all mercy, ruled with iron rod!
Who will believe in God—so says the Word—
Shall soar to heaven like a little bird.
On this belief the parsons rave and rant—
"Believe! be saved!" they cry. But if I can't Believe the book with monstrous stories crammed
By romancers, what then? Why, then, I'm damned!

Bible Morals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Sir: I am sure you will say something real good about my new book in the back part of your paper opposit Voltaire. The title of my book is "Bible Morals." I stole the title from a blasphemer who travels under—often behind—the name of J. E. Remsburg. It is no harm to steal from a man of sin. I will giv some extracts:

1. I accept the Bible as an infallible moral guide, because it is holy. A book that is simply a Bible is not enough. But a holy Bible must be right. Open this book almost anywhere and you will see the holiness pouring out. We who read the Bible every day are all crusted over with holiness so that sin cannot enter. Without this blessed book we would lie and steal and play progressiv pedro and be awful wicked.

2. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it givs three kinds of baptism; with water, with the Holy Ghost, and with fire. Wicked people would rather hav the water last to put out the fire, but that is because they are without grace. It is so long since I hav seen anyone baptized with the Holy Ghost that I can't remember whether the holy man sprinkled on a handful of ghost or led the baptizee down into the ghost and soused him under.

3. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it givs English and American scholars something to do. To sit in a parlor and wrestle with a Hebrew word every day for two or three years broadens a man's mind and keeps him away from the museums where he might become corrupted.

4. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it is so plain.

"He that findeth his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake shall find it." Any boy who cannot understand that at once is too dull a boy to ever become the father of his country, or father-in-law.

5. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it promotes faith. When you come to any account that is nonsensical and impossible, all you need is a renewal of faith.

6. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it givs men and women a chance to earn twenty cents a day in the Methodist Book Concern. A camel can go through the eye of a needle easier than those persons can get rich, therefore they will be sure of the kingdom.

7. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it is responsible for Clark Braden. Clark thinks that if the truth of God abounds more through his lie, the more he lies the more the truth will abound. See? 'Rah for Clark.

8. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it givs us the size and shape of heaven. It is cubical, 144 cubits each way. It is not crowded yet.

9. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because a twenty dollar copy of it looks well on the center-table. And the manufacture and sale of this book givs employment to many pious persons.

10. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because Talmage believes it. If this well-known acrobat had not believed the stories of Jonah, and Noah, and Samson, he would hav been a train-robber or a street-car driver. Let us pray.

11. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because some parts of it cannot be read before a respectable congregation. Anything that is not fit to read must be holy and moral. I will stake my reputation as a logician and a theologian on this statement.

12. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it is a nice thing to kiss. Take an old piece of calfskin and let it be pawed over by twenty-five million men, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of filthiness, or present drunkenness, and any man who would not yearn for a chance to glue his lips to that calfskin is no better than an Infidel, and will go into darkness where there is whaling and smashing of teeth.

13. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because nobody knows who wrote it. An unknown writer, especially if he lived before the flood, and in a barbarous country, is sure to be moral and inspired, probably even holy. Moses would not hav gone into the cleft of rocks and watched the Lord pass by, and said nothing about it for hundreds of years after his death, if he had not been a moral man. An immoral man would hav gone over to neighbor Smith's and told about it the same afternoon.

14. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because it furnishes any argument you want. It favors hate, love, kindness, cruelty, peace, war, freedom, slavery, polygamy, celibacy, laziness, activity, poverty, riches, usury, anything. All the hosts of skepticism cannot move me from any position I may take.

15. I accept the Bible as an i. m. g. because priests can liv on souls, and I propose that they shall be paid in souls hereafter.

"But if the priest buy any soul with his money, he shall eat of it, and he that is born in his house" (Lev. xxii, 11).

I could giv many more extracts showing the great superiority of my book over the other of the same name. I want you to warn all good people against the other book, because it is spurious. Mine is the only real Bible Morals. Please say that my book is a long felt want.

Why is every book that comes out a long felt want? Why don't they make wants of some other material, and why don't they make some short ones? INFIDEL SLAYER.

Book Notices.

THE ORDER OF CREATION: The Conflict between Genesis and Geology. A Controversy between the Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Prof. T. H. Huxley, Prof. Max Müller, M. Réville, E. Lynn Linton. New York: The Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place. Pp. 178. Price, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

Who or what the Truth Seeker Company may be we do not know, but it has certainly laid the reading public under great obligations by reprinting for that public, in a compact and convenient form, the controversy which recently took place in the columns of The Nineteenth Century between those protagonists of theology, science, and antiquity, Mr. Gladstone, Max Müller, Huxley, and Dr. Réville. First Gladstone searchingly reviewed a work by Réville, and set forth his views of the "Dawn of Creation and of Worship" as taught in the book of Genesis. Huxley, in the character, as he puts it, of "a sort of uncommissioned science proctor," took up the cudgels for M. Réville, and made a vigorous reply on the scientific aspects of the question. Then Max Müller put in his word about "The Solar Myths." Then Gladstone rejoined. By this time Réville, who was in Italy, heard of the fray, and getting Gladstone's article replied for himself. Also Huxley came again to the scratch. Finally a Mrs. Linton, who is a "mighty smart" woman, but, alas! what DeQuincey would call "a female Infidel," gets in her work—and characteristically feline work it is.

We do not undertake to pronounce judgment on all the points of the controversy. We, however, believe the Bible, and we believe in the "grand old man," and are ready to back him in a scrimmage like this with all our gold. The controversy is managed, so far as language is concerned, in the most decorous manner. But the hands, though gloved, are the hands of athletes in deadly earnest.—Buffalo Express.

THE Truth Seeker Company of New York has just published in book form the notable articles on "The Order of Creation; or, The Conflict between Genesis and Geology," contributed to the English magazines by William E. Gladstone, Professor T. H. Huxley, Professor Max Muller, M. Réville, and E. Lynn Linton. The articles thus brought together constitute the most valuable and interesting discussion that has been had in recent years regarding the Genesis and Geology controversy.—Buffalo Courier.

ADAMI AND HEVA. A NEW VERSION. By Samuel P. Putnam. Published by the Truth Seeker Company, New York. Price, 10 cents.

This little volume is a beautiful poetic version of the Indian legend of the Garden of Eden. The thoughts of the author are vividly and picturesquely expressed, while the measure and arrangement of the verse show a skilful hand and scholarly conception.—Galveston Daily News.

MEN, WOMEN, AND GODS. By Helen H. Gardener. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1. New York: The Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place.

Though a mere girl in years, Miss Gardener is aged in mental culture and moral strength, and is extremely well fitted as a leader in the path she has chosen. Her book bears evidence of her earnestness of purpose in helping woman to break the shackles which hav so long bound her, and establishes beyond doubt the fact that priestcraft and the church hav caused her disabilities and degradation. Its exposure of Bible myths and the vices, crimes, and inhumanity which are the outgrowths of Christianity, should open the eyes of all rational women. Indeed, were this little volume substituted for the purple velvet prayer-books which women like to hav seen in their possession, it would, no doubt, hav a wholesome effect on their minds. Although it deals with the everyday ills of life, and more especially the wrongs of women, it is not depressing, but heavy only in importance. The unwholesome facts it reveals are relieved by the fine vein of humor and wit which sparkles through almost every page, making truth so palatable to those who hav a horror of "dry reading" that they are fully interested and in sympathy with the subject at once. It advocates justice and denounces wrong, in whatever guise, and, in so doing, brings into play the fireworks of reason and logic, and the batteries of unanswerable argument. And the rattle of artillery and the brilliancy of display surpass any Fourth of July on record.

I hope every Spiritualist woman who can will purchase this book, if for no other reason than to let her Christian neighbor read it and "corner the parson" with its arguments. Miss Gardener is the feminin Ingersoll of the day, and as one of the many of her sex who appreciate her work for woman, I tender her my heartfelt thanks.—Amarala Martin in a Spiritualist paper.

THE RISE OF

INTELLECTUAL LIBERTY

From Thales to Copernicus.

By FREDERIC MAY HOLLAND, Author of "The Reign of the Stoics."

"This is a book not only to be read once, but to be kept and referred to, and pondered over from year to year. It is a guide-book of Liberalism through the past centuries prior to 1600, the era of Copernicus and Bruno. It does not take the place of other histories like Gibbon, Hallam, or Lecky, but it makes them intelligible by pointing out the white light that has been cast upon the lurid clouds of ignorance, superstition, and cruelty, from the little stream of Freethought that has flowed in its ragged, broken, and obstructed course down through the ages which now liv only as our realm of Memory and Admonition."

News of the Week.

PROFESSOR HUXLEY opposes the home rule scheme for Ireland.

THE Baltimore Herald says that Grover Cleveland is a Spiritualist.

THE police arrested eighty-two persons who sold liquor in this city last Sunday.

THE Rev. Mr. Gray, a colored preacher of Denver, Col:, shot a man the other day and is now under bail.

THE Central Labor Union last Sunday passed resolutions proposing to boycott Jay Gould in every way possible.

THE bill providing for the free coinage of silver was defeated in the House on the 8th. A motion to suspend coinage was also lost.

THE Methodists hav just had an important conference, the result being the deposing of three clergymen for ministerial conduct with women.

A FIFTY-FOUR-TON gun was successfully cast at Boston last week. It was the fifth and last of the large rifled cannon ordered by the government.

A WASHINGTON barber kept his shop open on Sunday, the 4th, and shaved President Cleveland. Before night he was arrested for breaking the Sabbath.

UNDER a new pension act those who hav been receiving $8 per month will hereafter get $12. This applies to widows and partially disabled soldiers.

A MAN running for justice of the peace out in Dakota announced that if elected he would marry any couple for a dollar, and would charge nothing unless a christening should result. He was elected by an overwhelming majority.

LUKE LEAKER, 55 years old, of St. Mary's, W. Va., eloped last week with the 11-year-old daughter of Samuel Russell, of the same place. When Leaker returned, Russell shot at him four times with a revolver, one bullet passing through Leaker's breast.

THE Rev. Dr. Bosworth, of Boston, has risen to deny that he ever said he knew "nine ministers who were guilty of gross immorality." The Rev. Mr. Bosworth might hav kept his seat. There was nothing incredible about the statement attributed to him.

THE Rev. J. Benson Hamilton, pastor of a Methodist church in this city, preached last Sunday on "How to Fill Empty Churches." His scheme was to hav sermons illustrated by pictures. He will therefore procure a stereopticon and accompany his remarks with dissolving views.

A FRIGHTFUL railroad accident occurred last week Wednesday near Deerfield, Mass. A passenger train plunged down an embankment two hundred feet high, and ten persons met death by fire or drowning or mutilation. Some thirty others were more or less injured. The disaster was caused by the slumping of the earth under the outer rail where the road curves around a hill above the Deerfield river.

CHARLES H. DAVIS, of Parkertown, N. J., was superintendent of the Methodist Sunday-school in that place. On Sunday night, the 4th, he started to see Miss Florence Parker home, but took her beyond the outskirts of the village and assaulted her. Miss Parker, who is twenty years old, is a member of the Methodist church, but is otherwise of unblemished reputation. Davis fled and cannot be found. He leaves a wife.

GLADSTONE'S long-talked-of speech on the question of home rule for Ireland was safely delivered on Thursday of last week. He proposed to giv Ireland a parliament of its own, with the 101 present members of the British Parliament as the first members of the Irish Parliament. The viceroy should be retained, and the disabilities resting on Roman Catholics should be removed. Mr. Gladstone spoke for more than three hours, the House of Commons being crowded to its utmost capacity.

THE railroad strike centering at St. Louis, Mo., is still unsettled. On Friday, the 9th, seven persons were shot down by the deputy sheriffs employed to watch the property of the railroad company. There was apparently no provocation for the act, as only one of the persons shot was a striker, and he had committed no act of violence. One of the victims was a woman. The deputies gave themselvs up to the authorities and were placed in jail for protection from the mob. The Knights of Labor condemn and repudiate violence on the part of the strikers and demand that all guilty of overt acts should be brought to justice. The presence of troops in St. Louis will probably prevent any further outbreak.

Odds and Ends.

"SAY, John, I see they hav found out what run into the Oregon." "No, what was it?" "Water."

THE Smith College girls hav organized a society for the protection of birds. The larks of the young gentlemen will receive their first attention.

"MAMMA, is it true that God makes all little boys?" "Yes, dear." "Well, I hav been looking at my legs and my arms very carefully, and I don't see any stitches."

BEING remonstrated with for wearing a bustle, a Burlington girl silenced her critic by saying, "Well, we girls, like everybody else, must hav something to fall back on."

"I LIKE smart women well enough," said Fenderson, "but I wouldn't care to marry a woman who knew more than I did." "And so," suggested Fogg, "you hav been forced to remain single."

A BOSTON lady last summer attended a funeral in a country church. After the singing of a hymn a man who was sitting beside her remarked: "Beautiful hymn, isn't it, ma'am? The corpse wrote it."—Utica Eagle.

FATHER (starting down-town): "Yes, Robert, my son, keep in mind what your mother says, and always say please. Though a little word, it indicates the gentleman. Here, wife, hold my overcoat and hat; be quick about it."

AN Irishman from the country was standing on one of our wharfs the other day gazing very thoughtfully at a large anchor lying close by. A policeman came along and told him to move on. "Divil a bit will I move on until I see the man that uses that pick," pointing to the anchor.

A COUNTRY minister who, in addition to his clerical duties, followed the profession of a photographer, was called upon to perform the marriage ceremony. "Now, then, young man," he said to the groom, who was nervous and excited, as all grooms ought to be, "just keep your eye on that crack in the wall, and try and look pleasant."

AT a recent dinner party the subject of eternal life and future punishment came up for a lengthy discussion, in which Mark Twain took no part. A lady near him turned suddenly toward him, and exclaimed: "Why do you not say anything? I want your opinion." Twain replied, gravely: "Madame, you must excuse me. I am silent of necessity. I hav friends in both places."

GENERAL STEVENSON relates the following incident of the war. He said that in his command was a very devout and energetic chaplain, exceedingly earnest in regard to the spiritual welfare of the soldiers, especially before going into battle. "The preacher," said General Stevenson, "came down to where Billy Wilson's Zouaves were encamped, and had a talk with Billy. He said that his efforts had been wonderfully blessed; that he had baptized fifty men from one regiment, a hundred from another, and so on, enumerating the fruits of his religious labor, and he suggested to Billy that as they were on the eve of a battle it would be well for him (the chaplain) to talk with Billy's men. Billy was very proud of his command, and he turned to the chaplain and said: 'That ain't necessary; I'll save you that trouble. Adjutant,' said he, calling an officer, 'you just go and make a detail of three hundred men, and take 'em down to the creek and hav 'em baptized. No d——d regiment in this corps shall go ahead of Billy Wilson's Zouaves.' And," continued the general, laughing heartily at the reminiscence, "blamed if the adjutant didn't obey Billy's orders."

CLERGYMAN: "I was disappointed not to see you at prayer-meeting last evening." Deacon: "I wanted to come; but, you see, we are having a clearing-out sale, and we kept the store open until ten o'clock." Clergyman (sadly): "Ah, my friend, I am sorry to see you try to serve heaven and mammon at the same time." Deacon: "I don't try. I never think of serving heaven in my store. I'm not the man to mix my religion with business."

THE LORD WAS IN THE HOUSE, BUT THE DEVIL WAS IN THE STOVEPIPE.

The Rev. Dr. Jones was a well-known Presbyterian preacher. Just after he had finished his theological course, the tremulous thought—a thought which, it seems, had never occurred to him before—of facing a large and fashionable audience began to oppress him. He at length asked permission to experiment with a small congregation in the country. The request, of course, was granted. He was not at all embarrassed when he stood in the presence of the modest country people, and he at once began to preach with a fearless ardor. His eloquent utterances grew warmer and warmer. An old negro, unable longer to restrain his feelings, sprang to his feet and began to shout. The wild hallelujahs, the violent acknowledgments of sanctity, and the eccentric didoes of the old negro annoyed the doctor. It would not do, though, to command him to desist, for he saw that the people looked with profound reverence at the performance. Old Ike, for such was his name, receiving an unexpectedly strong twinge of the "'fluence," leaped high into the air. When he came down the stovepipe fell. The doctor, probably moved by the sudden faith, cried out:

"Pick it up, Uncle Ike; it won't burn you."

The negro seized the pipe with both hands. He dropped it, cast a reproachful look at the preacher, and said:

"De hell it won't."

The devout people, forgetting that the flesh is under "cut-throat" mortgage to the devil, roared with laughter, and the preacher, observing old Ike looking at his hands and shaking his head, snorted and brought the sermon to a close.

"Why didn't you hold on to it, Ike?" some one asked.

"W'yn't who hol' on ter it?"

"You, of course."

"'Ca'se I wa'n't dar ter hol' on ter it. Wa'n't my bidnez ter hol' on ter it jes' at dat time. Lemme tell yer dis fack. De Lawd mout o' been somewhar in de house, but de old debil wuz in dat stovepipe, sho."—Arkansas Traveler.

Gems of Thought.

THE ways of Providence indeed are inscrutable, and if his apologists speak truly he is guilty of deeds that the worst man living would blush to be caught at.—D. M. Bennett.

IN things of the mind, we look for no compulsion but that of light and reason.—Oliver Cromwell.

No wonder that fable is the enemy of knowledge. A man with a false diamond shuns the society of lapidaries, and it is upon this principle that superstition abhors science.—Ingersoll.

OH, may I join the choir invisible
Of these immortal dead who liv again
In minds made better by their presence; liv
In pulses stirred to generosity;
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night-like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vaster issues. —George Eliot.

THAT the devil should appear personally to the son of God is certainly not more wonderful than that he should, in a more remote age, hav appeared among the sons of God, in the presence of God himself, to tempt and torment the righteous Job. But that Satan should carry Jesus, bodily and literally, through the air—first to the top of a high mountain, and then to the topmost pinnacle of the temple—is wholly inadmissible; it is an insult to our understanding.—Dr. Giles's Christ. Records.

SINGULAR as it may seem that the juice of the soma-plant should be at once an object sacrified on the altar to other gods and a God himself, such a confusion of attributes will be less surprising to those who are familiar with the Christian theory of the atonement, in which the same God is at once the same person who decrees the sacrifice, the person who accepts it, and the victim. At least, the double function of soma is less perplexing than the triple function of Christ.—Amberley.

PER CONTRA.—There is no one book, in any language, or in any country, which can, in any degree, be compared with the Bible for antiquity, for authority, for the importance, the dignity, the variety, and cnriosity of the matter it contains.—Bishop Porteous. [Porteous died in 1808, and in his day he was considered a shining light; but we donbt if many of the bishops of the church of England would talk so at the present day. If they did, many more would laugh at them than the numbers that wonld, with open mouths, listen to them. The good prelate doth, methinks, protest too strongly.—C.]

To believe in Jesus as the Christ, as the savior of the world, is to believe in him as the God, as the creator of the world. Then, not only was the man Jesus born in Bethlehem, and crucified, but God, "the soul that standeth in the bodies of all beings"—the spirit, not of our body, but of all the millions of worlds that exist in the vast idea which we call space—was born and crncified on the earth; that is, the one great, all-filling spirit of the nniverse, which dwells in unconnted worlds, in stars, millions of miles away, and which are more than a million times as large as the earth, was born in a manger and put to death on a cross, in a forgotten place on one of the smallest bodies in the heavens! Absurd as snch an idea is, we mnst believe it in order to be Christians.—L. K. Washburn.

MEN tell us that this life of itself is not worth living, when the trnth is that people hav been so taken up with dreams and unrealities in the skies that the realities of this life, with its changing snnshine and shadow, laughter and tears, joy and sorrow, hope and despair, truth and falsehood, strength and weakness, and all its infinit possibilities of improvement, tears to be dried, prisons to be demolished, sickness to be lessened, poverty, sqnalor, and filth to be annihilated, and liberty to be won, that they hav never yet felt one hundredth part of its power to inspire and ennoble. If we could get away from the courts and pomps of imagination which men hav built in the skies, we should soon discover, like the banished Duke in Shakspere, that this our life

Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in everything.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 13. No. 17. PUBLISHED WEEKLY. New York, Saturday, April 24, 1886. 33 CLINTON PLACE. $3.00 per year

THE COLOSSUS OF NEW YORK.

INTRODUCING ARCHBISHOP CORRIGAN, BY GRACE OF GOD SPIRITUAL PRINCE, AND BY GRACE OF TAMMANY HALL AND THE BOODLE ALDERMEN POLITICAL SOVEREIGN OF MANHATTAN ISLAND.

Notes and Clippings.

THE managers of several New York theaters hav been induced to close their houses on good Friday, which comes on the 23d inst.

HENRY GEORGE says "the lesson, practically, of Sunday-school and church is, 'Be good, that you may die rich and leave a lot of money.'"

COMPARISON shows that the criminals of Great Britain average eighteen pounds less in weight and two inches less in hight than the law-abiding population.

IN officiating at an installation in Boston last week the Rev. R. R. Meredith assured the new pastor that there were more cranks in that city than in any other.

THE Augusta, Ga., presbytery refuses to prefer charges against Professor Woodrow on account of his belief in evolution, although several of his brethren are hot after him with undeniable accusations of heresy.

GOVERNOR PATTISON, of Pennsylvania, has been investigating the soldiers' orphan schools of that state. The report says that the children are treated "worse than brutes." The superintendent, Dr. Higbee, and the inspector, the Rev. J. W. Sayers, hav been removed.

THE treasury department has decided that a figure of St. Joseph, painted glass windows, and a Bible, sent from Dusseldorf to New York as a present to the chapel of the Sacred Heart at Tompkinsville, Staten Island, are entitled to free entry, but that articles forming parts of a church altar, including a railing of wood, a wooden cross, and brass candelabra, a table and pedestal, several chairs and benches, and a number of photographs of scriptural subjects, which were similarly presented to said church, are properly subject to duty under existing laws.

THE clergy are coming to the fore in the discussion of the labor troubles. The Rev. N. Wardener, president of the General Conference of the Wesleyan Methodists, sends to Jay Gould "my congratulations for the stand you hav taken against the would-be despotism of the secret banditti known as the Knights of Labor."

ONCE in a while a true Christian is found. The New York Sun relates that a woman in a remote Maine village, crazed by excessiv Bible reading and revival excitement, endeavored to gouge her eye out, and afterward cut off an arm with an ax, in order to obey the injunction, "If an eye offend thee, pluck it out," etc. She is recovering, but is still insane.

AN act known as Assembly Bill No. 368 is greatly agitating the moral and religious community of New York. It is called a bill to prevent contagious diseases, and provides for a committee to be chosen to enter houses of immoral resort, and examin the female occupants as to their health. The bill is objected to on the ground that it licenses vice instead of discouraging it.

AN exchange says: "A. C. Wheeler, the well-known 'Nym Crinkle' of the New York World's dramatic columns, has accepted the offer of Mr. J. M. Hill, and has begun his delivery of lectures intended to prove the fallacy of Robert G. Ingersoll's skeptical arguments. Wheeler is a bright man, but there is a general impression that he has taken too heavy a contract on his hands in the present instance."

THE Catholic editors are discussing the desirableness of abolishing the practice of reading from the pulpit announcements of picnics, excursions, bazars, and lectures shortly to occur. It is generally condemned, coming as it does between the prayer and the sermon, distracting attention from the petition just addressed to the throne of grace and unfitting the mind for receiving the message about to be delivered. The editors say nothing about the cheerful effect of reading the undertaker's advertisment which invariably meets the eye of the worshiper as he enters the city church, even on Sunday.

THE Christian Leader says: "So many clergymen of orthodox antecedents, having renounced the orthodox system, swing rapidly over into extreme radicalism that the prudent among us are weary of extending an early welcome to such. They often begin by discarding eternal torment or the Trinity, and continue by giving up historical Christianity. Such men may find a congenial fellowship in the Unitarian body, or may help our Ethical Culture friends to work out their destiny. They can do nothing in the Universalist church but divide and desolate. Our church is not an asylum for bankrupt believers."

IN 1680 an English clergyman named Goodwin made the following argument against Christianizing the negroes in Virginia: "1. The negroes are not men. 2. If they are men they are pre-Adamites, and therefore are not entitled to the promises of either covenant. 3. If they are the children of Adam, still they are born under the curse of Ham, and are not entitled to any spiritual privileges. 4. You can do them no good, for they are incapable of being made Christians. 5. If we should make them Christians, they would get such ideas of liberty and of their rights that they would murder us. 6. We did not come out here to make Christians, but to raise tobacco and make money." And as a general clincher he adds, "We should lose besides all their time on Sundays."

THE following, with the name of Joe Cook attached, recently appeared in a Boston paper. It contains as much sense as is usually found in one of Cook's lectures: "Dorner somewhere says, 'The axiomatic, when reduced to the prosaic, seldom fails to counteract the probationary.' The same thought appears in my Monday Lectures (vol. 1, pp. 89–91, passim). This thought will bear expansion. 1. If the axiomatic be looked at historically, what do we see? (a) Chaos. (b) Slight luminosity. (c) Inclusivness. But, 2. Intrinsically, these are substantially the same; for (a) polarized light strikes both alike, and (b) neither is injured. [Propositions from 2 to 56, both inclusiv, are necessarily omitted here.] Again, when I (we, it should be said) was (were, rather) in Rome, we and I investigated this whole matter (see my Dover and Oil City lectures). It then was found: 57. That the subscriptiv view of denominational perturbation is less copious than the Andover. 58 to 63. Therefore, the axiomatic cannot be the telescopic or the terrific. [Applause.] Beg pardon; we meant to say that this view would make a sensation."

Bible Temperance.—II.

THE BIBLE AND THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

Isa. lxii, 8: "The Lord hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, Surely I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored."

Rev. Stevenson should suggest to the Lord that, whereas wine is an evil thing, and the Bible a "great text-book of morals," and the palladium of temperance essential in the proper training of our children, therefore, he, the Lord, should have clearly shown that he meant that the enemies of his chosen people should take from them their wine that through such deprivation they should be better and happier. But, no! he ranks wine with corn, and registers a mighty oath that the people shall have them both.

Isa. lxv, 8: "Thus saith the Lord, As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it, so I will do for my servants' sake, that I may not destroy them all."

Jer. xxxi, 12: "Therefore they shall come and sing in the hight of Zion, and shall flow together to the goodness of the Lord, for wheat, and for wine, and for oil," etc.

Jer. xl, 10: "But ye, gather ye wine, and summer fruits, and oil, and put them in your vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken."

Probably "wine" here means grapes, though it is used in the same construction as "oil."

Jer. xlviii, 33: "And joy and gladness is taken from the plentiful field, and from the land of Moab, and I have caused wine to fail from the wine-presses."

Dan. i, 5: "And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank, so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might stand before the king."

Here God intends, plainly, to convey the impression that wine is nourishing! The only way in which the Christian temperance people can relieve him from the imputation of teaching lessons so opposite to theirs is to enter the plea that he did not inspire the writer!

Hos. ii, 8, 9: "For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal. Therefore I will return and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness."

Of course, if these passages, and very many of like import, are any argument against wine, they are of equal weight in the scale against corn, wool, and many other useful and necessary articles. The authors of such verses, wherever found, unquestionably looked upon wine as one of God's good gifts to his children, but which he was compelled to sometimes deprive them of because of their disobedience.

Hos. ix, 2: "The floor and the wine-press shall not feed them, and the new wine shall fail in her."

That is, Israel shall be punished for her transgressions by the destruction of the fertility of the soil.

Evidently the perfume of wine was pleasing unto the Lord, for he says, in promising his blessing to the repentant people (Hos. xiv, 7): "They shall revive as the corn, and grow as the wine; the scent thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon.

Joel i, 5: "Awake, ye drunkards, and howl, all ye drinkers of wine."

This, taken by itself, would be an unqualified condemnation of intoxicants, but such was not the prophet's meaning. The verse concludes: "Because of the new wine, for it is cut off from your mouths."

In the vision of the prophet he sees the great evils that have come upon his country, the palmer-worm, and the locust, and the canker-worm have destroyed the crops. "The meat-offering and the drink-offering is cut off from the house of the Lord, the corn is wasted, the oil languisheth," etc. While in the verse quoted the drinkers are mildly requested to howl, in verse thirteen we have, "Gird yourselves and lament, ye priests; howl ye ministers of the altar." No temperance admonition or lesson here, that is plain.

Joel iii, 18: "And it shall come to pass in that day that the mountains shall drop down new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the rivers of Judah shall flow with water," etc.

Thus, again, among the great blessings to be bestowed upon the faithful is wine in abundance. One of the facts that strikes me most forcibly, in making such an examination as this, is the almost universal favor with which the Hebrew prophets looked upon wine and wine-drinking; and in prophesying the evils to come upon the people because of their disobedience to God or their oppression of their fellows, they rarely fail to include the cutting off of the wine supply. This they evidently regarded as one of the greatest of calamities. Our Christian temperance friends would gladly, so they say, visit wholesale destruction upon the vineyards and barley fields, and they seem almost to seek to convey the impression that God made a mistake when he created grapes and barley. This proves how honest they are when they say that the Bible is a temperance book. In Amos v, 11, we have another example of the above-mentioned fact in the utterances of the prophet. Denouncing the people for their injustice, he says: "Ye have planted pleasant vineyards, but ye shall not drink wine of them." In the preceding sentence, he had said: "Ye have built houses of hewn stone, but ye shall not dwell in them." Houses were good, wine was good; but because of their sins they should be deprived of both. There is here no argument either direct or implied in behalf of abstinence.

Amos ix, 14: "And I will bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them."

It does not seem that even Mr. Stevenson would venture to claim this verse as a Bible argument for temperance. They shall drink the wine!

Mich. vi, 15: "Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thee with oil; and sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine."

How can apparently honorable men claim that God, as revealed in the Bible, disapproves of the use of intoxicants when he is continually telling his chosen people that he will punish them by destroying their corn, and their wine, and their oil; evidently taking particular pains to impress upon them the fact that they (wine, corn, and oil) are equally good and useful?

Zeph. i, 13: "They shall also build houses, but not inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, but not drink the wine thereof."

The same old story!

In chapter i, verse 11, Haggai calls for a drouth upon the land to punish the people, and he includes, as usual, the corn, and the oil, and the new wine among the things to be destroyed.

Zech. ix, 17: "For how great is his goodness, and how great is his beauty; corn shall make the young men cheerful, and new wine the maids."

Rather a singular apportionment of his bounty, unless "corn" means something stronger than wine.

Matt. xi, 19: "The son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners. But wisdom is justified of her children." But are these her children who claim Jesus as very God and yet fly directly in the face of his precepts and practice? Or is it moral uprightness instead of wisdom that they lack?

In Matt. xxi, 33 to 41, and Mark xii, 1 to 9, Jesus gives us the parable of the vineyard and the husbandmen, and in it all there is no hint that there was anything wrong in the business of wine-making.

The thought that we find expressed in Matt. xi, 19, is given again in Luke vii, 33–4–5, where we read: "For John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, He hath a devil. The son of man is come eating and drinking, and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners! But wisdom is justified of all her children."

Whoever uttered these words, man or God; whoever wrote them, John or some one else one hundred or more years later, there can be no disputing regarding the lesson which is taught. It is that each individual is to determine for him or herself in all things pertaining to personal conduct and habits. "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" is the central idea of the various renderings. There is no rebuke, expressed or implied, of intemperance; there is nothing that can be tortured into a condemnation of wine-drinking or into an approval of the principle of total-abstinence, or that of prohibition. Here was his opportunity to condemn the drinking of wine, to speak for that which is now called temperance; but from his lips fell no words of warning; to those gathered about him he said nothing in favor of the great reform which Christians of to-day, falsely assuming to speak in his name, declare finds its sanction and inspiration, its bulwark and tower of defense, in the Bible.

It seems that the good Samaritan (Luke x, 34) had with him a supply of wine with which he dressed the wounds of the stranger.

John ii, 3–11: "And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto him, They have no wine. Jesus saith unto her, Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come. His mother saith unto the servants, Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it. And there were set there six water-pots of stone, after the manner of the purifying of the Jews, containing two or three firkins apiece. Jesus saith unto them, Fill the water-pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim. And he saith unto them, Draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bare it. When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was (but the servants which drew the water knew), the governor of the feast called the bridegroom, and saith unto him, Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse: but thou hast kept the good wine until now. This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory; and his disciples believed on him."

John iv, 46: "So Jesus came again into Cana of Galilee, where he made the water wine."

The first miracle which Jesus Christ performed was to convert six pots of water into wine! And this feat convinced his disciples of his supernatural origin and powers! And he did this to manifest forth his glory! Either this is true or the Bible is false. Whether true or not, it has been a most powerful argument against abstinence; it has resulted directly in making drunkards, as it has indirectly in making hypocrits and Jesuitical sophists. I of course mean by this last sentence that the seeming necessity to prove the Bible a temperance work has made any number of Christian apologists resort to all kinds of specious arguments and make any number of false claims in order to make good their assertions. The assumption that this wine was not of an intoxicating nature is purely gratuitous. There is not even the ghost of a fact to be found in support of it. Hundreds of passages, which I have quoted under their appropriate heads, prove beyond a doubt that the wine so often mentioned in the Bible was intoxicating; the words of the governor prove that this miraculously produced portion of it certainly was of the very best, for it is against all reason to suppose that men accustomed to the taste and effects of wine would pronounce simple grape-juice to be better than all that had already been served to them at the feast; and, finally, the declaration that this act of Jesus's was a miracle and that it made his disciples to "believe on him," gives the last stroke to the already nearly dead "non-intoxicating" theory.

Col. ii, 16: "Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days."

In other words, judge for yourselves in all these matters, submit to no dictation from without. How does that strike you, Messrs. Bible Prohibitionists?

1 Tim. v, 23: "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities."

It is probable that this short verse has led to the consumption of more wine and caused more intemperance than any other equal number of words in any language or contained in any book. It has had a more potent effect upon the mind of the Christian believer than have twenty passages which in a hesitating, half-hearted, uncertain way caution against the use of much wine.

Comparing this class of passages with those grouped under "A," we find that the Bible pleas for temperance are outvoted more than five to one by those in favor of the use of intoxicants. The record is an astonishingly bad one for the Bible as a total abstinence and prohibition work, and should put to the blush all of its worshipers and apologists who have been so foolish or so unscrupulous as to claim that it is indispensable to the temperance cause and in the education of our children. Both claims are absurd.

LIST C.—PASSAGES CONDITIONALLY CONDEMNING THE USE OF WINE, ETC., UPON STATED OCCASIONS, BY CERTAIN PERSONS UPON CERTAIN OCCASIONS, ETC.

Lev. x, 9–11: "Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die; it shall be a statute forever throughout your generations and that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean; and that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses."

This command is made much of by the Christian Prohibitionists, but it must be plainly apparent to every unprejudiced reader that the inhibition extended to the priests alone, and to them only when within the tabernacle; and the implication is plain that the reason the command was given was because the priests drank so that they could not tell the "unclean from the clean," nor perceive the difference between the "holy and unholy" articles upon and about the altar. But if this command was really, as it clearly was not, intended for all people at all times, why do Christians use wine at communion, and why do the ministers use it then, for they are surely shut out from such indulgence if the command was for the gentiles as well as for the Jews, and if it was not for the former, what means all this hypocritical clamor over the text? And why not obey the commands, given in the same connection, concerning the meat offering? If one part of the command is yet binding, why not all of it?

Num. vi, 3: "He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink; neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes or dried."

This, of course, only applies to the time in which a Nazarite should separate himself by a vow "unto the Lord," and eating grape jelly is as deadly a sin as drinking wine.

At the expiration of the allotted time, and after the priest has performed some ceremonies, "The Nazarite may drink wine" (v. 20). Cold comfort for Mr. Stevenson here.

Judges xiii, 4: "Now, therefore, beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine, nor strong drink, and eat not any unclean thing." This was said by the "angel of the Lord" to the wife of Manoah, the father of Samson, and the context shows that it had no more extended application. But if it had, the command also forbade "unclean things," i.e., many animals which Christians greatly consume, evidently with no thought that they are violating any of God's ordinances, though they try to make it appear that this alleged inhibition of wine and strong drink is yet in force.

Prov. xxxi, 4, 5, "It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine, nor for princes strong drink; lest they drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of any of the afflicted."

In striking contrast to this, read the 6th and 7th verses of the same chapter given in list B.

Eccl. ii, 3: "I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine, yet acquainting mine heart with wisdom."

Isa. v, 11: "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night till wine inflame them."

Reading this verse by itself, one would naturally conclude that it was a condemnation of wine and strong drink to excess, and the Christian temperance man will doubtless accuse me of classifying it wrongly, saying that I should have put it in List A, but an examination of the contents shows that I am dealing generously with them in not putting them in List B. Verse 8 of this chapter says: "Woe unto them that join house to house, that lay field to field, till there be no places that they may be placed alone in the midst of the earth!" The prophet is denouncing avarice and covetousness, not intemperance, and in verse 10 he says: "Yea, ten acres of vineyard shall yield one bath, and the seed of a homer shall yield an ephah."

Here, as in many other places in the Bible, we find that a failure of the vintage was threatened as a punishment upon the people for their transgressions, or alleged transgressions.

In verse 2 of same the chapter we find the same thought in another form. God is said to liken Jerusalem to a vineyard in which he had planted vines and made a wine-press, and the vines yielded only wild grapes, and hence the judgments fulminated in verses 5 to 30. The argument of this chapter is against instead of for abstinence.

Isa. xxii, 13: "And behold joy and gladness, slaying oxen and killing sheep, eating flesh and drinking wine; let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."

This is an incidental condemnation only of wine-drinking, the context showing that the general worldly character of the people had once more brought down upon them the denunciations of the prophet, and it will be perceived that the eating of flesh is coupled with the drinking of wine in the category of serious offenses.

Jer. xxxv, 2: "Go unto the house of the Rechabites, and speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the Lord, into one of the chambers and give them wine to drink."

But the Rechabites would not drink the wine, which has rarely failed to be found conveniently near to the "house of the Lord," and they said (verse 6):

"We will drink no wine, for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye nor your sons forever."

W. C. T. U. people stop right here, preferring to teach falsehood when it seemingly gives strength to their assertion that the Bible is a temperance work. But the Rechabites said something more. What was it? It was to the effect that Jonadab had also commanded them not to build houses, nor to sow seed, nor plant vineyards.

Verse 7 says: "Neither shall ye build houses, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyards, nor have any; but all your days ye shall dwell in tents, that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers; 8. Thus we have obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our father, in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters; 9. nor to build houses for us to dwell in; neither hav we vineyard, nor field, nor seed; 10. but we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all that Jonadab our father commanded us."

How many of our modern pretended Rechabites have done all this? Is living in a house and planting seed equally wrong with planting vineyards and drinking wine?

If these passages are carefully read, the investigator will see that they have no bearing whatever on the temperance problem.

Ezek. xliv, 21: "Neither shall any priests drink wine when they enter into the inner court."

And every Christian priest who partakes of wine in the sacrament disobeys this command!

Dan. i, 8: "But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank."

It was because the wine came from the king, and not because it was wine, that Daniel would not drink it. He wanted food from another source, or perhaps he had made some vow which did not permit him to use wine. But be this as it may, he set as strong an example against meat as against wine, though those who quote this text in support of their position do not usually, unless they are Adventists, pay any regard to the argument against meat.

The first, second, fourth, and twenty-third verses of the fifth chapter of Daniel make mention of wine and wine-drinking, and the phosphorescent letters on the wall appear after those present were well filled with something besides the holy spirit; but we read no word of rebuke of the drinking, but only of the manner of it and of the consequent idolatry. Jehovah had been insulted by the adoration offered to the other gods, and the condemnation from the lips of Daniel was clearly intended to have effect in support of the claim of his divinity's supremacy; it was in no sense intended to be a temperance lecture; indeed, it is doubtful whether Daniel ever heard of temperance.

Dan. x, 3: "I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all, till three whole weeks were fulfilled.

Texts like this need no comment; they explain themselves; they give not the least support to the W. C. T. U. claim.

Joel iii, 3: "And they have cast lots for my people; and have given a boy for a harlot, and sold a girl for wine, that they might drink."

Micah ii, 11: "If a man walking in the spirit and falsehood do lie, saying, I will prophesy unto thee of wine and of strong drink, he shall even be the prophet of this people."

Prophesy what concerning wine and strong drink?

Rom. xiv, 21: "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak.

From the preceding and the following verses it is clear that the thought uppermost in the mind of the apostle was that he who did that which his conscience condemns because a stumbling-block in the way of others. "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth," he says in verse 22, while in verse 23 he continues in further explanation: "And he that doubteth is damned if he eat, because he eateth not of faith; for whatsoever is not of faith is sin." In verse 20 he had said, "All things indeed are pure; but it is evil for that man who eateth with offense." That is, the man who does that which he believes to be wrong, though, as a matter of fact, it may be right in itself considered, is debasing himself and is likely to cause others to go astray. This, and not any real condemnation of wine-drinking or of meat-eating, which, by implication, are declared to be pure, is the lesson which a fair analysis of these passages conveys to us.

Eph. v, 18: "And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the spirit."

In other words, to drink wine until you are drunk is to be guilty of excess in the use of that article, but there is here not the slightest intimation that the use of wine in moderation is wrong.

In enumerating the qualifications of bishop, the apostle tells us in 1 Tim. iii, 3, that he must not (be) given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre; but patient; not a bawler, not covetous. Eighth verse: "Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre."

Much wine! This amounts to saying that they may drink in moderation.

The same canting we find in Titus i, 7, and ii, 3, but in the four passages (in Timothy and Titus) there is nothing which the modern total abstainer would regard as unqualifiedly sound temperance doctrin. 1 Peter iv, 3, speaks of "excess of wine," indicating that the author condemned the "excess" only, not the moderate use.

The candid Christian must admit that there is nothing in any or in all of the passages in this List which contains a condemnation of wine when used in what the writers of the Bible regarded as moderation. The condemnation, where there is any, is of its excessive use, and especially of its excessive use by the priests when engaged in the duties of the altar.

A number of the passages put in List "A" should, in strict justice, have been included under this head, but, as previously remarked, I preferred to give the Bible and its apologists the benefit of all doubts and obscure readings. The case against them is bad enough, at the very best.

Mr. Blissert Not Wanted.

A paragraph in a recent issue of Pomeroy's Democrat stated that Robert Blissert (who was referred to as Brick's "energetic Greenback friend") had been elected chairman of the Central Labor Union of New York, and that the body now had an opportunity to elect its candidates irrespectiv of either of the two old parties. One of the C. L. U. Trustees was authorized by last Sunday's meeting to contradict the statement; and he assures us that not only does the C. L. U. rule against the election of a permanent chairman, but it discountenances everything political—even from the Greenbackers.—The Boycotter.

Prayer: Its Efficacy.

Although for many years I hav ceased to believe in the efficacy of prayer, still I hav always treated with respect those who seriously did believe in it, however ludicrous or unreasonable to me their belief might seem. And I hav at times had to repress a smile at the seemingly impertinent familiarity with which the Christian God is addressed. People who pray in this style surely never reflect how grossly insulting such appeals would be if addressed to a friend or any fellow-being from whom was expected a favor. But "God" is appealed to as a person to be tickled with flattery, cajoled with praise, and appeased with the promis of good conduct in future.

Not long ago a friend related to me his experience in the matter of prayer. "Recently," he remarked, "I attended the sick-bed of a seriously afflicted young man, of a pious and wealthy family. I liked the young man in spite of his many breaches of moral decorum, to which the wealth and piety of his family blinded the eyes of society. He was habitually too social, and not unfrequently took too much wine for his stomach's sake.

"But here he was, his burning temples swathed in flannels saturated with cooling liquids, and his feverish body writhing in agony. I really loved the young man, as I said, for I thought I saw shining through his wayward exterior redeeming virtues which under more favorable conditions would hav made him a useful citizen. As I entered the sick man's chamber the reverend pastor was in the full tide of a fervent prayer. Great drops of sweat stood out on his moistened brow as he evoked every kind of pious exertion in behalf of this erring child of grace—and he pledged in his behalf the fulfilment of every kind of impossible service. He should henceforth sing the praises of Jehovah and the holy redeemer! He would make midnight cheerful with melody, and the starry firmament hum with Christian devotion! As the pastor paused for breath, some pious, sympathetic brother coaxingly threw in his private appeal sotto voce, 'Do, Lord, do!' The pastor resuming continued, 'O Lord, thou canst restore this youthful saint to health! O Lord, thou hast in times past done wonders! Thou hast raised the dead. Thou hast increased the widow's oil. Thou hast cleansed the leper. Thou hast made the blind to see. Thou hast made the cripple to walk. In times past thou hast miraculously parted the Red Sea for Moses and thy chosen people. Through thy servant Joshua thou hast commanded the sun and moon to stand still whilst thou hast vanquished the enemies of Israel. Thou hast compelled the sun's shadow to go back ten degrees on the dial of Ahaz. Thou hast miraculously preserved the disobedient prophet Jonah in the whale's belly, and hast been the producer of hundreds of recorded miracles! And now, O Lord, do not go back on thy divine record, for thou hast already done it for greater sinners than this suffering child of grace, the pet of his parents and pride of thy holy church!'

"What further was said I know not, for I quietly withdrew from the house and the sound of this insane rhapsody."

"Well," I inquired of my friend, "what becamc of the afflicted young man? He died, of course?"

"Not a bit of it," replied my friend. "To the surprise of all but these lunatics he recovered; and his cure went the round of all pious circles as a notable instance of the power of prayer."

"Of the young man—was the reformation permanent?" I asked.

"For a short time only; for, alas! John Barleycorn was too potent for the church or temperance; and his body was recently drawn from the dock and became a subject for the coroner. D. BRUCE.

Beginnings.

For some years of my youth I was thrown into a lonely, obscure region occupied chiefly by Indians. There I saw the life of the savage, and the origin of civil society, the foundations of empire. Great towns, populous, thriving communities, hav grown up. While we were all poor and had everything to do, then was the best of times. When wealth became superabundant, then was the worst of times for lack of money. When anything passed for money that had the signature of a well-known honest settler, this money and all other things desired were superabundant. I learned then that money is a certain form of credit in circulation.

I learned also in my intimacy with Indians that here and there is a mind of nativ grandeur and originality as superior to all those around him as would be the educated white man. I conclude that we are indebted for all our progress to a few minds, the masses being inert, improvident; but greedy and selfish individuals often lead them wrong. I learned many things which those educated in old so-called civilized society can never know save theoretically.

The Liberal Club.

The Lenten exercises at the Manhattan Liberal Club were continued at its 409th regular meeting. When the writer, having seen that his badge-pin was in a position where its attractions were not obscured, entered the hall at 220 East Fifteenth street, he extracted a five-cent piece from his pocket and gave it to Treasurer Morris, this being the regular price of admission to the meetings of the club. Ladies and Presbyterians are not required to pay anything.

It was a fine gathering. All the seats were occupied, and fully half of those present were ladies. A glance around revealed many familiar countenances. There was the smoothly-shaven face of Mr. Tompkins, the Houston-street barber, who is likewise the author of the poem "Venus and Adonis," and also inventor of the appliance by which a loaded car is designed to propel itself with the assistance of its own weight. Lawyer Chamberlain was also there, conspicuous for his good looks. Mr. Eckhart tipped back his chair in the northwest corner and listened comfortably. Mr. Eckhart is one of those far-seeing persons who rightly believe that any scheme of reform is futil that does not provide for the abolition of the Roman Catholic church. Mr. Langerfeldt ornamented his accustomed place by the treasurer's table. Madam Delescluze was there, and smiled as amiably upon the writer of these lines as though he had never written anything which she deemed it necessary to rebuke.

The lecturer was Mr. F. F. Cook, and he had chosen the contemporary subject of "Strikes" upon which to discourse. Mr. Cook is a fine-looking man. He read his lecture in a clear and impressiv voice, putting the emphasis where it would do the most good. He took highly philosophical grounds and viewed the question from that altitude. Strikes, he said, were to sociology what the storm signal is to meteorology. The question was one of morals. The speaker drew a distinction between capital and capitalism, the one being a beneficent force, the other a cruel, lustful, and tyrannic power. Capital itself is simply so much stored energy. The right of the workingman to strike Mr. Cook regarded as beyond dispute, but he denied the right of any man to take the place of the striker. The latter, he held, had an intangible right to the position which he had won through long service. The position was vacated through the wrongs of one laborer, and the right of none could be based upon the wrongs of another. The case of the printer was instanced. On a morning paper a compositor must work and wait as a substitute perhaps for years before he can secure a "frame" at which he can work full time. Having won this position thus, Mr. Cook held, the printer's intangible proprietorship in the frame is as worthy of respect as the owner's tangible proprietorship in metal and wood forming the physical thing. Therefore, an outsider had no more right to occupy the position without the consent of the printer than to carry away the type without leave from its owner. Mr. Cook's remarks on the subject would arouse the enthusiasm of all good printers. In the matter of the strike in the southwest the speaker counseled compulsory arbitration. Failing to submit to this, the railroad company should not be allowed to hire anybody. If the workmen failed to abide, then the arm of the law should be stretched out to protect the company against all acts of violence. At present the government puts out its war arm first, instead of its arm of peace.

The audience had to listen attentivly to Mr. Cook in order to catch his meaning, as he has a habit of using words that are long and hard to define. For that reason, though willing to applaud what they understood, the listeners were sometimes in doubt about the meaning of the last remark, and the applause was hesitating and characterized by more or less scarcity.

It is perhaps unnecessary to say that Mr. Langerfeldt was the first speaker. Referring pleasantly to the blatherskite kind of stuff which we sometimes hear, he explained that he did not class this with that kind of business. He was glad to see the club doing something besides Christ-killing. As to arbitration, it would not work. There was a board of arbitration in England, and its office is never invoked by anybody. Private property should be abolished. Mr. Langerfeldt then went home. It was the greatest effort of his life.

Colonel Hinton indorsed the lecture as to its timeliness and applicability to the present state of affairs, but he could not accept it in its ultimate. Private property was a law of individualism. The relations between society and individual must be closely studied, so that we may know precisely where the function of each begins and ends. Until we ascertain this we are groping in the dark.

Captain Clark, who has followed the salt water all his life in every capacity from deck-hand to sea serpent, said the lecture was an admirable statement of things, but he could not accept it as a finality. He held that we were all slaves to the rest of the community; but if he could choose his master, he would take the aristocrat in preference to the sans culottes every time. Organized labor he held to be a tyranny. There probably wasn't a poorer man in the house than he was, but he would fight on the side of capital. He had had intercourse with all nations of the earth, both civilized and barbarous, and had made observations. These observations he would like to lay before the club in a lecture. Captain Clark then gave an imitation of the forensic peculiarities of Robert Blissert, and spoke disparagingly of the club and its orators generally. He said the listener must go through a bushel of chaff to get a grain of wheat. Having thus cut everybody up fine and hurt the feelings of the president, Captain Clark left the platform in triumph.

Dr. Weeks followed without protest. The shallows sometimes murmur when Dr. Weeks rises to speak, but the deeps are dumb; and the doctor usually givs the murmurers a shot about their lack of manners that makes them dumb also. This time, as has been remarked, there were no signs of dissent, and Dr. Weeks made a series of philosophical observations upon the subject of the evening. The man with the badge-pin was not permitted to hear the rest of the discussion, being lured away at this point. He learns from the secretary that Madam Delescluze gave Captain Clark "hail Columbia," and whittled him down good. Dr. Foote, Jr., told how a strike looks from an elevation of six feet and several inches, and did a little punning at the expense of Captain Clark, after which Mr. Cook replied to and confounded his critics.

At the next meeting Dyer D. Lum will lecture on "The Historical Evolution of Liberty and Its Bearing upon Anarchy." And at the close of the debate —unless the hour has grown too late—in the manner customary, the business gathering occurs, to elect a Board of Officers and Assistant Secretary. All members of the club are requested to be present.

Canadian Notelets.

Crowded houses hav been the rule thus far in Mr. Watts's present course of lectures. The experiment of a free week-night lecture was tried on the evening of Thursday, April 8th, and in point of numbers was a success, even beyond expectation, although the collection was hardly up to the mark.

Mr. Watts gave his great lecture on "The Fall and Atonement," one of the most destructiv in his list, and calculated to bring out opposition if there is any present.

Well, we got something this time, but it could hardly be called opposition. The lecture was well advertised, and it was hoped that some uneasy clergyman or divinity student might stray in and make things interesting; but perhaps an all-wise Providence had willed it otherwise. At any rate, they didn't come, and the audience were afflicted for about twenty minutes, at the close of the lecture, with the ravings of a couple cranks who took advantage of the opportunity offered them to ventilate their peculiar alleged ideas, to insult the lecturer, and to beautifully illustrate the folly of inviting indiscriminate debate.

The first to answer to the call of the chairman was an old man over whose head the snows of some eighty odd winters had successfully passed, and who ought to hav been in the church or the asylum. He started out with the first chapter of Genesis, and wandered dreamily off into space, giving the sore-eared audience an account of the original nebula and its gyrations through primeval chaos, that must hav caused the bones of Laplace and Herschell to shake in their coffins.

The next to face the music was a very excitable member of the Salvation Army, who lashed himself into a fury, warned the audience to flee from the wrath to come, and gave a blood-curdling description of the death-bed scenes of Infidels. The name of Ingersoll over the platform caught his eye, and seemed to lend him inspiration. It must hav been inspiration, nothing else could hav done it. He actually gave us an account of the scenes at the death-bed of Colonel Ingersoll. The screams of laughter at this juncture might hav been heard on the esplanade, and when informed that the colonel at last accounts was alive and in his usual health, he "supposed he must hav been misinformed."

There were buckets of fun while it lasted, but, as this sort of thing is not calculated to add dignity to the meetings, and rather mars the effect of the lecture, the powers that be hav decided to prevent its recurrence in the future.

Mr. Watts lectured again, Sunday evening, 11th, subject, "The New Testament: Its History and Teachings," and again the hall was packed with a splendid audience, who were evidently deeply impressed with the grand lecture they heard. There were quite a number of strangers present, all of whom expressed unqualified approval, some of them afterward sending in application for membership.

At the close of the lecture Mr. Watts announced a special lecture for Saturday evening, the 17th, when he will reply to Dr. Wild (in the sermon spoken of last week). The statement that the doctor, and also Dr. Potts, would be especially invited was received with applause, and the announcement that Dr. Wild would be invited to publicly debate with Mr. Watts—hall and advertisment free, the proceeds to go to some public charity—fairly brought down the house.

Mr. Watts also announced that on Monday, 26th (the day before he leaves for England), he will deliver a lecture in aid of the hall fund; tickets, twenty-five cents. He not only givs his services free for this lecture, but generously offered to act as ticket agent, and sold $14 worth before leaving the platform.

The society having been at great expense in fitting up the new premises, Mr. Watts's generous action is most opportune, and will not be forgotten by the friends.

On Monday Mr. Risser wrote to Dr. Wild a long letter, which concludes as follows:

On Saturday evening, April 17th, Mr. Charles Watts will deliver a special lecture in our new hall in reply to your sermon of last Sunday evening. He will correct some of your misstatements and misrepresentations of our views, which, no doubt, were innocently and ignorantly made.

We extend to you a most cordial invitation to be present on that occasion, to set us right where you believe us to be wrong. We hope you will see your way clear to signify your acceptance. You hav a duty on hand that you can scarcely refuse to perform. We will assure you a friendly greeting, an attentiv hearing, and a respectful consideration. Come now, and let us reason together.

Yours sincerely, J. A. RISSER,
Pres. Toronto Secular Society.

On Wednesday Mr. Risser received the following laconic and characteristic reply:

J. A. Risser, Esq., Dear Sir: Your letter of 6th to hand. In reply I regret to say that I cannot attend your lecture on Saturday evening. Yours kindly, JOSEPH WILD.

"Only this, and nothing more." It was hardly expected that he would accept the invitation, but surely the courteous and gentlemanly letter of friend Risser deserved at least something in the way of a reply from one who is supposed to be teaching a gospel of love. However, there is a rod in pickle for the doctor, and he may yet be forced to giv a reason for refusing to meet men whom he has wilfully maligned, people who are morally and socially at least as good as himself, and away above what some of his own congregation can be shown to be.

Last Sunday evening the Rev. Hugh Johnston, of the Metropolitan (Methodist) church, preached a sermon against theaters and theater-goers which has brought out several caustic replies in the city papers (the inclosed letter from the World of last Tuesday is a sample), which prove that Secularists are not the only people who are disgusted with the ravings of these "sanctimonious, self-righteous hypocrits."

The Rev. Canon Demoulin also preached on the same subject. In both cases the sermon was an outpouring of the vilest denunciation and wholesale abuse. The theaters were spoken of as "dens of infamy," and their patrons as "horse-thieves," gamblers, fallen women," etc., and they giv the secret of their hatred away and show where the shoe pinches by whining "that the theaters are making more money than the churches." Aye, there's the rub. Said the Rev. Mr. Johnston: "A certain theater in Chicago takes in as high as $7,000 in a single night, while the income of the Metropolitan church is only $24,000 in a year." Mirabile dictu! and yet the heavens don't fall.

Will the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER kindly send to these "gentlemen" (who hav maligned better men and women than themselvs), Messrs. Johnston and Demoulin, a copy of the "Crimes of Preachers," at my expense, and add thereto the names of Hamford, Parson Downs, and that miserable devil Dyson, who saved his own dirty neck by putting the rope around that of the woman, his partner in crime, and the host of others who are always cropping up in the newspapers?

Nothing but crass ignorance, or consummate cheek, could hav made the Rev. Mr. Johnston take for his text last Sunday this: "By their fruits shall ye know them."

The Truth Seeker Editor Answered.

Benj. R. Tucker in Liberty.

In concluding a feeble effort at reply to a Galveston News criticism of THE TRUTH SEEKER in its recent struggle with Anarchism, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER remarks: "There is a scholarly courtesy in the criticisms of the Galveston News becoming to a great journal, which we miss in the editorials of the smaller Liberty. Whether or no it would not giv force and dignity to their utterances to copy the style of Mr. J. L. Walker, of Galveston, is a question we leave to the judgment of Messrs. Tucker and Appleton." If there is one thing more than another that Anarchists believe in, it is the principle of contract. Now I hav a contract to propose to the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If, in all future discussions between THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberty, he will show one-half the brains and one-tenth the honesty of J. L. Walker, I will show twice his courtesy. Is it a bargain?

Professor Seymour's Illness.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Allow me, through the columns of your paper, to inform the friends and Liberals that Prof. W. Seymour, President of the Pennsylvania Secular Union, has been confined to his bed for the past two weeks with congestion of the brain, and although we hav sometimes despaired of his life, through the application of medical skill, and constant watchfulness and care, we are pleased to feel at this time that he will soon be restored to his normal condition af health and usefulness.

News and Notes.

I am somewhat surprised at the number of friends and acquaintances that I hav met with out West. I might travel for days in New England and not meet anyone I know; so many stay at home and indoors in that placid country. I suppose it is called the Hub of the universe simply because it is so slow in turning round. Here, out West, we are on the outer circle, and always in a whirl, and things are continually happening, and at almost every stopping-place I come across a familiar face that I had no more idea of meeting than of the premier of England. I imagin they are far away, but the mighty West has taken them into its enormous whirlpool, and fate brings us together. Westward is the stream of tendency. The trains are full. I hav to sleep almost standing up. The fat man has no show. Day after day I see the tented wagons go by. The people are beginning to settle even on the sandy bluffs where never a flower has grown before, and somehow the harvest begins to shine, the rains fall, and the skies shed blessings as the busy step of the white man advances. There seems to be a magic in his touch. Like Alexander Selkirk, he is monarch of all he surveys, and evokes its riches the moment his plow penetrates the soil.

I was a schoolmaster once, in the happy college days, when I thought I knew everything because I could decline a Greek verb. It was up among the green hills of Vermont, in one of its loveliest villages. I remember the lyceum we had where youthful genius plumed its wings for many an airy flight. I remember the squirrel hunt and the rides by night amid the lonely hills in search of game, for it was lawful in those combats of the rival Nimrods to lie, cheat, and steal in order to count the biggest number and win the dinner. I remember the old meeting-house perched on the hill, too venerable and mighty for the preacher, and so he held forth in an humbler chapel by its side; but for one night this ancient edifice blazed with the fires of the muse of the drama, and I for once enjoyed the romance of the stage.

All this flashed upon me, when, thousands of miles away, amid the prairies, I met one of my pupils. I found her a stately matron and member of the Presbyterian church in good and regular standing. Apparently she had lost no faith in the creeds of her childhood, and scarcely knew what Liberalism meant; and yet, when I asked her if she believed all that was in the Bible, she replied, "Oh, no; only that which seems reasonable to me." "Do you believe in the story of Jonah and the whale?" "I do not," she replied, utterly oblivious of the terrible heterodoxy of her statement; "why, nobody believes that today," she added. Thus in her words she showed the unconscious drift of the intelligent mind that still remains within the church, and that will to a certain extent think for itself. It, however, does not realize how totally it has abandoned the old, and entered upon the new. This was indeed something of a revelation to me of the immensity of that change which is passing over the world. The ministers do not know the deep current of thought that is in their very congregations, and that will some time all of a sudden tumble their churches about their ears. I told my friend that I thought she was a very poor Presbyterian, but a first-rate Liberal. "Oh, no," said she, "I am a good Presbyterian still." I could only leave it with time to settle the matter, and I guess it will.

After an all-night ride, bright and early I met J. J. Jensen at Plum Creek. He, together with Mr. H. S. Olmstead, had arranged for the lectures at this place. They are both stanch Liberals and subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that, I suppose, accounts for their energy in this campaign for Freethought. I also met a former comrade of the plains, R. D. Thompson, and his wife, too, who used to work with me in the Unitarian church at North Platte. It was a pleasant surprise to meet these friends.

There were scarcely half a dozen houses in Plum Creek when I left the plains some years ago. Now it has over one thousand inhabitants, and is a bright and lively place, and the country round about it is rapidly filling up. My lectures were the first Freethought lectures ever given, and excited an unexpected interest. It was the means of introducing many Liberals to one another who did not know before that they belonged to the same ranks. The Lectures were well attended. An auxiliary Secular Union will be formed. The following are the members at present: Dr. J. F. Snider, temporary secretary; Dr. William Bancroft, J. J. Jensen, Jacob Blumer, Ferdinand Zimmerer, W. J. Lamma, T. W. Hanna, John Gunn, A. J. Watkins, H. S. Olmstead, R. D. Thompson, M. Cole, W. D. Kelsey, George A. Watkins, T. G. Watkins, Virgil Allyn, R. F. James, S. O. Hall, and H. Cox. These are the leading business and professional men of the place, and I hav no doubt that a good Secular Society will be formed with such noble and progressiv elements in the city and the country round about.

I was quite surprised to meet here Mr. and Mrs. T. G. Watkins, of Pennsylvania, who hav come to this country to liv with their children. I met these friends at the Cassadaga Congress, and well remember their interest and enthusiasm in the Liberal cause. They are a welcome addition to the Freethought ranks of Nebraska.

From Plum Creek I came on to North Platte, which is one of my old camping-grounds. There for two years I worked in the Unitarian harness, and built the Unitarian Hall. I went to look at the building wherein I had put many a hard day's work, and thought, and hope. It did not look so big as it once did, nor was it so emblematic of the future of mankind. It was a somewhat melancholy monument—a relic of what was forever dead. Unitarianism is to me no longer a thing of beauty as it once was. It belongs to the past—the sunset of an ancient world, not the morning of a nobler future. There was something inexpressibly sad in the remembrance of the immense changes which had taken place since I first put my foot on this soil, which, in the geographies of my boyhood, was put down as in the Great American Desert. The desert has disappeared, and all about are smiling farms, and North Platte has trebled its population since I left. Then the wild buffalo came prancing into its streets and the Indian loafed along trying to sell the spoils of the hunt. The buffalo and the Indian hav gone, and I guess the doctrins that I then preached are gone as effectually as they, and will never reappear in the path of civilization. It was a great pleasure, hywever, to meet with many friends and liv over again some of the happy days of the past. I could only stop for a few hours. I shall lecture here on my return trip. There are plenty of Liberals in this thriving city of the plains.

Here I am at Laramie City, over seven thousand feet above the level of the plains and within sight of the Snowy Range, the beginning of the Rockies, and where winter reigns eternally. Never does the crown of frost disappear from these gleaming summits. The softest skies of summer still bend above their icy foreheads.

I must confess the air is rather thin, and a little exercise makes me tired. But there is a certain exhilaration also in this lofty atmosphere. We seem to be at the top of creation. Soft and brilliant colors are along the horizon, and deck the clouds that float over the blue as intense as that of an Italian sky. No wonder there is plenty of vim in this elevated spot. Jove upon Olympus did not occupy a higher seat; and why, then, should not this be the dwelling of the gods? Nature spreads her palace here and man can revel in his exalted station.

I had good audiences afternoon and evening at the Opera House. There is a fine Liberal element in the place, and an auxiliary Union will be established. As at Plum Creek, the lectures hav developed an unexpected force for Liberalism.

The Methodist minister of the place undertook to tackle me in the midst of my discourse on Sunday afternoon, but he retired with somewhat disordered forces, and although I gave him plenty of chances, he did not rally sufficiently to make another onset. I was saying that I had too much respect for the intelligence of the clergymen of Laramie to think that a single one of them believed in the story of Jonah and the whale. He impetuously leaped up in his seat, and amid the small cheers of a few surrounding allies declared that he believed the whole story from beginning to end. I answered that I was very much surprised at his declaration of faith, and admired his sincerity, but wondered on what evidence he believed the story. "If you will allow I will tell you," he said. "Go on," I answered. "I believe it," he replied, "because the Bible says so, and because Jesus affirms it." I then said: "You believe that the whale swallowed Jonah simply on the testimony of the Bible. In that case you occupy exactly the same position that Sam Jones does. He believes it for the same reason, and with sound logic says that if the Bible affirmed that Jonah swallowed the whale alive, and that the whale remained three days and nights in the belly of Jonah, and then came up and went to Nineveh, he would believe this just as quick as the other story, and, of course, so would you." The minister saw the point and sat down, evidently surprised at the drift of his own argument. I could not get him to say another word. He had come to the conclusion that "discretion was the better part of valor."

He came to me after the lecture with a few inquiries. He asked me if I did not think it possible for the whale to swallow Jonah, etc., provided the Bible God was a matter of fact. I answered of course it was possible if the machinery for its performance was at hand. But that was the very question at issue, Is there such a machinery, such a God? Science denied it. It is both inconceivable and unprovable. I found it useless to talk with the gentleman, for he was so possessed with the devil of theology that I couldn't pin him down to a single logical sequence. At last he said, "Good-bye, I hope to meet you on the other side of Jordan." I told him I should certainly be there if the "other side" was a fact, and that I should get the best of it there by making the best of it here.

I was pleased to meet with Mr. P. Farrell, an old resident of this country, a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER and veteran Liberal. He has a ranch eighteen miles south of Laramie, and came in on purpose to hear the lectures. His son is also a stanch Freethinker, and livs in the city.

Mr. H. Breitenstein, who arranged for the lectures, editor of the Pacific Railroad Employees' Magazine, is one of the foremost Liberals of the West. In connection with the Knights of Labor, of which he is a prominent member, he advances not only reform but Freethought. He thoroughly understands the vital relation of the two, and that Liberalism must prevail in order that justice may be obtained for labor. I expect to lecture at Laramie on my return trip. I go from here to Rock Springs, and thence to Wanship, for the campaign in Utah.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The New York Freethinkers' Convention for 1886.

Why not make the New York Freethinkers' Annual Convention a camp meeting, covering two Sundays, to be held at some suitable grove the last of August or early in September? The Tent would save cost of opera house and insure attendance of ten times as many people, and the very class we most desire to be present.

Family tents can be hired at very low rates, all enjoy a glorious picnic, and the much-talked-of, long-desired, but never before attained opportunity for sociability (so that Liberals from all parts of the state and vicinity could become personally acquainted) be realized.

Liberals could invite friends and neighbors to share the hospitality of their tents. What a splendid opportunity to disabuse their minds of prejudice and clerical misrepresentation! What an excellent opportunity to distribute Liberal literature to those really interested, to read and investigate! What a field such a meeting would afford to secure subscribers to our best Liberal papers! How greatly such a meeting would popularize the Nine Demands of Liberalism! Ladies, let us hav your opinion; our reliance is, as always, on you. Gentlemen, what say you? Will all interested giv this matter consideration and write me their views and suggestions? It is not too soon to decide, for much time is needed for perfecting all arrangements and insuring grand and glorious success.

Let every one write who favors the suggestion. Address me care of TRUTH SEEKER office, 33 Clinton Place, New York. C. B. REYNOLDS.

The Truth Seeker Hits Hard.

The last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER has a humorous cartoon, entitled, "The Answer to the Conundrum, Where was Moses when the Candle was Blown Out?" and shows us Moses in a darkened room filling his pockets with Pharaoh's treasures. THE TRUTH SEEKER hits hard sometimes, but we nevertheless admire it for its honest bluntness.—Hebrew Standard.

The Ablest in the Country.

From the Newsman.

The Truth Seeker Company is the largest establishment dealing in Freethought publications in the country. While the Newsman, as a trade organ, has nothing to do with men's opinions, it recognizes that Freethinkers are a numerous body in every country, and most of them sincere in their convictions. To such THE TRUTH SEEKER recommends itself as the ablest journal published in this country.

The discussion between Gladstone and Huxley will be voraciously read by all classes. The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL is also a very valuable almanac for those interested in Freethought.

Communications.

Infidel and Christian.

The other evening I was one of a group of individuals who were ventilating their views in regard to official corruption in general, and that which obtains in the municipal government of New York city in particular. Something I had remarked prompted one of the party, whom I did not know, to tackle me later on, when the group had broken up, in regard to a matter in which he was deeply interested evidently.

"Excuse me, sir; but from what you said a moment ago, I judge you are an Atheist."

"You do, eh? Well, your judgment is not in the least at fault, sir."

"You don't tell me so? Is it possible?"

"Not only possible, my dear sir, but absolutely certain."

"An Infidel, eh—denying the existence of a God?"

"An Infidel, yes; no, to the rest of your proposition."

"You don't deny there is a God?"

"No."

"Do you believe there is a God?"

"No."

"It is a negativ position you occupy. You don't deny, and you don't believe?"

"Exactly."

"Why don't you believe there is a God?"

"Want of proof."

"But there is the Bible."

"No proof."

"No proof?"

"None."

"Don't believe the Bible, eh?"

"To believe the Bible is to believe in the God of the Bible?"

"Why don't you believe the Bible?"

"For the same reason that I don't believe Munchausen."

"Monstrous!"

"Yes, that's just about the size of it—monstrous!"

"Oh, I mean it is monstrous that you should compare the Bible to Munchausen."

"Well, it isn't complimentary to Munchausen, that's a fact. But I suspect the baron didn't aim for the sublimely incredible, wishing to keep within something like reasonable bounds."

"You experience no satisfaction or pleasure in reading the Bible?"

"Very little; for the most part horror, with a sense of the ineffably ridiculous and absurd. When I wish to regale myself on horrors I go to the 'Three Spaniards,' and books of that class; and for stories of a supernatural cast, where horror is not the chief factor, I take up the 'Arabian Nights,' whose stories are far more artistically told and interesting than the Bible stories."

"You astonish me!"

"I do, eh? Well, I suppose I do if you are a thick-and-thin believer. Were you a woman, I suppose you would say to me, 'Oh, you are perfectly awful!'

"I suppose I should. Do you believe in a life hereafter?"

"No."

"What do you believe in?"

"Oh, many things. For instance, I believe there is a hideous and far-reaching corruption in the offices of our city government, from the judiciary down."

"But I mean as regards religious things, and religion itself."

"I hav no particular belief in regard to religion, having never made choice from the many in vogue all over the world."

"But there is only one true religion—the Christian religion."

"Every devotee to the thousand and one religions will tell you the same thing: 'There is only one true religion, and that is ours.'"

"I think you are an Infidel, iron-clad. Good-night."

"One moment, sir; give me an inning, having had yours. You are a believer and Christian?"

"I should hope so."

"Why?"

"Because I hope to be saved."

"Because you don't wish to be damned?"

"Yes."

"Then you are a Christian and believer from fear of damnation?"

"Yes—that is—well, doesn't the Bible say that unbelievers shall be damned forever?"

"I believe it does say something of that kind—words to that effect."

"Well?"

"Well, what if it does?"

"Why, that settles it."

"In your mind?"

"Yes."

"You believe the Bible clear through, from A to Izzard, I suppose?"

"Implicitly."

"Well, not to detain you too long, there are one or two things I would like to hav you explain—there are very many, but I will trouble you only on one, and that is—"

"Oh, there are many things in the Bible that I can't explain—I couldn't to an Infidel, anyhow—but my belief in the Bible is not lessened on that account."

"Is not, eh?"

"No; I believe in the Bible; in God; in a future life; in Christian theology; in heaven and hell, where the good will be rewarded and the wicked punished—I believe in all."

"One moment. If you did not believe in a hell, would you believe in the rest of the program?"

There was no response save a look that spoke volumes could it hav been translated, and the thick-and thin believer was gone.

Was he not a fair sample of Christians as they run? Filled with superstition to an extent never reached by a goat in a good season for theater posters, they believe this book without question—profess to, or think they do—looking with astonishment, if not horror, on one who "impiously" does question it; getting away as quickly as possible to avoid staggering queries, as "Tug" Wilson did from Sullivan to avoid his staggering blows. But for the stupid fear of hell would there be any lovers of God—of the God of the Bible?

SI SLOCUM.

A Lesson in Astronomy.

I hav been thinking the matter over, and hav concluded to accept Mr. Hindman's rebuke, and in return for his lesson in politeness will, by your permission, giv him a lesson in astronomy. Before receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER, March 6th, containing Mr. James's communication, I had been studying how, in a brief article, to giv an intelligible outline of the facts and calculations which determin the distance of the earth from the sun. It is so often taken for granted that astronomical estimates are mere opinions, that one brief lesson in mathematical astronomy might be useful, even to some of your intelligent readers. A few elementary propositions in geometry will hav to be taken for granted, most of which are nearly self-evident, and their proof within easy reach of anyone interested in the subject.

Angles are considered as diverging from the center of a circle, and are measured by the circumference, which, for convenience, is divided into 360 degrees, each degree into 60 minutes, and each minute into 60 seconds.

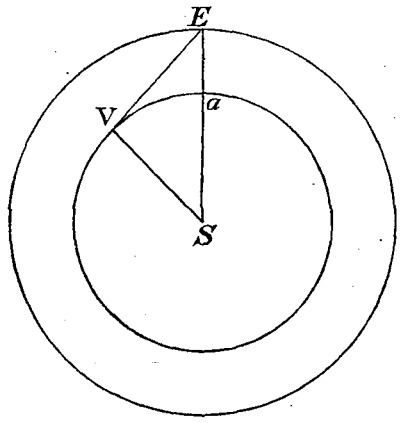

Fig. 1.

In Fig. 1, let S represent the sun, V Venus, and E the Earth. Suppose that at sunset, when Venus is farthest from the sun, it is 45 degrees high; that is, that the angle S E V measures 45 degrees. The angle at V is a right angle, or 90 degrees. But all the angles of any triangle are equal to 180 degrees. The sum of the angles at V and E equal 90+45=135 degrees, and the angle at S=180—135=45 degrees. Hence the angles S and E are equal. In any triangle the sides opposit equal angles are equal. Therefore the side V E is equal to the side V S.

Again, E S is the hypothenuse of a right-angled triangle, and the square described on it is equal to the sum of the squares described on the other two sides; and as in this case those two sides are equal, the square described on E S is equal to twice the square described on V S. As we do not know the distance E S, let us represent it by 100, and its square will be 10,000, which is twice the square described on V S. Hence the distance V S equals the square root of 5,000, which is a little more than 70. That is, if the distance of the earth from the sun is represented by 100, the distance of Venus would be 70. But Venus, at its greatest elongation, reaches 47 degrees instead of 45 degrees, and the exact proportion is a little more than 72 to 100. Subtracting 72 from 100 we hav a E (Fig 1); the distance of Venus from the earth when she is between us and the sun is to the distance of the earth from the sun as 28 to 100.

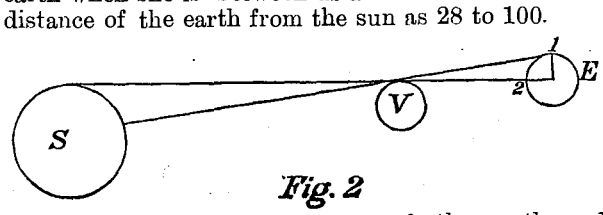

Fig. 2

Having the relativ distance of the earth and Venus from the sun, let us compute the real distance. In Fig. 2 let E represent the earth, V Venus, and S the sun, as they appear in a transit of Venus when she passes directly between us and the sun. Let two observers at stations 1 and 2 observe Venus at the same moment. Let the observer at station 2 mark the time when Venus has just passed its width upon the sun. The observer at station 1 finds that Venus has passed, at that exact time, about 31 seconds of a degree beyond that point. This proves that half the diameter of the earth would represent 31 seconds at the distance of Venus, for the two stations are 90 degrees apart. The number of seconds which a semi-diameter of the earth would measure at the sun would be in the inverse proportion of the distance, and would be as 100 to 28. That is, 100 is to 28 as 31 seconds is to the angle which a semi-diameter of the earth would measure at the distance of the sun. Twenty-eight times 31 seconds equal 868 seconds, which divided by 100 equals 8 68-100 or 8.68 seconds. The whole number of seconds in an entire circle is 360x60x60=1,296,000 seconds. Now as 8.68 seconds is the measure of a semi-diameter of the earth, or 3,962 miles, at the distance of the sun, it is contained as many times in 1,296,000 seconds as 3,962 miles is contained in the number of miles represented by the whole orbit of the earth. If we divide 1,296,000 seconds by 8.68 seconds, we hav 147,000 as the quotient; and this multiplied by 3,962 will giv us the circumference of the earth's orbit. One hundred and forty-seven thousand times 3,962=582,414,000 miles, the distance the earth travels in going around the sun. The circumference of a circle is 3 1416-10000 or 3.1416 times the diameter. Hence, 582,414,000 divided by 3.1416 = 185,200,000, the diameter of the earth's orbit, and half of that equals 92,600,000, its radius, or the distance of the earth from the sun. Of course, as neither the earth nor Venus moves in exact circles, but in ellipses, different measurements differ from each other a few fractions of a second, but by comparing many different measurements, astronomers hav ascertained the earth to be about 93,000,000 miles from the sun. The distance of Venus from the sun is 72-100 of 93,000,000, equal to 66,960,000 miles. Venus at its transit measures about one minute of a degree, and hence it is a little smaller than the earth. Mr. Hindman will readily see that in Fig. 2, in the triangle extending from the earth to Venus, we hav the angle at Venus equal to 31 seconds; that at the earth's center equal to 90 seconds, and that at station 1 equal to 89 degrees 59 minutes 29 seconds. Thus having two angles and an included side he can compute the length of the other two sides.

All these computations are based on simple observed facts, and involve nothing more intricate than a surveyor uses in calculating the distance across a lake or river to any inaccessible point.

Milwaukee, Or. D. PRIESTLEY.

Bacon and Shakspere.

A correspondent of the Indianapolis Sentinel, signing himself "Ram-Chusa-Chum," has been discussing the question of the authorship of Shakspere in a series of articles. He is a most decided Baconian. In regard to Mr. Burr's pamphlet, "Bacon and Shakspere," he says:

> Let any man take what the records disclose as to Shakspere's genuin writing, which consists of these five scraps reproduced by Mr. Burr, and if he will examin them carefully, without bias or prejudice, he will be forced to the conclusion that Shakspere was an ignorant fellow, who has for nearly three centuries humbugged the literary world.

And in regard to the sonnets of Shakspere, he thus concludes:

> Now, who was the poet? Who was the friend? Who was the lady whom the poet loved in vain? The disinterested student of literature will find these questions answered according to the facts and the eternal fitness of things by Wm. Henry Burr. They were written by Francis Bacon to the Earl of Essex and his bride, the beautiful widow of Sir Philip Sidney.
>
> Essex was gallant, rich, and very handsome. Bacon persuaded him to marry. Bacon loved the Widow Sidney, and Essex was preferred by her. His marriage was kept secret from Queen Elizabeth. Essex was very fond of Spenser, the poet alluded to in the sonnets 80, 83, and 85, and he built a monument to him. He tried to advance Bacon to the post of attorney-general, and when disappointed in that he gave him an estate worth nearly £2,000.
> Fix the date when the poems were written at 1590, and the sonnets are as symmetrical and truthful as they are beautiful. Mr. Burr deserves much praise for the study and learning spent in solving the mystery which has puzzled the learned.

The same writer refers to a magnificent work published in 1883 by Mrs. Henry Pott, of London, entitled, "Bacon's Promus of Formularies and Elegancies."

> Certain notes of Bacon were preserved in the British Museum, unnoticed and not deemed worthy of examination. She took them and arranged the fifty sheets or folios so as to show clearly that the Promus was Bacon's workshop wherein he arranged sentences, axioms, proverbs, quotations, forms of expression, of compliment, application, excuse, and repartee. These are his own invention. Among these are also apothegms, verses out of the Bible, and lines from the Latin poets. Out of this workshop, as she explains in her preface, Bacon drew forth things old and new.
> This industrious and charming writer has taken these entries, 1,680 in number, and classified them into proverbs; those from the Bible and classics, English, French, Spanish, and Italian; next aphorisms; then metaphors, similes, and figures; then turns of expression; then single words, mottoes, and forms of salutation. After that she examins the works of 328 known writers who flourished during and before the time of Bacon (more than 5,300 works in all), and she finds that this workshop was used to write Shakspere's plays. If not, these two men must hav read the same books, frequented the same society, learned the same languages, and studied the same sciences. Bacon either wrote the plays, or he took notes for the use of Shakspere, since the Promus notes are nearly all reproduced in the plays and sonnets. And Mrs. Pott finds, after a close and severe inspection of all previous and contemporary writers, that these notes of Bacon nowhere else appear.

If Delia Bacon did become insane on the eve of her great discovery, an able, logical, and learned disciple of the same sex has produced a book on the same subject which I defy any worshiper of the pretender Shakspere to answer.

But the most astounding discovery in regard to Bacon and Shakspere is claimed to hav been made by the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, of Minnesota, whose letter to Mr. Appleton Morgan, of New York, is printed in the Indianapolis Sentinel of March 8th, from a copy taken by the correspondent. Mr. Morgan is the author of a book entitled "The Shakesperean Myth." Mr. Donnelly has for several years been working out a cipher, which he alleges he has found in the Shakspere Folio of 1623, and he writes to Mr. Morgan as follows:

I hav just been working out the details of Harry Percy's visit to Shakspere, at Stratford-on-Avon, and it is told with the utmost detail. His whole family is described—his young brother Edmund, his daughter Susanna, his wife, and sister. The very bill of fare at supper is given, and a very mean one it was, consisting of "dried cakes, mouldie and ancient," roast mutton, far advanced in decomposition, the odor of which perfumed the room; bitter beer, and worse Bordeaux-stuff. The smell of the meat took away the appetite of the dandy Percy. Percy told Shakspere that the queen's officers were after him, to arrest him as the author of "Richard II." [1598-9], which represented the deposition and murder of the king, and was an incentiv to treason, and that he (Shakspere) must fly to Holland or Scotland, and stay there until the storm blew over. Shakspere became abusiv of Bacon, or Master Francis, for getting him into such a scrape, and said that he would confess all, and show who was to blame. Percy then told him that to prevent Bacon's exposure, Master Francis would deny the authorship and the world would believe him. "Who would conceive," says Percy, "of one man putting the honor of such immortal works on the shoulders of another? Did you not giv yourself out as the author? Did you not flourish in new silks and feathers in every bawdy-house in London as the writer? Hav you not profited by these plays—grown rich out of them? Why kept thou in silence so long?—" and much more to the same purpose.

I know it is hard for the world to believe that one set of great writings could be made the vehicle of another set; but the character of the age must be remembered as an age of tyranny and oppression, and also the extraordinary character of the mind that wrote the plays—a mind not to be measured by any ordinary standard of ability and industry.

Why should I assert that I hav found a cipher—not a hop-skip-and-jump cipher, but a mathematically accurate rule—if I hav not? I ask no money from any one. If I should publish a work that was a fraud and a delusion, the few copies I would sell before the truth was discovered would not compensate me for the everlasting shame and ridicule that would fall upon me. And can anyone believe that I would concoct a deliberate lie which a few months would explode? And as for notoriety, I hav enough of that already. Is it to be believed that I would imperil whatever little honor I may hav gained by my exceptionally successful books, "Atlantis" and "Ragnarok," by a pretented claim to a great discovery?

I say to you, my friend, dismiss all theorizing. Francis Bacon was the real Shakspere. The Mecca of the world is St. Albans, not Stratford. This will be made as plain in a few months as that two and two make four; it will be made as indisputable as the multiplication table. There is no getting away from arithmetic, and the Bacon cipher in the Shakspere plays is vitalized arithmetic.

I don't mind the flings of the daily press—the witlings must hav their quips. An eastern paper sent a correspondent the other day to interview me. The correspondent frankly told me that the editor's instructions were to make sport of my labors. I showed him some of my manuscript, and the result was that the correspondent went away thoroughly converted, and wrote an article to that effect, which the editor refused to publish because it would help to advertise my book. Fancy a continental journalist refusing to publish anything about Champollion's interpretation of the Rosetta Stone, which laid bare the secrets of the Egyptian hieroglyphics, because it would advertise Champollion's book! Fancy a Spanish journalist in the davs of Ferdinand and Isabella (if any such then existed) refusing to notice the return of Columbus, fresh from the discovery of the new world, unless paid advertising rates for the same!

A Moral Boycott.

We gave expression last week to our view of boycotting, condemning the practice as we think it ought to be condemned, severely. No men hav a right to combine against others to their detriment, and to render them unable to carry on the free exercise of their calling, as the boycott demands. It is a conspiracy, and if there are not laws adequate for its punishment such laws ought to be made. And yet there is a method by which, in a modified form, the boycott can be used to advantage. There is a moral boycott which we advocate. For example here is the Sunday newspaper. We urge a moral boycott against it. The Sunday newspaper is issued for the purpose of making money. It is not designed as an engin of moral progress.—Illustrated Christian Weekly, March 6, 1886.

As a representativ evangelical paper which is circulated in thousands of Sunday-schools, and for which all good little boys and girls are enjoined to bring their pennies, it is supposable that the sentiments quoted above voice a very large proportion of the Christian reading public. Boycotting, as a peaceable and legal means to right the wrongs of labor, it condemns, and asks for laws to suppress it. Boycotting has been going on for ages, long before the birth of the man who gave it a name, and labor has been the boycotted, and capital the boycotter; and yet our Christian friends hav never before raised a pious howl against it.

Corporations may meet and conspire against the just demands of labor, but if its individual members contribute liberally to the church, even when the money may represent (as it often does) the very life's blood of the toiler, the church accepts it joyfully, and calls the giver "a large-hearted Christian gentleman and enterprising citizen."

No better proof of the close partnership of the church with monopoly can possibly be adduced than the demand from this Christian paper for a law to punish boycotting. Punishment for boycotting! Are we in America—free America—where every man is allowed to be his own best judge as to whom he shall giv his custom, and from whom he shall withhold it? Does this imperial editor imagin for one moment that such a law could ever be enacted, much less enforced? Or shall we charitably conclude that his thoughts and ideas were a little mixed, and that he imagined himself in China or Japan, or some other heathen country for which so much money is raised, and so little ever arrives at its alleged destination?

But there is a "moral" boycott which he advocates, and that is against Sunday newspapers, and he advises all classes not to purchase them. This is a "moral boycott" with a pecuniary resulting loss to somebody, and differs from an ordinary boycott about as much as a boiled lobster does from a live one. One is cooked and palatable and can be eaten; the other cannot, but still they are both lobsters all the same.

Now, because this "moral" boycott is directed against a Sunday newspaper, and having been boiled down and made palatable by naming it "moral," the whole religious world will swallow it at one gulp. What if the editor and his subordinates are all forced to the wall, its owners ruined, what does that matter so long as it is a "moral" boycott? Besides, our saintly scribe lifts his hands in holy horror and tells us with unfeigned sadness the awful fact that the Sunday newspaper is published for the sake of making money. Horrible, if true, and total depravity, no doubt. Newspapers as a rule publish their issues entirely for the benefit of the people, without money and without price, and open their advertising columns free to all; and if it can be proven that the Sunday newspaper is published for the sake of making money, its editors and owners should be dealt with in a summary manner—say, for instance, compelled to listen to the reading of the Illustrated Christian Weekly until they beg for death. In this way they would no doubt be disposed of quickly enough.

Religious cant and hypocrisy hav become so very transparent that people of almost the lowest order of intelligence hav awakened to the fact that the church first and foremost goes for the money, and that sinners in casting their burden an the Lord receive back a heavier one, which they must carry or be damned. My clerical friend, your moral boycott is a delusiv sham, and is a fit companion for other pious shams which are used as occasion may require.

WM. ALLEN SMITH.

Superstition in the Labor Movement.

I followed the crowd into Irving Hall one night last week when the workingmen had their mass meeting in favor of the eight-hour system. The hall is one of the largest in the city, and it was full. It looked to me as if this ought to be a great day for the movement, and may be it was, but I don't think so. A certain Mr. Quinn had been chosen chairman of the meeting, and when I entered he was contending for the abolition of poverty on the ground that "God Almighty never intended for men to be poor," which was rather a novel proposition to lay before a multitude of intelligent people. The position of God on the labor question is not of the slightest importance, but it may be suggested that he would scarcely hav given the assurance that the poor we would always hav with us if he had intended wealth to be universal. There is nothing quite so tiresome as listening to those dogmatic persons who attribute their own conceits to God and deliver them as revelations from the divine will.

The attraction which had drawn the people together on this occasion was Mr. Henry George, the author of "Progress and Poverty." Mr. George is also author of a scheme for the nationalization of land, which, as I understand it, would make all land the non-transferable property of the government. A man, under Mr. George's proposed scheme, may not buy land, but he may liv upon it and improve it, and if he wish to move he may sell the improvements. But as improvements on land, especially such as effect its productivness, and therefore its value, are inseparable from the land itself, the land would necessarily go with the improvements. Under our present defectiv system it is the land that is sold, improvements included. Somebody may be able to point out the practical difference between selling land and throwing in the improvements, and selling the improvements and throwing in the land, but I hav not been able to see it. Yet I believe it is upon the merits of this scheme for land nationalization that Mr. George's reputation as a political economist rests.

At a fair in the prohibition state of Maine there was upon exhibition a striped pig. Every man who paid ten cents to see the striped pig received a glass of liquor gratis; and thus under prohibition of land-selling every man who pays for certain improvements will receive a farm gratis.

To recur to [illegible] meeting, Mr. George was received with overwhelming applause, and was listened to with the closest and most respectful attention. It soon transpired from the direction of his remarks that he favored an act of the legislature which should make it a misdemeanor for an employee to work more than eight hours out of the twenty-four. Leaving in the background the fact that we already hav in this state a similar law, to which no one pays the slightest attention, Mr. George went on to develop his argument in support of such a statute. And what grounds do you think he based it upon? He placed it plumb beside the Sunday laws, whose beneficence he defended with all the strength of his lungs. To the Christian Sabbath, he held, which had its sanction and authority among the thunders of Sinai, from the creator himself, the world owed all the progress which it had achieved. Except for the Sunday laws, he argued, mankind would still be in the degraded state industrially, whatever that may hav been, in which it was situated before the Sunday was established. Such was Mr. George's main argument in favor of an eight-hour law, and it is due to the intelligence of the audience to say that it was not received with marked enthusiasm. The remainder of the address was good in a general sense, but it had slight reference to the eight-hour movement.

Mr. George is one of those who hold the superstition that something can still be done by law to better human conditions; one of those who believe that it is possible for a workingman's law to be either passed or enforced. He holds, too, in the face of fact, that the religious and labor questions are one; that the ministers are the workingman's best friends, and that the Salvation Army fanaticism is of vast industrial significance.

A comical illustration of the clergy's deep insight into the labor problem has just been furnished by the Baptist ministers. The "Social Union" of this sect recently invited John Swinton, the labor advocate, to address them on the burning questions of the day. Mr. Swinton could not find the time to do so. But of course, he remarks, they found a speaker; and one who, judging from their hilarious displays, suited them infinitly better than he could hav done. Who was the man? "By the beard of the prophet," says John, they picked out the very man who, next to Jay Gould, is the most vicious embodiment of piety and capitalism in this part of the country—Deacon Richardson, of Brooklyn, "whose rapacity and inhumanity brought about the recent street-car strike that tied up all the lines of this city, and whom his victims fought through all the thickets of cunning and treachery until they forced him to a surrender whose terms he has ever since been trying to pervert." But Deacon Richardson suited the ministers exactly, and when he told them that the best cure for strikes was "phlebotomy," i.e., blood-letting, they applauded him to the echo. Having listened to this address on the labor problem, which they doubtless think, after all, was practically the same as Mr. Swinton would hav delivered, the Baptist preachers are prepared to rest from their labors, having "investigated" the industrial question as far as they are capable of understanding it.

The clergy do not nowadays actually go out of their way to decry the labor agitation, but they are not as activ in forwarding it to the right solution as others are who hav less opportunity to do so. If they could instruct their flocks in the principles of trades unionism, for instance, as a beginning, the result might be salutary. I do not suppose that St. Paul's prohibition against a bishop being a "striker" extends to the whole clerical profession so as to prevent their saying a good word for those who are strikers. It is possible, however, that the Catholic church is taking a greater interest in the Knights of Labor than will prove to be healthy to the latter organization. It goes undisputed that Master Workman Powderly is a member of the Romish church, and the forty days during which, according to his late instructions, no new members are received into the order, happen to be contemporary with Lent, though that may be merely a coincidence. A large number of workingmen, of course, are identified with the church. Perhaps as with vice,

> Seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> They first endure, then pity, then embrace.

I hav read of some church father, now happily dead, who explained the necessity for four gospels on the ground that the earth has four corners. I am also prepared to hear the notion of the trinity supported on the theory that the earth is three-cornered; and when these arguments are accepted as sound it will be time to base a plea for the eight-hour day on the evident design of "God," and to argue its adoption from the beneficent effect of Sunday laws. Until then it will be sufficient to know that shorter hours for labor are demanded by the interests of humanity and by the Central Labor Union.

The Numerousness of Christians.

In a doubtful election some time ago a celebrated politician was appealed to to know what the party managers should do. His reply was, "Claim everything." The ministerial caterers for the unread Christians hav adopted the tactics of this politician. A correspondent asks: "Will you please inform me if the statement of the American Sunday-school Union Quarterly is correct in regard to the number of Christians in the world?" The statement is that the number of Christians in the world was, is, and will be as follows:

1st century	500,000	17th century	155,000,000
3d "	5,000,000	18th "	200,000,000
13th "	15,000,000	19th "	400,000,000
15th "	100,000,000	20th "	800,000,000
16th "	125,000,000

This of course is guess-work, as are the most of foundations of the Christian creeds, and it is very poor guess-work. Schem's "Statistics of the World" givs the following figures:

Christians	388,000,000	Confucians	80,000,000
Buddhists	340,000,000	Sinto religion	14,000,000
Mohammedans	201,000,000	Judaism	7,000,000
Brahmanism	175,000,000

The figures are inconclusiv for the reason that the gatherers of the statistics are indiscriminate in their classification. They put the United States down as all Christian, when the most ignorant person that ever edited a Sunday-school paper must know that there are many hundreds of thousands of Infidels in the land. France is likewise classified as Christian, and her whole population called Christian in the face of the fact that the recent census-takers found 7,000,000 of persons calling themselvs Infidels. If the Christians should confine their claim to some three hundred million they would be nearer right. As to what their numbers will be a hundred years from now, they hav no means of knowing. The indications are that the number will be less than now instead of double. Schem's statistics, too, are questioned. The Union Bible Dictionary says that the Protestants and Greek, and Roman Catholics count only 175,000,000 noses. As the Dictionary and Schem compute the entire population of the globe at about the same figures, the reader may take his choice between their respectiv estimates of the total number of Christians.

In considering this matter, however, it is not honest to call every man in a so-called "Christian" country a Christian. Aside from the outspoken Infidel, there are a great many people in the United States, for instance, who should properly be classified among those outside the church. Months ago, in 1884, in considering this subject we said—and we cannot say it better now: Perhaps one-half of the nominal Christians of the country accept the theory of evolution. To put it broadly, and yet accurately, no one can be a Christian who is an evolutionist. It is utterly impossible to reconcile with Genesis the laws of natural selection, of the survival of the fittest, and of the gradual ascent of man from the animal kingdom. Yet upon Adam's creation, and subsequent fall in the manner specified, depends the whole scheme of vicarious atonement, which is the very essence of Christianity. Theologians may quibble and twist and squirm as much as they like, but they can never get around this. If Eden is a myth, Calvary was useless, and the sacrifice of the "god" upon its cross of no more avail in the remission of sin than the lives of the two thieves said to hav been crucified with him. We believe in consistency. Truth is an agreement of statement with fact. There is hardly a statement or position of Christianity—no essential one—that agrees with ascertained and demonstrated facts. And while the great body of the people of this country acknowledge and accept the demonstrated facts, a portion of them still delude themselvs with the fancy that they are Christians. Popular Protestant Christianity is getting to be a very vague and shadowy system of theology. People are allowing themselvs to be called Christians when they are no more real Christians than are Hottentots. They do not believe in the fundamental assertions of the system, nor in the formulated creeds. They are simply moving along with the drift of the times, and that drift is very well known and acknowledged to be widely divergent from the narrow current setting toward the church. No comparativ estimate of the strength and weakness of denominational Christianity in this country can be within a million miles of accurate which does not take these facts into consideration.

Last summer Dr. Deems, of this city, made the same assertion that the Sunday-school paper makes. Colonel Ingersoll was shown the paper, and his opinion of the statement asked. He replied: "I suppose that the population of the earth is greater now than at any other time within the historic period. This being so, there may be more Christians, so-called, in the world than there were a hundred years ago. Of course, the reverend doctor, in making up his aggregate of Christians, counts all kinds and sects—Unitarians, Universalists, and all the other 'ans,' and 'ists,' and 'ics,' and 'ites,' and 'ers.' But Dr. Deems must admit that only a few years ago most of the persons he now calls Christians would hav been burnt as heretics and Infidels. Let us compare the average New York Christian with the Christian of two hundred years ago. It is probably safe to say that there is not now in the city of New York a genuin Presbyterian outside of an insane asylum. Probably no one could be found who will to-day admit that he believes absolutely in the Presbyterian Confession of Faith. There is probably not an Episcopalian who believes in the Thirty-Nine Articles. Probably there is not an intelligent minister in the city of New York, outside of the Catholic church, who believes that everything in the Bible is true. Probably no clergyman, of any standing, would be willing to take the ground that everything in the Old Testament—leaving out the question of inspiration—is actually true. Very few ministers now preach the doctrin of eternal punishment. Most of them would be ashamed to utter that brutal falsehood. A large majority of gentlemen who attend church take the liberty of disagreeing with the preacher. They would hav been very poor Christians two hundred years ago. A majority of the ministers take the liberty of disagreeing in many things with their presbyteries and synods. They would hav been very poor preachers two hundred years ago. Dr. Deems forgets that most Christians are only nominally so. Very few believe their creeds. Very few even try to liv in accordance with what they call Christian doctrins. Nobody loves his enemies. No Christian when smitten on one cheek turns the other. Most Christians do take a little thought for the morrow. They do not depend entirely upon the providence of God. Most Christians now hav greater confidence in the average life insurance company than in God—feel easier when dying to know that they hav a policy through which they expect the widow will receive ten thousand dollars than when thinking of all the scripture promises. Even church-members do not trust in God to protect their own property. They insult heaven by putting lightning-rods on their temples. They insure the churches against the act of God. The experience of man has shown the wisdom of relying on something that we know something about, instead of upon the shadowy supernatural. The poor wretches to-day in Spain, depending upon their priests, die like poisoned flies—die with prayers between their pallid lips—die in their filth and faith."

We think these two paragraphs are quite sufficient replies to the boasting of the church. The truth of the matter is that nobody knows how many Christians there were in any century from the year 1 to the present, and least of all does anyone know how many there will be next century.

Lottery Circulars.

Judge Barr, sitting as federal judge in Louisville, decided that a newspaper containing an advertisment of a lottery is not a lottery circular, and is mailable.

This, it seems to us, is a constitutional decision, for if Congress may prohibit the mailing of advertisments of lotteries, it may prohibit the mailing of anything else it choses; and who can say where it would stop? Such a power would be dangerous in the hands of a body of men with strong prejudices. We agree with the Galveston News that "practically there are no bounds to the inconsistencies and usurpations of lawmakers, nor can it be inferred that there ever will be while the grant of powers is a jumble of everything relating to business and morals instead of being strictly for protection against force and fraud."

Modern Martyrdom.

In former times, when the Christians found a heretic among them, his path was made seriously unpleasant with the least possible circumlocution. They went to the root of the matter direct. The heretic usually went to the stake. If a man doubted the apostolic authority of the church, he never was allowed grounds to doubt the authority of the Inquisition. If to him Genesis was a legend, the rack was not. It was a palpable and historical fact. If to the mind of the heretic the supernatural birth of Jesus was incredible, he readily found proof of the existence of iron virgins bringing forth corpses. And though he might asseverate never so stoutly that graves did not giv up their dead, he had no difficulty whatever in discovering dungeons to which the never-yielding grave would hav been infinitly preferable.

This is somewhat changed now. There are dungeons yet for unbelievers, it is true, but not those above flowing rivers whose tide bears the dead on to the seas or casts the bodies upon unknown banks; and neither do the dungeons open so frequently as of yore. A decent respect for the opinions of mankind compels the Christians to be more careful. Imprisonment for heresy is now the exception and not the rule. Still, there is persecution going on for opinion's sake. If we could get an Infidel from eacl town and city in the country to stand up in a line, no doubt the grievances would correspond with the number so arrayed. Social slights, petty persecutions, trade troubles, business and professional boycotts, with other little lapses back to the time of Christian control of the world, would make an indictment much longer than any moral law ever observed by the "children of light." These things do exist and overcome us like a summer cloud, but without any special wonder, because atavism is recognized as a more or less ineradicable trait of the human animal.

But if any scientific student of religious human nature wants to bag a few specimens of nineteenth century persecution of heretics, let him call at this office. If he can classify them among any species heretofore known, he will be amply remunerated for the time spent. No doubt the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav noticed that occasionally the paper is badly printed. Sometimes, too, the paper arrives at a subscriber's town from one to three days late. A great many would-be readers hav complained that THE TRUTH SEEKER is non-purchasable at newsstands. In fact, the complaints of one sort or another run up into the scores, and occasionally the managers are accused of lack of business capacity, energy, enterprise, or what not.

It is a sound principle in philosophy that every effect has a cause. Listen to our tale of woe and then say whether the effects we hav mentioned hav not a cause. Once in the long ago we got on the right side of a post-office employee. We don't know his name, so it will be useless to ask. He was a sub rosa Freethinker. We asked him something about the interior working of the establishment to which THE TRUTH SEEKER contributes a thousand or two dollars per year. One question in particular we wanted answered. Why is it, we queried, that, when THE TRUTH SEEKER is mailed Wednesday night, a subscriber in Orange, N. J., never gets it till Friday or Saturday, when a train leaves every half hour or so, and Orange is only twelve miles out? "Huh! that's easy," he said; "them fellows know your wrappers, and that it's an Infidel paper, and they discriminate. That's all." It was enough. All that could be done was to change the wrappers.

A Freethinking acquaintance was superintendent of a press-room down town. His firm was given the printing of the paper. By and by the firm failed, but the successors kept on printing. Every two or three weeks about five hundred papers were printed over; next the edition would be short about that number. What was the matter? "Oh, the pressmen don't like Infidelity; guess they don't take much pains in counting the paper." The firm is notified that the paper is to be printed elsewhere, and promptly we get this gentle note: "Glad of it; don't want to print your damned blasphemous sheet, anyhow."

Over across town goes the paper to another printer, and the illustrations begin. So does the trouble. When Mr. Heston had a good hit at the Protestants the persecution was mild; when he rapped the Catholics the pressmen got in their solid work for their savior. Mr. John's likening Leo XIII. to the devil brought down the house. Other people's ink was no object to those grimy sons of Rome in that press-room. If Colonel Ingersoll couldn't be suppressed, his picture could be covered up. If the Catholic church burnt Bruno, no one in this century was going to know it if printer's ink would hide the fact. Away in the background Mr. John painted Huss in the flames. But no gazer at that picture ever knew it. On the last page Mr. Heston satisfactorily answered a conundrum that has puzzled people for years. He threw in a few ornaments for good measure. Who among our readers knows what those ornaments were? Where is the chair that Pharaoh hung his clothes across when he went to bed and left his jewels exposed? If Rome had revered Moses, we candidly confess that we do not believe a microscope would hav found even his outlines left in that picture. That firm does not now print THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Down in Rose street there is a fat and good-natured printer—one of the best in town. He has printed thousands of books for this concern. A short time ago a new edition of the "Age of Reason" was required. He got the job. But we did not got the books. What was the matter? Only the pressman refused to "feed" an Infidel work; that's all. Not much, the Christian will say; but still it was enough to imperil the eternal souls of the Truth Seeker Company, if thinking damn will do it.

A down-town printer was approached by the business manager with a proposition to print THE TRUTH SEEKER. "Yes; be glad to do it." "Well, how about your pressmen?" asked the cautious business manager. "This paper hits the Catholics pretty hard." "Oh, that'll be all right; the only trouble we hav with our men is when we print some Catholic work; then they steal a good many copies. I don't think they'll steal this paper." But the chances were too great, and the present printer is a man who does work for the pay, and we hav an ironclad contract that will ruin him when he fails to do the work promptly and well. But if some week the readers cannot see what the pictures represent, or are unable to read what any writer has said, let them possess their souls in patience and think of the business manager running around for a new pressroom.

On another tack the Christians hav us on the hip. The biggest news company in the country refuses to take a book with our imprint, and the newsdealers throughout the country, with a few brilliant exceptions, refuse to handle the "damned Infidel sheet." Recently a small news company took a great number of papers, and placed them on sale at the newstands. Straightway we were the recipients of postal cards informing us that our father, the devil, had a place prepared of which our immediate occupancy was energetically desired. One objurgatory postal card brought the information that the newsagent wouldn't keep such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to pile the religious Pelion on the Ossa of persecution, he forwarded, for the benefit of the editor, No. 1 of the "Anti-Infidel Library," being a lecture on the "Inspiration of the Bible," by H. L. Hastings, the militant editor of the Boston Christian. Its chief argument was that Moses was a general, while Mr. Ingersoll was only a colonel. Mr. Hastings does not believe in the criticism of superior officers by subordinates.

Cases could be drawn out as long as a Down East deacon's face on Sunday, but space in THE TRUTH SEEKER is finite. Only a few of the pleasant paths trod by heretics, and particularly publishers of heretical papers, hav been pointed out. There are highways and byways in the business that none but a pachyderm can tread without committing murder. Nevertheless, modern martyrdom is preferable to the the ancient style, and perhaps we ought, instead of grumbling at the small annoyances of Catholic workmen and pious newsdealers, to congratulate ourselvs that we are not all dead.

The church of Christ is a great institution.

Prose Poems and Selections.

A new edition—and almost a new book—of "Prose Poems and Selections" has been prepared by Mr. Ingersoll's publisher, Mr. C. P. Farrell—a gentleman, by the way, whom it is a privilege to know and a pleasure to do business with—and placed on sale with the Truth Seeker and other bookstores. The edition is of the same quarto size, and the printer and bookbinder hav exhausted their respectiv resources to make the volume an ornament to the libraries and center-tables of the buyers.

The matter of the book includes all in the old edition and a great many new articles. The previous short paragraphs upon Abraham Lincoln hav been replaced by "Motley and Monarch," and the Tribute to Elizur Wright is also included, as is one to the Rev. Alexander Clark. The other new pieces are: Apostrophe to Liberty, The Warp and Woof, Originality, What is Worship? God Silent, Night and Morning, The Conflict, Death of the Aged, The Charity of Extravagance, Woman, Apostrophe to Science, Imagination, No Respecter of Persons, What is Blasphemy? and a poem on the Birthplace of Burns.

Of course it is unnecessary to say anything concerning the beauty of the selections. Mr. Ingersoll dresses the truths he speaks in the most magnificent garb it is possible to weave from the English language, and it goes without saying that all these prose poems and selections are masterpieces of composition.

The price of the volume remains at $2.5), and we shall be glad to fill orders for it.

The Ten Commandments.

A correspondent asks, "Where did Moses get the Ten Commandments?"

We might answer this in letter by saying Moses did not get them; but the spirit of the inquiry needs also to be satisfied, for is it not written that the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life?

The writer of Exodus borrowed the manner of Moses's reception of the law from the legends concerning Bacchus, the sun-god, who was also called the lawgiver, and whose laws were written on two tables of stone. The idea of receiving them on a mountain is taken from the Persian legend related of Zoroaster. Prof. Max Müller says: "What applies to the religion of Moses applies to that of Zoroaster. It is placed before us as a complete system from the first, revealed by Ahuramazda (Ormuzd), proclaimed by Zoroaster." According to the tale of Zoroaster's disciples (as reliable as some of the disciples' stories about Jesus), that eminent lawgiver went one day to a high mountain to pray, and in the midst of thunder and lightning the Lord himself appeared before him and delivered to him the book of the law. Zoroaster escaped unharmed from this interview with the Lord, just as, when Moses came down, "the skin of his face did shine." The book of the law is called the Zend-Avesta, which signifies the "living word."

The Buddhists also hav the Ten Commandments almost identical with the Hebrew ones. It is also related that Minos, the lawgiver of the Cretans, ascended a mountain and received from the supreme lord (Zeus) the sacred laws. Diodorus, the Grecian historian, says that "the idea promulgated by the ancient Egyptians, that their laws were received direct from the most high god, has been adopted with success by many other lawgivers, who hav thus insured respect for their institutions."

The writer of Exodus obtained the idea from these traditions floating through the different countries.

Editorial Notes.

THE editor of the Day Star seems to hav experienced a change of heart toward Colonel Ingersoll as gratifying to the friends of that gentleman as previous editorial slurs were repelling.

THE enlargement of the Independent Pulpit is an exceedingly valuable change. The April number contains some twenty articles of permanent value. Mr. Shaw is as good an editor as lecturer, and with his enlarged space will undoubtedly provide the best of Liberal literature for a constituency which we hope will grow as the merits of the Pulpit deserve.

IN the spring the Administration lightly turns to thoughts of love. The statement is generally credited that President Cleveland is about to be married. Considering his violent denunciation of Mormon practices, doubtless there are papers in the country—though THE TRUTH SEEKER is not one of them—who will inquire after the woman whose name figured so largely in the last presidential campaign. We believe she is not yet dead. Mr. Cleveland is a Presbyterian.

THE World's Advance Thought—the Avant Courier of the New Spiritual Dispensation is the name of a large quarto paper of which the Progressiv Publishing Company of Salem, Oregon, are editors and proprietors. The matter contained in the first issue corresponds in tone to the general drift of the title, and the paper is well printed. We notice that the company has listed THE TRUTH SEEKER as its New York agent, but as we are entirely unacquainted with the publishers we must decline to receive the honor.

THE Somerville Christian Observer is of the opinion that the account of Moses's burial is a foot note by some editor of Deuteronomy, which has somehow been run into the body of the book. The Christian at Work scoffs at this explanation as "but an application of the higher criticism on the principles set forth by Professor Briggs." The Christian at Work says that if Jesus's "reference to Moses as the author of the law settles the question of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, why flinch at the last chapter? Why not include that, too, and make Moses the prenostic narrator of his own funeral?"

THE Diocesan Union of Brooklyn is composed of ten societies connected with the Roman Catholic church. Attached to the Union is a debating society which mects in the rooms of the Young Men's Association in the cathedral on Jay street. Recently the following subject was discussed: "Should the Preaching of Infidelity be Prohibited by Law?" We record with gratification that in the Catholic church there are priests who are graciously pleased to admit that to this subject there are two sides, and on the occasion spoken of two of these tolerant gentlemen took the negativ of the proposition. The first speaker was of a bloodthirsty disposition. He said that "the necessity of having some means whereby we may check the evils accruing from the so-called philosophical preaching of the Infidel is apparent to every sincere Christian who has given the subject his serious attention. The Infidel of to-day is just the same as he has been for centuries past. They are actuated by a hatred of God and the teachings of his holy church, prompted by the devil through the instrumentality of self-conceit. Can this state of affairs be tolerated in a Christian country? What says a conscience guided by the holy and ennobling teachings of Christ? It says it is wrong, and, as it is wrong, it becomes our duty to suppress or obliterate it. This is a duty that we owe not only to ourselvs, but to God and to posterity. Every Christian is aware—or should be—that he should, if necessary, lay down his life in defense of God. We, as citizens of this country, hav it in our power to suppress these insults to God, and the means to this end is law. And, as Christians, we are obliged to do so. The non-fulfilment of this obligation God will hold us strictly accountable for on that day when men shall be judged in strict accordance with their acts here on earth." Another good Catholic said: "While I believe in free specch, there should be a certain limit to it. The preaching of Infidelity should not be tolerated in this country. Its preaching is far more serious than that of treason; while the state allows freedom of speech, it does not allow anyone to blaspheme God. Who ever heard of anyone placing the Almighty in a second place? The Infidels of to-day are doing a great deal of harm. If people hear Ingersoll, and they in any way get prejudiced against their own religion, they not only injure themselvs, but also their families. At a meeting of clergymen in the east a few weeks ago one of their number preached on Socialism. He held that Socialistic societies, as a rule, were Infidels, and that if one thousand rich men were done away with, it would be better for them." Another gentleman asserted that the preaching of Infidclity ruins the mind of everyone who listens to it. "The church," he added, "had always stamped it out." On the other side, there were two speakers, who advocated the herctical notion that Infidels hav a right to liv. They were eloquent gentlemen, and the jury decided that they had the best of the argument. The Freethinkers of the country may therefore rest secure. The debating club of the Diocesan Union has granted them a little longer lease of life.

Letters from Friends.

ST. PAUL, MINN., March 26, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $8; $3 of which is for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $5 to go toward illustrating your most excellent paper. You will remember I promised $10 a year for that purpose. This, of course, is exclusiv of the regular subscription price, $3. I will remit the balance before the expiration of the year.

Yours respectfully, JOHN C. ROE.

REEDER, KAN., April 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav had the pleasure of reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for two months, and am well pleased with it in in every particular. The illustrations are grand. It is pretty strong medicin, judging from the wry faces some are making at it, which, I think, is a pretty good indication that there are still some of the old impurities in the blood. Doubtless they hav had homeopathic treatment, which often fails iu old chronic cases, but no milder remedies than you are giving will ever effect a radical cure.

Yours, WILL L. FRAZER.

WOODSTOCK, VT., April 12, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I see that some trouble has arisen on account of the pictures. I suppose each has his or her opinion, and has a right to it. But this difference should not go so far as to destroy THE TRUTH SEEKER.

As for myself, I think in many respects they convey something more lasting upon the mind than if only written. Therefore I wish that they may continue to embellish THE TRUTH SEEKER, for which I send a post order for $3. I am Yours, with respect, JOHN D. POWERS.

DENVER, COL., March 30, 1886.

DEAR LIBERAL FRIENDS: The "beautiful snow" has been falling most of the time for several days: during this condition of chronic monotony the grand old TRUTH SEEKER has come to hand, freighted with excelleut things. Leadeu skies, falling snow, slushy streets, are for the nonce forgotten as we turn to these leaves of inspiration for comfort and cheer.

First, here are the splendid cartoons, which tell so much in so small a space and help some people to see themselvs as the enlightened eyes of others see them. Then come the "Friendly Letters." The one signed "Mox" is a masterpiece in good hits aimed straight at the mark. Mr. Comstock ought to be deluged with Bibles; there is not such another obscene, cruel, bloody book iu the world. True, there are excellcut things iu it, but who with proper self-respect will go through a sea of filth for a few gems wheu these same gems lie all around us in clean and lovely places? How modest people can hug this volume to their hearts and call it holy, with its recountals of tales of lust, polygamy, murder, theft, and every crime in the calendar, is beyond compreheusion. When I was a church-member I always felt uneasy at a public reading of the Bible for fear some of the shocking recitals thereiu would be read. I hav heard many Christian womeu say the same. A few Sundays ago I attended church; the preacher read a chapter and took his text from the writings of that arch-polygamist, Solomon, informing us he was the "wisest man of all time," and spent most of his breath in his discourse in abusing the Mormons. O consistency!

Three cheers and a hearty hand-shake for "Mox."

The letter of L. G. Barnes shows a big Liberal heart. Any Liberals traveling, I feel comfortably sure, will find liberal treatment iu the homes of Mrs. Metzger and Mr. Barnes. There ought to be that cordiality aud hospitality, that enthusiastic feeling of "Hail fellow, well met!" among Liberals that there used to be among the old-time Methodists.

Mr. Shepherd's unique compliment to the cartoons is, like them, "worth its weight in Rocky Mountain gold." Lida Albert's letter from away up in Wyoming Territory gladdens our hearts for the cause of Liberalism iu that far-off region.

The blessed Children's Corner is bright enough for the snowiest day. What a queen of cheerful, solid sense Miss Wixon is! She and Mrs. Slenker are doing a vast amount of good for our young people. I hav just read "The Infidel School-teacher" aud "The Handsomest Woman," by this last-named author. They are sweet, inspiring stories, imbued with a sensible, lofty morality.

Our young people will read; instead of their reading-books filled with superstition and a false, degrading system of morals, I beg parents to be wise in time and lay the foundation of enlightened good seuse by giving their children proper mental food.

There is not one line in either of these ladies' writings that can call a blush to the gentlest brow or produce a bad thought in the purest mind. This cannot be said of the generality of books, which teach that wrong can be made right by the blood of a man said to hav been murdered nearly two thousand years ago.

Liberal friends, buy good Liberal books for your children; they are cheap. If I had a child I feel certain I could not make a grander, surer investment of a few dollars for him or her than in the purchase of good books. I well remember how my own childhood and youth were tortured and befogged by reading Sunday-school literature; then came long years of womanhood and arrested mental development in which life was more of a pain than a pleasure, the direct result of orthodox teaching.

McDonnell's "Heathens of the Heath" and "Exeter Hall" broke the spell ten years ago, aud here I am, though I hav lost property aud friends by death and because I hav ceased to believe orthodox creeds, happy in the sense of mental freedom and the continued progress of humanity. Dear Liberal friends, giv the young people good Liberal reading.

MRS. BUCKNER-JOHNSON, M.D.

NEW YORK, April 11, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Your readers will doubtless recall the passage in holy writ which says that when rogues fall out honest men get a rest. I rise to an illustration of that remark. You may hav observed that many well-meaning persons hitherto enjoying the distinction of counting Anthony Comstock among their activ enemies are no louger the objects of his special attention. This is because there is war in the family of humbugs. Squaring off at Anthony Comstock, and calling him all sorts of names, is one Mr. Lum Smith, of Philadelphia, editor and proprietor of the Agents' Herald, a paper devoted to booming advertisers iu novelties who patrouize it and abusing many who do not. As a non-advertising dealer in rare literature and objects of art, Comstock receives a good deal of adverse criticism in the Herald. Iu his issue for March, and iu a printed circular, Mr. Smith goes for Anthony "iu a way that I grieve." He dives down deep into the yawning chasm of the past and drags his opponent's record unfeelingly to light. He shows that Comstock is, to say the least, insincere in his efforts to check the dissemination of perilous literature, by pointing out that the same Comstock in 1877 rented a post-office box at Squan Village, N. J., from which place he advertised—not, however, in the Herald—to send "a book for sports," price 50 ceuts, to all who would mail him that sum. An answer to this advertisment resulted in the receipt of a copy of the New Testament (old version) followed by a book containing reading matter of a disastrous character, and a picture that was most demoralizing. I cau testify, Mr. Editor, to the accuracy of this description of the book and picture, having seen them myself and narrowly escaped demoralization thereby. Mr. Smith's objection to this conduct of Comstock does not seem to lie so much against the book and picture; what he is prejudiced against is a man sending that kind of literature along with "the New Testament of God." Mr. Smith expresses a doubt that any good motiv could actuate a truly devout man to do a thing like that.

The Herald man regards this indictmeut againist Comstock as a settler, and with a parting kick and a little pious reflection about the wickedness of calling the New Testament a "book for sports," he turns his attention to President Colgate of the Society for the Suppression of Vice. He indicates at the outset that Mr. Colgate is a humbug, which he substantiates by showing that after Colgate had been enthusiastic in securing the passage of a law to thwart the designs of those who, having married, would prevent nature from taking its course, the same Colgate went incontinently, as it were, into the business of manufacturing the very sort of article which his own law was intended to suppress.

Not content with making this charge against the venerable Mr. Colgate, the Herald man then proceeds to prove it by documentary evidence; which is what might be called adding injury to insult. Of course Mr. Comstock has known all along that he is a rascal and that the president of the society is an old fraud; and both of them know that they hav been bad eggs all their lives, but they are willing to let the dead Past officiate as its own undertaker while they pose before the living Present as Knights of the White Cross.

Finally, if there is auything that would delight the soul of the hilariously fiendish Mr. Smith, it would be to hav Colgate and Comstock sue him at law where he could display his chunks of truth before the judicial eyes of a judge and jury. Mr. Smith prays God to that end, and this test of the efficacy of prayer will be watched with great interest.

On the other hand, as I learn from the same Herald, Comstock has his eye on Smith. He rauks him among the sensational class of frauds who gull the public with advertisments of schemes by which "$10 to $25 per day" may be made "in your own home," and sees just as good reason why Smith should be suppressed as Smith sees why Comstock should be laid out. All good people must hope that Comstock and Smith will continue the fight. It will keep them both out of worse mischief, and whatever injury they do to each other cannot in the least affect the honest-dealing portion of the community. Nevertheless, of the two, Smith is no doubt the least objectionable person. But I am not writing this to call attention to Smith. He may not be a desperate man, though the pious twaddle he prints shows him to be a hypocrit. I think it best for the people to keep it in mind that Colgate advertised and sold a contraband article for alleged immoral purposes, and that from all appearances Comstock increased his own revenue by sending through the mails the vicious matter which he had taken by force from others. Mr. T. C. Leland used to say that it was not so important to keep God out of the Constitution as it was to keep the devil out of our post-office. MORITZ.

PARSIPPANY, N. J., April 7, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Two meetings were held in Pythian Hall on the 4th, in the interest of the Boonton Secular Union. There was a fair attendance, despite the bigotry and prejudice of the people against attending Liberal lectures, and the gloomy day and the melting snow in general, which made the traveling for pedestrians unpleasant. William G. Mayo, president of the Newark Secular Union, lectured in the afternoon on "Liberalism." He is an excellent speaker, and put in some telling blows in defense of truth and right. The province of Liberalism is to turn the attention of the men and women away from the gods, to turn men and women from an imaginary world to a present world of reality. It is to take them in their social relations and apply the discoveries of science, and the plainest moral principles as between men and women, and produce that which is the aim of all philanthropists—human happiness. The truly noble men and women will do acts of kindness without the hope of heaven or fear of hell, for they put their declaration of independence in the Religion of Humanity. He spoke with great earnestness of Hypatia—Hypatia, whom men went to hear by the thousands, and wondered at her words. We admire her courage, her white face haunts us, for down through the long centuries that hav passed away there comes an agonizing shriek. She was dragged limb from limb, and her flesh was torn into shreds and scattered far and wide. This was the work of the priests and the monks of the Romish church. These brutal monsters will go to heaven sure, if there is one, for they were men after God's own heart. It was in this way that the last of the old philosophers died. We remember these grand, heroic ones with revereuce, who hav gone we know not where. We remember that through their work, success, and bravery, we dare say to the gods "that they had better keep their hands off from the homes of the people and the government."

All Liberals who are Liberals of the right stamp will agree with us to the effect that the more orthodox the people are, the more liable they are to commit a crime, and no sensible person will doubt the criminality of John Calvin, of whom the lecturer spoke also. It will be well to say right here that the most orthodox audience we had was in the afternoon, but the most intelligent and attentiv oue was in the evening.

George Krahmer, of Bloomingdale, gave us an able address on "Why Are We Liberals?" iu the evening. For a young lecturer who has not beeu loug in the field, he bids fair to become more popular as time passes ou.

It would wake the people up again, the clergy too, if they would only attend (little cowards dare not come) our lectures. If we had the brilliant lecturer, C. B. Reynolds, to lecture on "Why I Left the Pulpit," it would set them to thinking and keep them at it, especially the ministers, and the ones who say he is a crank that got kicked out of the pulpit. His platform oratory is characterized by enthusiasm, thoughtfulness, and dignity.

Mrs. Reynolds, too, is an eloquent speaker and can giv it to the orthodox audience in the way of what she believes to be right, and what she believes to be wrong. Good! We will continue to hav Liberal lectures, and in spite of the prejudiced and bigoted people not believing in Freethought, Infidelity, Secularism, and Liberalism, they do come anyway to the lectures. M. FLORENCE HENNION,

Secretary Boonton Secular Union.

IRWIN, IOWA, April 1, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I read THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 27th late at night, and by the time I had finished A. Bates's letter I was quite sleepy; but it seemed so honest and straightforward that it set me to thinking. I thought of the time when I was a lad, over thirty years ago, when the milder phases of "spirit manifestation," such as table-tipping, knocking, and writing, were very common and furnished a gay pastime for the young folks, who did not seem to be very deeply impressed with its bearing on the question of man's future destiny. It was the older people who made a religion and a "divine revelation" of it, aud who found in it the evidence of man's continued existence beyond the grave, regaling us with ghost stories, aud leading us to emulate the raising of Saul by the witch of Endor, and such stuff as that. When we were told of recent manifestations in a near neighborhood that were far more wonderful than any that we had had we naturally felt it as a reproach, and were soon able to furnish just as good right at home. To what extent we "played it on each other" all around—to what extent we mutually and wilfully deceived each other—or to what extent we were but involuntary actors and "honest mediums," I can hardly say.

Man is an emulativ creature, ambitious to excel even in the ghost business.

He is also an imaginativ creature, and when he is an earnest believer in anything, nine times out of ten his testimony about that thing is not worth a straw till a very large part of it is very carefully eliminated. This remark furnishes no occasion for Spiritualists to fall into a fit of insulted anger and "take the lie" to themselvs. As a law of evidence it speaks of a common human weakness. It prevails in every questiou for determination by human testimony, and I do uot think any odium should attach to any one on account of the rejection of his testimony under its application. It is certainly creditable to take an earnest interest in a great question, even though that interest calls for extra care in weighiug the evidence which it prompts. As a Materialist I regret that Spiritualists seem more amenable to this rule of evidential criticism than our own realistic philosophers.

The maxim, "False in one, false in all," as a rule of evidence is quite misleading, unless the "false" be qualified as being intentionally false. The remedy then lies not in its entire rejection, but in its critical examination, and the rejection of that part only which is false. This examination involves not only the evidence in its own substantial unity and mutually related parts, but also makes inquiry into the mental, moral, and physical condition, and all the circumstances of the witness as well as the like considerations in relation to the investigator himself.

When a witness testifies contrary to the common experience of the race, appealing to his own extraordinary individual experience, he is not to be trusted—should not trust himself.

The internal aud external experiences that are adduced to prove Spiritualism either do not lead to that logical conclusion, or the alleged facts are but shadows of the imagination or false sensations of the nervous system.

Interest sometimes prompts to falsehood, but even interested lying may be less abominable than speechless indifference, and may really do the cause of truth less damage. Yet even the stigma of "lying in the interest of truth," or "for the glory of God," though once favored by Christianity, is now repudiated; and the falsehoods that now spring from interest or zeal are not intentional, but involuntary.

The zealous witness falls into grave mistakes. His ears, his eyes, his sense of touch, but above all his heated imagination, are all intent to catch the viewless messeugers of truth and giv them embodiment. He thinks he hears what he does not hear. The tympanum vibrates, not in unison with the aërial undulations, but in response to his eager expectation. He hears where there is no sound, and sees where there is no light.

Brother Bates says he is "mediumistic," and speaks of his own "organism" as being different from other human flesh. He is no doubt honest about it, and does not mean to be offensiv in his assumption of superiority over others; but this assumption is one of that peculiar class that should be closely criticised, for it is that stuff of which superstition weaves her web. If Brother Bates is severely just with himself he will find he is mistaken. Brother Bates knows that John Truesdell is both a trickster and a medium.

Now, Brother Bates, that's just a little too much! "A doctor in spite of himself."

Brother B. says he (Bates) is a medium. I admit the assertion requires proof. I assert I am not a medium. Does my assertion require proof? Just here my head began to nod, and I fell into a dream that was so vivid, and withal so pertinent, that I hope you will pardon my telling it. It did not seem that I was asleep, for I got up, put on my coat and hat, and walked out, for day had already broke. I soon met a neighbor, who took off his hat, and knelt down before me with clasped hands in the most ridiculous manner.

"Why, why! My good friend, what's the meaning of all this?" I said. But he began to call me "the almighty father, the everlasting God, the prince of peace," and to invoke my favor.

I tried to tell him that I was not a god; that I was only a man, and his neighbor. But the "bug" had got into his head, and he continued to follow me wherever I went. Whenever I did the most ordinary thing he called it a miracle that attested my deific character. I went to the well and drew some water, upon which he exclaimed: "Behold, how the great and mighty God causeth the waters to spring from the earth." I tried to explain to him how that the pump, constructed according to certain mechanical principles, caused the water, when the piston was moved by the handle, to rise in the stock and flow out through the spout. Here he broke off my explanation by a devotional ejaculation in praise of my more than human humility in taking the form of a man, and even refusing deific honors.

I was in a dilemma. What could I do? In everything else the man appeared to be fairly sensible. Soon he was joined by others, and then by others still, and all seemed infected with the same strange delusion that I was a god. I was vexed to the core, for if there is any one thing that I would rather not be, it is a god—in fact, I don't believe there really are any gods—and now to be made a god of in this strange way, why, it vexed me. At first I had felt a little amused, for I knew it was a mistake, and that I was not a god, though everybody should swear to it. At last the persistent clatter and worship of these idiots became an insufferable nuisance, but just as my discomfort reached its greatest point I awoke to find it a dream.

Now, Brother Bates, if you must be a medium, be one to your heart's content; but don't, don't insist on making mediums of your poor, helpless neighbors. You hav found two frauds—pretenders. Pretenders to what? To mediumship? No; they pretend that they are not mediums. We read of many historic pretenders, but they all pretend to be kings—or something. This is the first instance of the kind on record where a man's claims as a pretender are purely negativ. It is the most amusing and ridiculous thing to any man who has not got a "bug in his head." Bedlam cannot giv any one single token of insanity that is more plain.

I am no god, John Truesdell is no medium; so don't bother us with such foolishness. Your head is level elsewhere. Your purpose is right, and although you hav a peculiar spiritualistic egotism, I don't regard it in a personal way. J. K. P. BAKER.

STEWARTSVILLE, MO., April 5, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER comes to me like an angel of mercy, laden with truth, justice, and charity for all. I am sorry to hear that some of our friends do not like the pictures in your noble paper. Well, we cannot all see alike, but for one I think the ridiculous absurdities of priestcraft and the Bible cannot be too strongly pictured to the people; and if they will not read the paper after looking at it, they will hav seen the pictures, which, in my opinion, can do more for some people than reading. I hav been showing THE TRUTH SEEKER to many of my friends, and to-day one of them said, "Please send for the paper for me." Inclosed please find three dollars, which will pay for one year, and if possible send back numbers commencing January 1st, 1886. The pictures did it. I am the only one who has taken your good and glorious paper in this godly town up to this time, I believe. The priests hav their poor dupes so completely under their thumb that if they look cross at the congregation they will nearly faint for fear the Christians' big God will instantly destroy them.

Yours truly, S. N. BRADFORD.

LEICESTER, ENGLAND, March 19, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago you sent me "Rational Communism." I like the book well. It is better got up in print, and paper, and binding than our average English books. It is a great and good thing that "A Capitalist" has the courage to write honestly.

I see by our papers that you hav some heavy strikes about you. We hav had one in this town, which is celebrated for its hosiery, and especially stockings. About eighty thousand people earn their living in this town and neighborhood in making hosiery. The strike arose because the small workshops had been grinding their people down to starvation prices When they struck work they went in thousands and demanded the workpeople at the large workshops to strike with them against all work until they could obtain a settlement. The cause of their demanding the large shops to stop work was that they believed that some of the masters were supplying work for the orders where the strike was on. After a week or ten days the masters agreed to pay the prices demanded, and all went to work again.

In this town we hav a very fine Secular Hall which cost over £4,000 or about $20,000. If you would be interested I would send you an account of what we do there.

I told you when I wrote before that I wanted a specimen copy of John Swinton's Paper. He sent me several and I got him two regular subscribers, namely, the Secular Society and the Coöperativ Society, who hav very fine reading-rooms which are open daily for the public use.

THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrations are much liked in Leicester, and if you keep up the quality of the pictures to their present merit I think that you would insure a very great financial success.

I inclose a postal order, for which please send me "The Order of Creation," and "Diana." MAX H. BUNTON.

AYER, MASS., March 27, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me one copy of "The Order of Creation," and the four copies of Ingersoll's Tributes.

The pictorial department of THE TRUTH SEEKER has increased its interest and power for good at least twenty-five per cent. You hav indeed secured a good artist.

If people respond to Comstock's advertisment for obscene literature, he will hav to enlarge the library part of his museum to keep the Bibles sent to him.

Intelligence and reason are bursting the turtle-shell of bigotry and blind faith. ELIJAH MYRICK.

PAINTED POST, N. Y., April 3, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4—$3.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and pictures, and 50 cents for some tracts, among others S. P. Putnam's "Problem of the Universe." I expect to take THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I am able to pay for and read it.

I wish to ask a question on a subject that has occupied my mind for a number of years. Can an absolute being, the sole creator of the universe, knowing all things from eternity to eternity, create a being with a will and power to act contrary to the will of his creator?

It seems as if man, in relation to his creator (if he has a creator), is but a machine, and every act of his life is controled by circumstances; and his creator knowing the chain of causes and effects from eternity to eternity, there is no escape from fatalism or predestination.

Assuming the other position, that matter is eternal, possessed of inherent qualities that produce worlds, men, and mice, then we may farther assume that there is no revengeful creator to punish men after death, when it will neither reform the individual nor benefit society.

I merely ask the question and giv my views that some one better qualified may set me right if wrong. I am an old man with limited education. and perhaps you had better drop this in the waste basket. I shall not complain.

Fraternally yours, B. C. WOOD.

CLINTON, KAN., April 8, 1886.

MR. EDITOR: I hav seen two numbers of your paper, and like it very much. I value it very highly as an agent of reform, and at no distant date will become a subscriber, if I am successful in my undertaking; but for the present don't insist on my taking it, as I am a great advocate of "cash on delivery." Your paper is a great organ for the destruction of superstition. The Bible says that God made everything that was made. Then he made the devil; no one seems to deny that. Well, it seems that God was a mechanic or inventor (and a poor one at that, judging by the Garden of Eden business), and it seems he wanted an apprentice, in order to hav some one to whom he could charge all the bad jobs. Well, to me, however, it seems a shame for a father who is a poor mechanic to take one of his boys for an apprentice in order to hav some one on whom to cast the blame, and then prepare an endless torment for his apprentice and his children, in order to prove to the world that he (God) is simon-pure. Some time ago I had an argument with a member of the Christian faith, and after defeating him on various points, I began making fun of his God. I told him he worshiped a jealous God, at which he became quite indignant, and said the Bible didn't say that God was jealous. He bet me $2 that the words jealous God were not in the Bible, and another member of the Christian faith, being present, added $2 more to the bet. I said: "All right; I am four dollars ahead, or at least there will be $4 coming to me," and told them to read the 20th chapter of Exodus. I hav been patiently waiting, but the $4 has not arrived. I think since they hav found that their God is jealous they hav come to the conclusion that he is not worth $4, and will let him go for the debt.

A short time ago I had a talk with a Methodist on the subject of prayer. I asked him if he believed that God was omniscient, unchangeable, etc. "Yes." "Well, do you believe that God answers your prayers?" "Yes." "Then you believe he has done what he would not hav done had the request not been made?" "Yes." "Well, then, he is a changeable being, or a creature of circumstances." The poor fellow was almost convinced that his prayers had all been in vain.

I will bid you good-day, as I do not wish to tire you, seeing that I am a stranger, but, if agreeable, I may call again.

Very respectfully, C. V. WILLIAMS.

KENT, O., March 28, 1886.
